

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

J
301
H21

J

301

.H21

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

53 & 54 VICTORIÆ, 1890.

VOL. CCCXLIII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE TWENTY-SEVENTH DAY OF MARCH, 1890,

TO

THE FIRST DAY OF MAY, 1890.

Third Volume of the Session.

THE HANSARD PUBLISHING UNION, LIMITED,

CATHERINE STREET, STRAND, AND GREAT QUEEN STREET, W.C.,

PRINTERS, PUBLISHERS, AND PROPRIETORS OF

“HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

UNDER CONTRACT WITH H.M. GOVERNMENT.

1890.

1

2

ERRATA.

April 18. Sir LYON PLAYFAIR, on page 887, line 17, alter man to nation.

April 24. Lord ELPHINSTONE, on page 1248, line 28, alter 16,000 to 1,600.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

IN THE

FIFTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1890.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 27th March, 1890.

LUNACY CONSOLIDATION BILL. (No. 24.)

Returned from the Commons agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Standing Orders Nos. XXI., XXXIX., and XLV., considered (according to order), and dispensed with for this day's sitting.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (No. 1) BILL. ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—(No. 48.)

Moved,

"That the Bills have precedence of the Orders of the Day which stand before them."—
(The Marquess of Salisbury).

Motion agreed to; then Bills read 2^a (according to order): and, Standing Orders Nos. XXXIX. and XLV. having been dispensed with, Committees negatived: Bills read 3^a, and passed.

VOL. CCCXLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

OPEN SPACES BILL.—(No. 41.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, in asking you to read the Open Spaces Bill a second time, I desire, very briefly, to explain its objects. The principal object is to improve existing legislation on the subject; also to afford greater facilities for the acquisition and maintenance, by Local Authorities, of open spaces, and the extension to Local Authorities generally, of powers which at present are vested only in certain Authorities, and also to afford greater protection against the illegal enclosure of Metropolitan commons with the view of their being regulated as open spaces. It is only very recently, comparatively speaking, that the public have appreciated the necessity of acquiring open spaces in our large towns. It is not to be wondered at if occasionally it is necessary to revise these Statutes; for it would be very extraordinary if, in such a short space of time as 13 years, we had found out the way at once of bringing forward complete and final legislation on the subject. It is only by experience that we can know whether the present Acts are really available and of full force in regard to the preservation of these open spaces. The existing legislation is as follows:—In 1877 an Act was passed for affording facilities for the enjoyment by the public of open spaces in the Metropolis; and in 1881 an Act was passed to amend that. In 1884 a Bill was brought into Parliament and passed. That Bill dealt exclusively with disused burial grounds, and was for the purpose of preventing the erection of buildings upon them. The last Bill which passed through Parliament was in 1887. This was an Act for the purpose of extending certain provisions of the former Acts and amendments to Sanitary District Authorities throughout England, Wales, and Ireland. The past legislation has proved of the very greatest benefit to Local Authorities and to others who have desired to increase facilities for recreation in our large towns; but it has been found that there are certain defects or omissions in those Acts, and it is the object of this Bill to remove those defects and omissions. Sections 1 and 2 of the Bill are simply formal sections for the simplification of title and the definition of words. Section 3 empowers Trustees to convey open spaces to Local Authorities in cases where there is nothing to prevent them now save the general equitable rule which does not allow Trustees to delegate their office. The former Acts which I have mentioned emancipated Trustees in the far stronger cases of Trusts held under Acts of Parliament; and I do not think your Lordships will object to extend that jurisdiction to those who do not now possess it. The particular case which I have in my mind at this moment with regard to this clause is a Park in Ireland, Victoria Hill Park, Killiney, near Dublin, which was laid out at the time of the Queen's Jubilee, and which has been vested in Trustees; but those Trustees are unable to hand it over to the Local Authority, although I believe the Local Authority in this case is not at all unwilling to maintain it. Sections 4 and 5 of the Bill meet the case of hospital gardens and other grounds which are held for the purpose of charities and which do not come within Sections 2 and 3 of the Act of 1881

B

The Earl of Meath

because surrounding householders have no right of access to them. Under this section the Trustees will have the power of handing over such gardens and grounds to the Local Authority, if at meetings duly held a majority of two-thirds pass such a resolution. Sections 2 and 3 of the Act of 1881 are permissive, and this is a clause which I believe will meet with your Lordships' approval. Then Clause 6 extends the operation of Section 12 of the Open Spaces Act, 1887, to any Local Authority. At present a Vestry or District Board has no power of purchasing land for open spaces, unless the land comes within the definition of an open space as defined by the Acts of 1881 and 1887; that is, that the open space is entirely unbuilt upon. In the case of the Pottery Lane Recreation Ground, in the neighbourhood of Notting Hill, the Local Authorities were desirous of acquiring that space, which was practically open, because the houses there had been pulled down; but they were unable to do so, owing to the fact that there were one or two sheds, and I am not quite sure whether there might not have been an old tumble-down house or two on the land. However, as there were bricks and mortar standing on the land, they were unable to acquire it. They would have been unable to obtain possession of it had it not been that a voluntary Association stepped in and enabled the purchase to be made, the land being handed over to the Vestry, who were to recoup the money which they had laid out. But that was a risk which it is hardly fair to expect a voluntary Association to run; for if the Vestry had refused afterwards to hand over the money, this voluntary Association would have found itself hampered with this land which it had bought at a very high price as compared with the funds in its possession. Under Section 7 it is hoped that in future it will be almost impossible for Metropolitan commons to be enclosed, because, under it, no Metropolitan common can be enclosed without a special Act of Parliament. A Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed in 1865 for the purpose of considering the whole question of the enclosure of commons, and that Committee recommended that no enclosure should take place within the Metropolitan area. The result of that Committee was

PROCLAMATIONS.

Province of } Canada. }

EDMUND HEAD.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, QUEEN, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c., &c.

To Our beloved and faithful the Legislative Councillors of the Province of Canada, and the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses elected to serve in the Legislative Assembly of Our said Province, summoned and called to a Meeting of the Provincial Parliament of Our said Province, at Our City of Toronto, on the Twenty-fifth day of September instant, to have been commenced and held, and to every of you—

GREETING :

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, on the sixteenth day of the month of August last, We thought fit to prorogue Our Provincial Parliament to the twenty-fifth day of the month of September instant, at which time, at Our City of Toronto, you were held and constrained to appear: Now know ye, that for divers causes and considerations, and taking into consideration the ease and convenience of Our Loving Subjects, We have thought fit, by and with the advice of Our Executive Council, to relieve you, and each of you, of your attendance at the time aforesaid, hereby con- voking and by these presents enjoining you and each of you, that on Tuesday, the second day of the month of November next, you meet Us, in Our Provincial Parliament, at Our City of Toronto, there to take into consideration the state and welfare of Our said Province of Canada, and therein to do as may seem neces- sary. Herein fail not.

In testimony whereof, We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of Our said Province of Canada to be hereunto affixed: Witness, Our Right Trusty and Well-Beloved the Right Honorable Sir Edmund Walker Head, Baronet, one of Our Most Honorable Privy Council, Governor General of British North America, and Captain General and Governor in Chief in and over Our Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and the Island of Prince Edward, and Vice-Admiral of the same, &c., &c., &c. At Our Government House, in Our City of Toronto, in Our said Province of Canada, this twenty-fourth day of September, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, and in the twenty-second year of Our Reign.

By Command,
L. R. FORTIER, C. C. Chy.

Province of } Canada. }

EDMUND HEAD.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, QUEEN, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c., &c.

To Our beloved and faithful the Legislative Councillors of the Province of Canada, and the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses elected to serve in the Legislative Assembly of Our said Province, summoned and called to a Meeting of the Provincial Parliament of Our said Province, at Our City of Toronto, on the second day of November next, to have been commenced and held, and to every of you—

GREETING :

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, on the twenty-fourth day of the month of September last, We thought fit to prorogue Our Provincial Parliament to the second day of the month of November next, at which time, at Our City of Toronto, you were held and constrained to appear. Now know ye, that for divers causes and considerations, and taking into consideration the ease and convenience of Our Loving Subjects, We have thought fit, by and with the advice of Our Executive Council, to relieve you, and each of you, of your attendance at the time aforesaid, hereby convoking and by these presents enjoining you and each of you, that on Saturday, the eleventh day of the month of December next, you meet Us, in Our Provincial Parliament, at Our City of Toronto, there to take into consideration the state and welfare of Our said Province of Canada, and therein to do as may seem necessary. Herein fail not.

In testimony whereof, We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent, and the Great Seal of Our said Province of Canada to be hereunto affixed: Witness, Our Right Trusty and Well-Beloved the Right Honorable Sir Edmund Walker Head, Baronet, one of Our Most Honorable Privy Council, Governor General of British North America, and Captain General and Governor in Chief in and over Our Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and the Island of Prince Edward, and Vice-Admiral of the same, &c., &c., &c.—At Our Government House, in Our City of Toronto, in Our said Province of Canada, this thirtieth day of October, in the year of Our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, and in the twenty-second year of Our Reign.

By Command,
L. R. FORTIER, C. C. Chy.

Province of } Canada. }

EDMUND HEAD.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, QUEEN, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c., &c.

To Our beloved and faithful the Legislative Councillors of the Province of Canada, and the Knights, Citizens and Burgesses elected to serve in the Legislative Assembly of Our said Province, summoned and called to a Meeting of the Provincial Parliament of Our said Province, at Our City of Toronto, on the eleventh day of December instant, to have been commenced and held, and to every of you—

GREETING :

that in 1866 an Act was passed which took away from the Enclosure Commissioners the power of enclosing commons within the Metropolitan area; but it did not interfere with the right of the Lord of the Manor under the Statute of Merton, as old in date as A.D. 1235, to enclose the commons if he had carried out certain conditions mentioned therein. With regard to that right, the Select Committee of 1865 recommended that the Statute should be repealed, as having fulfilled its purpose and been superseded by modern legislation, being specially ill adapted to open spaces near the Metropolis. That it is no unnecessary clause which is suggested will be apparent when I remind your Lordships of what I have no doubt you are well aware, that in the cases of Epping Forest, and Berkhamsted, Plumstead, Tooting, and Banstead Commons a fight had to be sustained with the Lords of all those Manors; and unless funds had been forthcoming those commons would not have been saved for the benefit of the public at large. If Epping Forest had been lost to the public, I think your Lordships will agree it would have been almost a national calamity; yet if money had not been forthcoming, and in very large sums, owing entirely, I may say, to the munificence of the Corporation of London, it would not have been possible to acquire that magnificent open space, over 5,500 acres in extent, which, I am proud to say, is the largest municipal park in the world. It is, my Lords, to obviate this waste of means, and to prevent the injustice which may be done when funds are not forthcoming to fight the battle, that this section has been drawn up. As regards Section 8, that enables Metropolitan Local Authorities to purchase land, wholly or in part, outside their area. The Local Authorities outside London have already the power by the Public Health Act. Section 12 of the Open Spaces Act, 1887, was evidently copied from the Public Health Act; but the draftsman omitted another clause in the Public Health Act, giving power to buy land in or out of the district. The effect of that omission is this: at this moment there is a certain piece of ground, called North Woolwich Gardens, which is going to be taken over by the London County Council, and the London County Council has to obtain an Act of Parliament in order to acquire power to maintain these grounds; whereas the East Ham Local Authority could have taken over North Woolwich Gardens, which are partly situate within that district, even had they been entirely within the Metropolitan area; but the London County Council cannot take over those Gardens, because a portion of them is in East Ham. It is for the purpose of getting rid of such anomalies, and for improving legislation with regard to open spaces, not with the view of bringing forward new legislation, but simply to emphasise and carry out in its entirety the spirit of legislation which dictated the Acts of 1877, 1881, and 1887, that I ask your Lordships to read this Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be not read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Meath.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, the Bill to which the noble Earl asks you to give a Second Reading is largely due to his well-known philanthropy, and to his desire to do all the public good he can. The object of the Bill is evidently to extend the scope of those Acts which he has already mentioned. Although I do not know that there is any serious objection to be taken to it as a whole, some of the clauses will, I think, require careful attention, because they trench a good deal upon matters which are under the cognisance of the Charity Commissioners and Board of Agriculture. With regard to what the noble Earl said as to Clause 3, I should be very glad if he could explain a little more clearly—because it will be very important in the view of the Home Office—to what lands he refers. Is no consent to be required, as is necessary by the Act of 1881, and is the conveyance of those lands to be only by gift; or if by sale, what is to become of the purchase-money? Another point which would require further elucidation is Clause 7. This relates, as the noble Lord has already stated, to the power of the Lord of the Manor under the Statute of Merton. As he truly says, that power of Lords of Manors under the Statute of Merton it was suggested by the Select Committee should be abolished; but that suggestion has not yet been adopted by Parliament; and it is now proposed, as I read it, that approval should be required; that is to say, the consent of those two Bodies, the Charity Commissioners and the Board of Agriculture. This clause would deprive Lords of Manors of those powers under the Statute of Merton, of which Parliament has already refused to deprive them, and would compel them in these matters either to deal with the Enclosure Commissioners or to obtain a private Act of Parliament. I do not think that would quite meet the noble Earl's wish, and it would want carefully looking into. That clause is, in my opinion, objectionable, and certainly the Home Office would object strongly to that as well as to Clause 7. As regards the Second Reading of the Bill, I know not what view your Lordships may choose to take of it; but if you think it right to pass the Second Reading, I hope, on behalf of the Home Office, the Bill may be referred to one of the Standing Committees.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not wish to ask the House to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee for General Purposes simply because I happen to be appointed Chairman of that Committee. On that account, perhaps, my interest would be that as few Bills as possible should be referred to it; but it strikes me that this is not a Bill for the Standing Committee on Law, and therefore I would suggest that it should be referred to the Committee for General Purposes.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): With regard to referring the Bill to one of the Standing Committees, I would only remind your Lordships that we have heard something stated about the Statute of Merton and interference with manorial rights, both of which seem to me to make this a Bill having reference specially to legal matters.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: There is something in that certainly, but it is only dealt with, I think, by one single clause. However, that is a point, and I quite agree with the noble Lord that that is a matter which should be inquired into.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I think it is undoubtedly better that the Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Law, because that will unquestionably be a matter of the greatest conflict, and therefore I think we had better have the opinion of the legal luminaries of the House upon it.

Lord de Ramsey

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL—(No. 47.)

House in Committee (on Third Re-commitment) (according to order); Bill reported without further Amendment; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

IRELAND — SPECIAL COMMISSION ACT, 1888.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I beg to move the Motion of which I have given notice, with one variation with regard to the names. I omit that of Lord Greville, because I find he has not yet taken the oath—it is not because there is any difference of opinion—and there will be added the name of Lord Coleridge.

Moved,

“That the following Lords be at liberty to sign, before the rising of the House for the Easter Recess, the Protest entered against the Resolution of the House of Friday 21st March, although their Lordships were not present when the question was put:—

M. Breadalbane.	L. Acton.
E. Chesterfield.	L. Aberdare.
E. Ashburnham.	L. Coleridge.
V. Hampden.	L. Hothfield.
L. Camoys.	L. Northbourne.
L. Wentworth.	L. Hobhouse.
L. Vernon.	L. Burton.
L. Thurlow.	L. Hamilton of Dalzell.
L. Leigh.	L. Thring.

—(The Earl Granville).

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I am not going to take exception to the registering of the “Noes” proposed by the noble Earl without the “Ayes,” and by way of what really ought to be an addition, although I am afraid it may give a somewhat false impression in regard to those noble Lords who were ready to vote in their places in the House; but I would beg to call his attention to a Standing Order which is totally contrary to his Motion, and the suspension of which he ought therefore to have put in the forefront. As I have said, I do not object to his Motion; but for the sake of regularity in the proceedings of the House, I must call his attention to the 35th Standing Order, which is this—

"Such Lords as shall make protestation or enter their dissents to any votes of this House as they have a right to do without asking leave of the House, either with or without their reasons, shall cause their protestation or dissents to be entered into the Clerk's Book the next sitting-day of this House, before the hour of two o'clock, otherwise the same shall not be entered, and shall sign the same before the rising of the House the same day."

That is an explicit direction under the Standing Orders of the House, and it would, of course, require suspension before the noble Earl could make the Motion which stands in his name.

EARL GRANVILLE: I shall be happy to adopt the course suggested by the noble Viscount, and I beg to move that the Standing Order be now suspended.

*EARL FORTESCUE: I would only say that some years ago, when your Lordships agreed to forego your undoubted right and privilege of giving your votes by proxy, it was thought better and more seemly that votes should only be given when noble Lords had at least heard the Question put. It would be more, desirable, of course, that they should hear the debates. But, really, if noble Lords cannot, or will not, take the trouble—I am not saying that in some cases it may not have been inevitable—of attending here to hear the Question put, it seems to me that this privilege of recording protests in a permanent form on the Journals of this House being exceptional it is only decent that that power which is not enjoyed by the other House of Parliament should at least be confined to those who have heard the Question put and have either recorded their votes or have been present to say "Not-content." I have had now a Parliamentary experience in both Houses of very nearly half a century—not so long as my noble Relative—but it seems rather a strange thing to me in these days to propose this very exceptional way of exercising this very exceptional but ancient privilege of this House.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I entirely agree with the noble Earl that this is an exceptional matter; but he must have been exceedingly regardless of the business of this House if he has not constantly heard such Motions brought forward. I do not know why he should seek to deprive of the right given by the Standing Order noble Lords who were not present in the House when the Question was actually put; but, at all events, whether he is right or I am right, it is clearly a case in which if he makes that objection he ought to give notice to alter the Standing Orders.

EARL CADOGAN: Perhaps the noble Earl will allow me to point out to him that he is still irregular in moving at once the suspension of a Standing Order, under Standing Order 60, without notice. That Standing Order states that—

"No Motion shall be granted for making any new Standing Order or for dispensing with a Standing Order of this House unless notice shall have been given in the Minutes to consider of the said Motion."

Therefore, I am afraid the noble Earl is hardly in a position to move now.

EARL GRANVILLE: I thought, as we are so near the Recess, your Lordships would not have insisted upon my giving notice, but if it be insisted upon I shall be very glad to do so.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM: I think the Motion of the noble Earl opposite is rather inconsistent with the practice which has been stated with regard to proxies. We have altered the rule for voting by proxy, and, therefore, considering that some of the noble Lords named were altogether absent from the debate, and others did not think it worth while to remain to the end, I cannot see, I must say, what importance the noble Earl can attach to a Protest signed under those circumstances. I cannot think that it will add either to the dignity or the reputation of this House to allow it.

*LORD SANDHURST: On behalf of the noble Earl I beg to give notice that he will move to suspend the Standing Order to-morrow to allow him to make the Motion which stood in his name to-day with the addition of the name of Lord Coleridge.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Five o'clock, till to-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 27th March, 1890.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

To Mr. Vernon, for a fortnight, on account of ill-health.—(Mr. Anstruther.)

EAST INDIA (PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT).

Address for—

“Copies of or Extracts from Correspondence relating to the system of grading Royal Engineers with Civil Engineers on their first appointment to the Public Works Department.”—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

ECCLESIASTICAL DILAPIDATIONS ACT, 1871.

Return ordered—

“For the years 1885-9, inclusive, of the number of Benefices surveyed on vacancy and request in each year, and of the number of Benefices with buildings in year 1888”—

Diocese.	Number of Benefices with buildings in year 1888.	Number of Surveys.	1885.	1886.	1887.	1888.	1889.
		On vacancy
		On request

—(Mr. Harry Davenport.)

QUESTIONS.

POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTES.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in the Report on Polytechnic Institutes, which he proposes to present to Members of Parliament, he will include the recently started Pratt Institute in Brooklyn, United States of America?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART-DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Commissioners have not been able to inquire personally into the Pratt Institute, but its papers have been laid before them. It does not seem desirable to lay such papers on the Table, as it is quite a new Institution, admittedly based on the model of the Regent Street Polytechnic, and has not been long enough at work to afford any reliable guide.

SUGAR DUTIES.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware if it is a fact that the duty imposed on sugar imported from the West Indian Colonies to the United States is from £8 to £9 per ton; and whether any communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States as to reduction of tariff; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will consider as to the advisability of making some representations, so as, if possible, to obtain a reduction of the existing duty?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am informed that practically all the sugar imported into the United States of America from the West Indies pays, not £8 or £9, but £6 10s. a ton. No communications between Her Majesty's and the United States Governments with respect to the reduction of the tariff have passed, and it is not at all likely that any good result would ensue from representations made to the United States Government, who fix their rates of Customs Duty according to the fiscal system adopted by Congress.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT TO THE BELFAST-DUBLIN MAIL TRAIN.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has learned that, on the night of Saturday, the 15th instant, in consequence of the breaking of the crank of the driving wheel of the engine of the limited mail from Belfast to Dublin the train was transferred to and proceeded upon the down line, and that a collision with a passenger train from Dublin was narrowly escaped, the engines having been brought to a standstill only when they were within 20 yards of each other; if he will inquire whether this danger to life could have been obviated by the use of the "block system"; and what action the Board propose to take in reference to the case?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have caused inquiries to be made in consequence of the question of the hon. Member. The facts appear to be as stated, except that the drivers of the two approaching trains, having been warned to keep a look-out, brought their respective trains to a stand-still when 50 yards from each other. The directors attribute the occurrence to a grave error in single line working on the part of one of their officers, and are not of opinion that the block system would have prevented the occurrence. In deciding upon the Order to be issued to the company under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, the Board of Trade will bear in mind the facts of the present case.

DARTMOOR.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works when the new inch sheets of the Ordnance Survey map of Dartmoor will be published; and when the revised geological map of that district will appear?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): The Director of the Survey informs me that no exact date can at present be named for the publication of the new inch sheets of the Ordnance Survey map of Dartmoor, but they will, he expects, be available within two years. The arrangements in connection with the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom are not under the control of my Department, but of that of the Lord President of the Council.

STARVATION IN CEYLON.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to his reply in the House of Commons on the 31st of July last, relative to the evictions and consequent deaths from starvation in Ceylon, the Governor has completed his "searching inquiry" which he was making into the circumstances and results of such evictions; whether the complete Return of the number of Evictions and Deaths from Starvation in each year from 1869 to 1889 will be added to the Returns of Vital Statistics published in the Ceylon Gazette as heretofore; whether the lists of Newara Eliya district land sales for Paddy Tax, referred to in Mr. Moir's Report, dated 25th September, 1889, have been received by the Colonial Office; and whether those lists show that land sales affecting 10,283 men, women, and children have taken place, and that, as stated by Mr. Le Mesurier, Assistant Government Agent, 981 have died of consequent want, destitution, and disease, and 2,539 persons left destitute in the villages?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The results of the searching inquiry were contained in the full and exhaustive Report by Mr. Moir, which was received at the Colonial Office on the 11th November, and which the hon. Member has no doubt seen. A copy of the question put by the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe on the 31st of July, and of my reply, was sent to the Governor, and he was asked to furnish the Return asked for, if it could be made out with any approximation to accuracy. The Return has not been received, and our latest vital statistics are those published in the Colonial Gazettes for 1888 and the first quarter of 1889. The Registrar General has, however, supplied information for the two Divisions of the Nuwara Eliya District, in which the great mortality from starvation is said to have occurred in the years 1882 to 1885; and his statistics show that as nearly as can be ascertained the deathrate per 1,000 between 1881 and 1888 was slightly less than between 1871 and 1880, and that the population was larger in 1881 than in 1871, and in 1888 than in 1881. Mr. Moir states, at the end of his Report, that the lists referred to being very voluminous are not sent; but an abstract of them is given, from which the figures mentioned in the question are correctly quoted. Mr. Le Mesurier's letters on the subject are also included. The Secretary of State has given the whole matter the most careful consideration, and has seen no reason to doubt the soundness of Mr. Moir's conclusions, which are supported by the Registrar Generals' Returns and other statistics. He considers that while in some cases hardship was caused by too inflexible collection of arrears, there has been very grave exaggeration; and this, as I stated on the 31st of July, was from the first believed to be the case.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the figures are incorrect?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir; the figures are not incorrect.

THE CORK UNION.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the entire sum due by the Cork Union to the District Lunatic Asylum for the part maintenance of certain lunatics received from the workhouse; whether he is aware that the Vice Guardians have requested the Local Government Board to give a sanction, based on legal authority, for the payment, or part payment, of the alleged claim; and to what extent is the Cork Corporation represented on the Board of Governors of the Eglinton Asylum?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The amount claimed by the Board of Governors of the District Lunatic Asylum in respect of the maintenance of lunatics sent to the Asylum from the workhouse appears to be £536 10s. 3d. The matter has been submitted to the Local Government Board by the Vice Guardians for a decision as to whether they are legally bound to pay for the maintenance of the inmates referred to. There are four members of the Cork

Baron H. de Worms

Corporation on the Lunatic Asylum Board.

DR. TANNER: What is the constitution of the Asylum Board? How is the Cork Corporation represented upon it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Representatives of the Cork Corporation are Alderman John Jones, Alderman Michael Murphy, Alderman J. H. Scott, and Mr. B. Sheehan.

DR. TANNER: Has there not been considerable discussion as to whether the money can be legally paid or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe it is extremely likely that there has been a great deal of discussion on it. With regard to the hon. Member's inquiry as to whether it will be paid before a legal decision is come to, I beg to refer him to the answer I have just given to his question on the Paper.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the facts that the Boards of Nations and Intermediate Education and the Senate of the Royal University are constituted as to include a Catholic element in the proportion of one half, that the higher paid appointments in these Institutions follow the same rule, and that this proportion is maintained by the free action of the Executive Government, there being no statutory provision in this respect, whether he is aware that the Governing Body and office bearers of Queen's College, Galway, are, and have been for some time, exclusively Protestant; and whether the Executive will make appointments in Galway on the same principle that obtains in the Institutions named above, on the ground that distinct Ministerial pledge was given in this House that the patronage of the Crown would be so exercised as to secure, if possible, the services of Catholics in the appointments to the Queen's College, Galway?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to refer the hon. Gentleman to an answer given by me to a similar question put by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Pinkerton) in July, 1888. No change has since taken place in the personnel of the College.

THE FASTNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I have placed a question on the Paper of my intention to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why tenders were not invited for the contract for boat attendance on the Fastnet Rock Lighthouse, which lapsed on the 6th of January last; when will tenders be invited, and what reason is there for the delay; when the late boat Halcyon was suspended from attendance, were any steps taken to ascertain the truth or otherwise of the allegations made by the crew of this boat, that their lives and the lives of the light keepers of the Fastnet Lighthouse were seriously endangered on more than one occasion through the boat's unseaworthy state; whether the Board of Trade were warned a few years ago that the boat was in a dangerous state; whether there is any intention to re-instate this alleged unseaworthy boat in attendance on the lighthouse; at what weekly cost has the steamship Alert been for weeks doing the work, and would he inquire whether the attendance could be carried on more cheaply and as efficiently by a local boat; how long is it intended to continue the Alert at this work; and is it a fact that a seaworthy boat has been offered to attend on the lighthouse at the old contract price. At the request of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade I will defer the question until Monday.

THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

EARL OF CAVAN (Somerset, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in order to facilitate the unrestrained discussion by Irish tenants in regard to the benefits proposed to be conferred upon them by the Land Purchase Bill, he can assure the House that police reporters will be instructed not to attend public or private meetings when Members of Parliament or others address Irish tenants on this and kindred subjects?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Police reporters do not attend meetings unless they have reason to fear that a breach of the law may be committed. I am unable to understand how the presence of a police reporter can put a restraint on any discussion which is not of an illegal character.

In reply to a further question by the Earl of CAVAN,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I am not aware that any reason has been adduced for altering the habitual procedure with regard to police reporters. I believe that notice is sometimes given of the intention of the police to send reporters to meetings. I do not know whether reporters will attend those meetings or not.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the amounts, for the last financial year, of the several items proposed by his Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill to constitute the contingent guarantee fund?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already taken steps for the preparation of a Return to be laid upon the Table of this House which will include the information indicated in this question. It will, I hope, be laid in ample time for the discussion on the Second Reading.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give a Return showing the extent to which the probate and license funds will be allocated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that will require a separate Return. It will be sufficiently evidenced in the Bill itself.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Will the sum hitherto devoted to the encouragement of the breeding of horses for agricultural purposes be still guaranteed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is proposed that that sum—£5,000 a year, I believe—shall be placed upon the Votes.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to give a continuation of the Return granted to my hon. Friend the Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. Ellis) from 1882 to 1889.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gave an answer to that question to the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division a few days ago. I said that Returns containing full information on the subject of sales by property-owners in Ireland will be laid on the Table before the Second Reading of the Land Bill.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): May I point out that the Returns are very incomplete.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member must be aware that the preparation of these Returns has thrown a great amount of work upon the officials; but if the hon. Member will discuss the subject with me I will see what I can do to comply with his wishes and render the Returns complete.

Mr. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): Will the Returns be prepared before the Easter Recess?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid it will be impossible to present the Returns which hon. Members want before the Easter Recess. They will be presented immediately after the Recess, when there will be ample time to study them before the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. J. MORLEY: When will the Bill be circulated?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be surprised and disappointed if the Bill is not circulated by Saturday morning.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that the Olphert Estate forms a portion of one of the congested districts to be dealt with by the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill introduced on the 24th instant, he proposes to give the forces of the Crown for the carrying out of evictions there?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It does not seem to me that the proposals I have laid before Parliament afford either reason or justification for my refusing protection to those engaged in carrying out the decrees of a duly constituted tribunal.

*Mr. P. O'BRIEN: May I ask whether, in the interests of philanthropy, some consideration may not be paid to these unfortunate people, especially as it is intended to deal with them under the Land Purchase Bill, which the right hon. Gentleman introduced the other night? Could not the right hon. Gentleman exercise a similar pressure under the law as that exercised by his predecessor, the present President of the Board of Trade?

[No answer was given.]

THE ARRESTS AT CLONGOREY.

Mr. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can now state precisely the circumstances connected with the arrests last Friday morning at Clongorey; the legal authority; the refusal of the bailiffs to exhibit a warrant; the limit of punishment; the nature of the order issued by the County Court Judge; and the imprisonment of persons other than the tenant of the holding? I also wish to ask whether the tenant, Mrs. Kelly, a woman 75 years of age, was taken out of her bed at 6 o'clock in the morning?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I have now before me a copy of the order under which the arrests referred to in the question were made, and I am in a position to answer in detail the question of the hon. Member. The proceeding, as I have already stated, is of a civil character, over which the Executive has no control. It appears that Mr. O'Kelly, the landlord of the Clongorey Estate, obtained from the County Court Judge of Kildare an order in an equity civil bill proceeding restraining the defendants Mary Kelly, Michael Morressey, and Mary Morressey, their servants, agents, and workmen, from erecting on the holding of the defendant Mary Kelly any house or hut not suitable for the enjoyment of the holding as an agricultural holding, and from permitting certain buildings complained of in the civil bill to remain on the holding. A further order was made by the County Court Judge on October 14th, 1889, whereby, after stating that it appeared that the buildings mentioned in the civil bill were still standing, the Judge ordered the defendants to remove them within six weeks after personal service of the order upon them. Neither of these orders having been complied with, a further order was made on January 2, 1890, adjudging the defendants guilty of contempt of Court, and commanding the Sheriff to arrest them. The arrests in question were made by the Sheriff's Officer under the authority of the last-mentioned order. Michael and Mary Morressey were named as defendants in the civil bill decree as having been engaged with the tenant Mary Kelly in committing waste on her holding. I have no information that the bailiffs refused to show the order of the County Court Judge ordering the arrest of the defendants; but it is plain from the terms of that order that the Judge was satisfied before making it that the peremptory order of October 14 had been personally served on the defendants. The limits of imprisonment assigned by the order are until the prisoners are discharged by competent authority and due course of law. Prisoners committed for contempt of an order of the Court may be released on purging their contempt to the satisfaction of the Court. I am informed that Mary Kelly has been already discharged on the ground of ill-health.

MR. SEXTON: Three persons appear to have been arrested on this order. The tenant who, of course, had power to obey the order, and two others. As the tenant has been released from custody, will the other persons who are liable to be imprisoned for an indefinite time be released?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I imagine that it is a matter which rests entirely with the County Court Judge. The Lord Lieutenant has nothing to do with the matter.

MR. SEXTON: Then I beg to give notice that I will take an early opportunity of submitting to the House that this is a case in which it is in the power of the Executive to exercise clemency.

THE SHANNON DRAINAGE.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the river dams in course of erection at Killaloe, in connection with the Shannon Drainage, were completely swept away by the recent floods; what was the total expenditure on these works up to the time of their demolition; whether there is any evidence to show that the catastrophe was owing to negligence and incapacity in the execution of the works; and, if so, who is responsible; is he aware that the portions of the river dammed off for excavation above and below the bridge were inundated for several weeks, causing upwards of 200 workmen to be thrown out of employment in the depth of winter; why were not the works secured in the summer months, when the enclosure was laid dry, and the risk of the winter floods could be avoided; was the ordinary precaution taken to prevent leakage through the dams by using clay puddle or other approved material, or were the dams solely composed of active surface soil and the débris excavated from other parts of the works; was the side of the dam left exposed to the rapid current of the Shannon at that point unprotected by planks or other proper sheeting; will he inquire how it happened that the floods actually broke over the top of the embankments owing to their not being of sufficient height or width to protect the dam, though the material excavated and available on the spot for the purpose was carted half a mile away; and whether he will have full and independent inquiry made into all these particulars?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The hon. Member speaks in his question of river dams in course of construction; but I would point out that the dams in question were temporary dams, constructed in the usual manner from the excavations made near their site and at other parts of the works, and it was therefore impossible to keep a separate account of their cost. They were damaged by the great flood of December last, but were not entirely swept away. It was impossible to keep men at work in the bed of the Shannon during such floods, and therefore the works were suspended before the dams received any injury whatever. There was no negligence or incapacity in the construction of the dams, which were made and maintained in the manner usual in such cases. It would have been improvident to have erected them as if they were permanent works. They can be repaired at much less cost.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what were the respective numbers in the two editions of the Report of the Special Commission, 1888; and what precedents there are for so large a reduction in price as that from 1s. 4d. to 9d?

MR. JACKSON: The original order was for 2,000 copies, followed by subsequent orders, raising the total number of copies of the 1s. 4d. edition to 7,000.

Twenty thousand copies of the 9d. edition have been ordered from the printer. The precedents are the Report of the Royal Commission on Housing of Working Classes, first sold at 11d., afterwards brought out and sold at 6d.; Local Government Bill, 1888, first sold at 1s. 3d., and afterwards brought out and sold at 3d.; Reports of Royal Commission on Depression of Trade, first brought out in five volumes with evidence and sold at 18s. 11d., afterwards separated and sold at 6d.; Report on Small Pox at Sheffield, originally sold at 24s., afterwards reduced to 10s.

MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): May I ask whether it is not a rule in the Stationery Department that the price of public papers shall be reckoned at the cost of the paper and printing, the setting up being charged upon the Department; if so, and if the second edition of 20,000 copies of the Special Commission Report was printed from the same type as the first 7,000, does not the hon. Gentleman think the discrepancy between 1s. 4d. and 9d. is unaccountable?

*MR. JACKSON: No, Sir. I do not think it is at all unaccountable, because the price was fixed at considerably more than it ought to have been under the rules.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Do not the precedents quoted relate to matters beneficial to the public; and is there any precedent for a Report of this class, which is practically of a political nature and apparently distributed for a political purpose, being issued at a cheaper rate? Was there any consultation at the Treasury before this step was taken?

*MR. JACKSON: If the ordinary rule had been followed, as the hon. Member for the Rotherham Division (Mr. A. Acland) has pointed out, it would not have been necessary to reduce the price to 9d., because the cost might have been fixed at 9d. in the first instance.

THE FIELD OF TOSKI.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that, as stated in the East Anglican Daily Times of the 22nd instant, by a correspondent who visited the field of Toski, in company with several other witnesses, some five hundred Dervishes still remain unburied; and whether steps will be taken to put an end to that state of things?

Mr. Jackson

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have no information on the subject. Inquiry will be made as to the facts.

THE AUDIT AND SUPERVISION OF BANKRUPTCY IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the case that the fees payable to the Accountant of the Court of Session in respect of the Audit and Supervision of Bankruptcy proceedings are payable in stamps; whether these stamps are procurable only in Edinburgh; and whether, considering the large number of bankruptcy estates in Glasgow and the West of Scotland, he would arrange for the stamps being procurable in the Stamp Office, Glasgow?

*MR. JACKSON: The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have not had time to communicate with their representatives in Scotland in this matter since the hon. Member gave notice of his question; but they will make inquiries and see whether it is possible to comply with the request.

THE ATLANTIC MAILS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is within his knowledge that on her last outward passage the City of Paris, without mails, arrived at New York 63 hours in advance of the mail-carrying steamer Britannic; whether he has been informed that the Inman and White Star Lines have entered into an arrangement to take effect on 2nd April, and to continue during the summer, under which it is probable the steamer not carrying mails will arrive at New York every alternate week two days before the mail-carrying steamer; and whether, for the convenience of the mercantile public, he will publish, a fortnight in advance, the names of all steamers sailing from Queenstown to New York with Her Majesty's mails, with the dates of their departure, and also indicate the names of other steamers of high speed leaving Queenstown on the same days as the steamers carrying the mails, so that merchants may be able to address their letters to be sent by the fastest steamers?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): My Department has not yet received from New York the official Returns of the arrival of the two steamers referred to; but, according to telegraphic advices, the City of Paris arrived at New York about two days in advance of the Britannic. The City of Paris carried, as usual, ship-letter mails, 14 bags in all, consisting of correspondence specially superscribed for transmission by that ship. As regards the hon. Member's second question, I am informed that the White Star Company has entered into no arrangement with the Inman Company of the character referred to. As regards Question 3, the information desired by the hon. Member is already given to a considerable extent in the Post Office Daily List. That official publication gives, one week in advance, the name and date of sailing of each contract mail steamer to New York, and also of each non-contract steamer sailing on fixed days and at regular intervals. If it would be any convenience to the mercantile public to have this information so long as a fortnight in advance (which I think is doubtful) I will endeavour to meet that wish.

CHARGE AGAINST A LICENSED VICTUALLER.

MR. AGG.-GARDNER (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that one Albert Hawkins, a licensed victualler, was acquitted by the Hurstgreen (Sussex) Magistrates, on 1st January, 1890, on a charge of selling beer during prohibited hours, on Sunday, the 24th of November last; whether he has observed that the evidence against him was given by a police constable called George Austin, who admitted that for the purpose of obtaining evidence he disguised himself as a bricklayer and gave the name of James Churchyard; that whilst in this disguise he endeavoured to induce Hawkins to sell beer to him during prohibited hours, and that on Hawkins' refusal, three times offered to pay for some beer, which Hawkins let him have as a gift; whether he is aware that in another case heard at the same Sessions Austin was proved to have incited other persons to sell or obtain liquor during prohibited hours, and that the Hurst-green Magistrates expressed their disapproval of the action of the police in tempting people to break the law; would he state under whose instructions Austin was acting; and are any steps being taken to prevent a recurrence of such proceedings?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have obtained a Report from the Chief Constable, who informs me that it is the fact that the constable was in disguise; but he had been sent to that district for an altogether different purpose, and not at all with the view of obtaining evidence against any publican for breach of the Licensing Acts. In acting as he did in the cases quoted the constable undoubtedly exceeded his duty. His conduct was disapproved of both by the Magistrates and by the Chief Constable, who has reprimanded him, and will take every precaution in the future to prevent a recurrence of such proceedings.

POSTCARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the estimated actual cost of stamping 1,000,000 postcards for private persons at the Inland Revenue Office; and whether it would be cheaper to allow private persons to affix halfpenny stamps to their own postcards, which, in size and in every other respect, conform to regulations, than to compel them to buy postcards supplied by the Government contractor?

*MR. RAIKES: The estimated cost of stamping 1,000,000 postcards for private persons at the Inland Revenue Office is £16 13s. 4d. I have, I think, quite recently informed the hon. Member that the question of allowing private persons to attach halfpenny adhesive stamps to their own postcards has been for some time under the consideration of a Departmental Committee, whose Report I am daily expecting. The cost of manufacturing postcards is necessarily considerable; but these cards, as the House is aware, are re-sold at a profit, which is not the case with adhesive stamps. The substitution of private cards for official postcards, therefore, so far from being attended with a saving of £40,000 or £50,000 a year to the State, would result in a loss of revenue, which would equally result from the discontinuance of the charge now made at Somerset House for stamping private cards.'

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS — POWDER CASKS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Ballincollig Powder Company, Limited, tendered for the making of the powder casks; and at what price are such casks usually supplied to the Government?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): No, Sir; the Ballincollig Powder Company, Limited, did not tender for gunpowder casks; but in reply to our inquiries they gave 4s. as the price of a hand-made barrel of the ordinary trade type, which is quite unsuitable for our purposes. It is understood that they are now endeavouring to produce a barrel equal to our pattern, which is machine-made. The service powder barrel is made in the Royal Laboratory, and costs about 4s.

THE WOOD GREEN LOCAL BOARD.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received a protest from four candidates for election to the Wood Green Local Board against the appointment as Returning Officer, at the election, of a gentleman who is a partisan of some other candidates; and whether he has sent any answer to the protest, or intends to take any action?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board have received a Memorial signed by four of the candidates for election as members of the Wood Green Local Board objecting to the appointment of Returning Officer which has been made by the Local Board, and requesting the Board to nominate a person to act as Returning Officer. The Board have informed the Memorialists that the power of the Board to appoint a Returning Officer is limited to the case of the first election of a Local Board, and they have no authority whatever to intervene in the manner suggested.

Mr. Raikes

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it the fact that the person who has been appointed Returning Officer was present on Tuesday at a meeting of one of the candidates; and is it not within the power of the Local Government Board to see that the election is not conducted unfairly?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am not prepared to say what the power of the Local Government Board is; but if they find that the election has been conducted unfairly, I think they would have power to interfere. The Local Government Board, however, have no right to interfere with the appointment of Returning Officer.

THE OLDHAM UNION.

MR. LEAKE (Lancashire, S.E., Radcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received any intimation of the appointment of Mr. William Hall as relieving officer in one of the districts of the Oldham Union; whether he has received a communication from the clerk of the Union that Mr. Hall's writing, orthography, composition, and use of figures are not such as to commend themselves to any business man who has books to keep, and certainly not to him (the clerk) as the Public Officer of the Union; whether he is aware that it was admitted by one of the Guardians who supported Mr. Hall, that he was not as well qualified as some of the other candidates; whether it was also stated that Mr. Hall would take lessons in handwriting, and that Mr. Hall was selected from 87 applicants by a party majority of 11 to 8, and has his appointment received the sanction of the Local Government Board?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Local Government Board have received a Report of the appointment of Mr. Hall as relieving officer in the Oldham Union. I have received no communication from the clerk to the Guardians containing the statements referred to in the question; but the clerk, in reporting the appointment, stated that the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Board of Guardians and several other members desired him to call the attention of the Board to the style of writing and the mistakes in spelling and composition of Mr. Hall's letters, and that they were strongly of opinion that if his appointment were sanctioned inconvenience and difficulty would result. I have seen no Report of the proceedings at the meeting at which Mr. Hall was elected, and I am unable, therefore, to reply to the questions with regard to the admissions and statements alleged to have been made as to Mr. Hall. Neither am I aware what was the number of Guardians voting for and against his appointment. The appointment has not yet received the sanction of the Local Government Board, and is under their consideration.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

MR. CRILLY : I beg to ask the Under Secretary for the Home Department what is the reason for the delay in distributing the Twelfth Report of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, along with the Five Appendices, which were presented to the House on the 24th of August, 1889 ; whether he can say when these volumes will be in the hands of Members ; and whether he approves of the system of presenting Papers and Returns to the House in dummy, when, as occurs in many instances, months elapse before the actual copies of these Papers and Returns are put in circulation ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) : The Secretary of State is informed by the Commissioners that the delay in distributing the Twelfth Report of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts, with the Five Appendices, which were presented to the House on the 12th of August last, is due to difficulty in obtaining certain proofs from the printers, to the great labour involved in making the indexes, and to the limited nature of the staff and resources at the disposal of the Commissioners for such work. The Commissioners fully expected last year that the Report would be issued during the recess, and they have now informed the Secretary of State that its issue may be confidently expected during the present month. The Commissioners have expressed their regret at the delay and inconvenience caused, and their intention to act in future as closely as possible in accordance with the order of this House.

MR. CRILLY : Is the hon. Gentleman aware that two of the volumes issued last year had no index ?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY : That is probably their reason for delaying the issue of the present volume until completion of the indexes.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the sentences passed by the Recorder at the Central Criminal Court, as published in the Times of the 25th instant, on three boys, aged respectively 15, 14, and 13, of nine and six months' imprisonment with hard labour, for stealing 6s., a chisel, and other articles, from a church and a chapel ; and whether the boys, being so young, could be sent to a reformatory instead of to prison with hard labour ?

MR. MATTHEWS : My attention has been called to this case, and I am now making inquiries into the circumstances, and will inform my hon. and gallant Friend of the result. The boys could have been sentenced to detention in a reformatory instead of to a term of imprisonment with hard labour.

PORTUGAL AND EAST AFRICA.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Wendesbury) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, having regard to the declaration of Her Majesty's Government that they insisted upon the restoration by Portugal of the status quo in the disputed territory as a preliminary step and condition for the discussion of the main question, and for placing it on diplomatic ground, the status quo has now been sufficiently restored ; and, if so, whether the two Governments have entered upon, or intend entering upon, the discussion of their respective claims in the territory in question, and what course it is proposed to take if they cannot agree ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : There is no foundation for the declaration attributed to Her Majesty's Government. We simply insisted on the withdrawal of the Portuguese forces from the British Protectorate. There was no condition as to the restoration of the status quo (an expression which has been used by the Portuguese newspaper Press as implying that Great Britain also must abstain from exercising protectorate) as a preliminary step to the discussion of the main question and placing it on diplomatic ground.

MR. P. STANHOPE: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House any information as to the exact condition of the negotiations?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There are some points which are still under negotiation between the two Governments; but I would rather not enter into particulars.

THE EASTER HOLIDAYS AND PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if, in fixing the period of the Easter adjournment, he will consider the desirability of making it as short as possible, with a view to the grant of a reasonable recess in mid-Session at Whitsuntide?

MR. J. MORLEY: May I further ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if the Tithe Bill is read a second time this week, on what day next week, and from when to when, he will move the adjournment of the House?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have to consider the convenience of the House and also the exigencies of the public business. But I hope, on the assumption to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, that the Tithe Bill will be read a second time to-morrow, and also on the further assumption that we are able to get Votes in Supply in Class 1, on Monday, which are absolutely necessary, I shall be prepared to move the adjournment at a morning sitting on Tuesday. But in the event of any disappointment I shall be obliged to ask the House to sit for Supply on Tuesday, and delay the adjournment till a later day. I have had to consider carefully the condition of business, both inside and outside the House. It has been represented to me that Easter week is one in which hon. Members are engaged in their respective counties on the County Councils almost all over the country; and, having regard to the duties they have to discharge in the counties as well as in the House, I have thought it better on the whole to propose that the House should adjourn till Monday, the 14th. That, I think, is an arrangement which, on the whole, although it gives a longer holiday than I should have wished to propose, will be satisfactory. I am glad to see that a proposition of that kind is not altogether unwelcome to Gentlemen opposite, who do not generally accept suggestions made from this Bench. If we can count on the assistance of the House on Monday I shall be prepared to move the adjournment on Tuesday.

Sir J. Fergusson

MR. J. MORLEY: Do we understand that if the Votes are taken on Monday there will be nothing on Tuesday except the Motion to adjourn?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; unless there is some Bill of a minor character which we wish to advance a stage.

MR. J. MORLEY: In that case, will the Budget still be taken on the 14th instant?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it would be for the convenience of the House to adhere to that arrangement. But the subject can be mentioned again to-morrow. I should have said that the Report of Supply must be taken on Tuesday before the adjournment.

MR. LABOUCHERE: How much money and how many Votes is it absolutely necessary to get before Easter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will, I am sure, give us his assistance; he is always so ready to come to the assistance of the Government, and when the time comes I will give him all the information which is necessary.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: As it has always been the custom after the Recess to take Supply on the first night, will it not be more convenient to have the Budget on Thursday instead of Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If I understand that to be the general wish of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen I will undertake that this arrangement shall be made. But I thought, looking to the importance of the Budget, that it was desirable to take it as early as possible.

MR. SEXTON: I assume that neither Irish Supply nor the Second Reading of the Land Bill will be taken before Thursday, the 17th?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That is so.

CANADA.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the important character of the loyal Address to the Queen recently adopted by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, in which the fixed resolve of the Canadian people to maintain the political connection between Canada and the rest of the British Empire is affirmed, he will cause the full text of the Address to be published in the Gazette?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Address has not yet been received, and, as was stated in reply to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Sir J. Colomb), a few days back, it is unusual to present such Addresses to Parliament. There will, however, of course, be no objection on the part of the Government when the Address has arrived to advise Her Majesty that it should be given as an exception to the general rule.

GAS STOKERS.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the widespread danger and disaster which must inevitably ensue if a large town is suddenly put in darkness by a strike among gas stokers, and other workmen associated with them in the production of gas, the Government propose to introduce any legislation during the present Session to put this class of artisans in the same category as sailors and postmen, and to limit or regulate their power of indiscriminate striking?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government quite recognise the gravity of the subject to which my hon. Friend alludes, but, having regard to the ability with which the companies and authorities who are responsible for the supply of gas met the difficulties which were occasioned by the strike without the assistance of any extraordinary powers, Her Majesty's Government do not think it is necessary for them to propose legislation which would interfere between employers and employed. They rely rather on the moderation and good sense of the parties to controversies of this character, and to the powerful influence of public opinion upon them.

VOL. CCCXLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES AND THE INCOME TAX.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that at Rushden, Northants, Income Tax under Schedule A is still demanded, and has been this year collected from three Friendly Societies, namely, the Rushden Friendly Society, the Rushden Tradesmen's Benefit Club, and the Society of Rechabites, in spite of the provisions of the 12th section of "The Revenue Act, 1889;" whether the further collection of the tax will be prevented by clearer and fuller instructions to the Surveyor of taxes; and whether he will direct the repayment of taxes thus collected in error?

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member must recollect that in all cases of exemption from Income Tax no cessation of the demand takes place, but after the demand has been made persons entitled to exemption can secure repayment. Friendly Societies are entitled to exemption under certain conditions, and if the Rushden Friendly Societies claim exemption in the usual way every facility will be accorded them for obtaining repayment; but the demand must be made as in all other similar cases.

SHOPS (WEEKLY HALF-HOLIDAY) BILL.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (University of London): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Blundell Maple) whether, in accordance with the suggestion of the Home Secretary, he would withdraw the block and allow him to move the Second Reading of the Shops (Weekly Half-Holiday) Bill.

*MR. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): The right hon. Baronet requests me to withdraw my opposition to his Shops (Weekly Half-Holiday) Bill, and let it unanimously pass its Second Reading, with the understanding that it be referred to a Committee. He proposes to close shops for the sake of giving the shop assistants a half-holiday. Having introduced a Bill myself which will accomplish the desired purpose, of giving a half-holiday, without closing the shops, I must decline to recognise the necessity for interfering with the liberty of the shopkeepers and stall-holders of Great Britain and Ireland, as proposed by the right hon. Baronet.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: I should like further to ask the hon. Gentleman if he will consent to both Bills being referred to the same Committee, in order that the Committee may have an opportunity of judging between them?

*MR. BLUNDELL MAPLE: No.

ARMY PENSIONERS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in cases where Army pensioners make habitual use of workhouses, and discharge themselves just before their pensions become due, he will consider the expediency of providing that an application by the Guardians for the direct payment to them of such portion of the pension as may be due to the Union shall be entertained by the War Office, and that the claim shall be sent in and discharged by the central office in London and not elsewhere; and whether in the case of Army Reserve men in workhouses, similar provisions can be made?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In the case of an Army pensioner who makes habitual use of a workhouse, the Guardians may apply direct to the War Office as to the payment of the pension, but the War Office will have to refer the case to the local paymaster for report, and whatever payment may be decided upon would have to be made by that officer. Similar provision cannot be made in the case of an Army Reserve man, whose pay is a retaining fee for liability to serve, and by paragraph 156 of the regulations issued under the Reserve Forces Act it is exempt from stoppage on behalf of Parochial Authorities for the maintenance of the man or his family.

STRIKING A NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICER.

MR. BOND (Dorset, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the sentence of five years' penal servitude inflicted upon William Ballock for striking a non-commissioned officer with the open hand; and whether he will take this case into his consideration, with a view to the remission of a portion of the sentence?

Mr. Blundell Maple

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I presume the hon. Member refers to the case of William McGill Ballock, ordinary seaman of H.M.S. Sultan, who was condemned, in 1888, to five years' penal servitude for striking with his clenched fist his superior officer, a Boatswain R.N. This was a very gross case of insubordination, as there was not the slightest provocation to the offence; and, looking to the prisoner's previous indifferent character, there seems to be no reason for re-considering his sentence out of the usual routine.

THE NEW CODE.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): When will the new Code be in the hands of Members, and how long will it be allowed to lie on the table? What course does the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Council propose to take in regard to it?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The new Code will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow evening, and proper time will be given for its consideration.

MR. MUNDELLA: The time that must intervene before it comes into operation will expire during the Easter recess, unless it is suspended by a Minute in Council.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that any such possible contingency will be guarded against.

THE ALLOTMENTS BILL.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): Will the Allotments Bill be proceeded with before Easter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid there is no chance of that.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

In reply to Mr. J. ELLIS,

MR. MATTHEWS said: The Employers' Liability Bill will be presented this week.

NEW MEMBER.

New Member sworn,—James Alexander Rentoul, esquire, for County of Down (East Down Division.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LUNACY CONSOLIDATION (RE-COMMITTED) BILL [LORDS.]—(No. 191.)

(4.22.) Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses up to 268, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 269.

(4.25.) MR. A. PEASE (York): I wish to draw attention to this clause, and to ask whether it has been compared with Section 64 of the Act of last year. Has the Solicitor General noticed that in the Bill the words "Visiting Committee" occur in Sub-section 2, instead of the words "Local Authority," which occurred in the Act of last year. In his opinion do the words "Visiting Committee" cover and provide for all contingencies?

(4.26.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): My attention has only lately been called to the matter, but I have compared the Bill and the Act, and my impression is that the words of the Bill, taken in connection with the provisions of the interpretation clause of the Act of last year, do cover all contingencies. The intention is to reproduce the exact provisions of the Act as it passed this House.

(4.27.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): This purports to be a Bill for the consolidation of certain of the enactments respecting lunatics, but it does not extend to Ireland or Scotland, and I find that there are a large number of existing Statutes which are not alluded to in the Bill at all. For instance, an Act of George III., passed in the year 1800, and the following Statutes passed in the reign of Her present Majesty—12 and 13 Vic., relating to borough contributions in respect of lunatics; 13 and 14 Vic., Acts, relating to the County Palatines of Lancashire and to married women; 14 and 15 Vic. c. 81, in reference to the removal of lunatics, and 16 and 17 Vic., relating to the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices. Then, again, there are other Acts not mentioned, which have been passed within the last 10 years, namely, 42 and 43 Vic., for the relief of pauper lunatics; 46 and 47

Vic., an Act relating to criminal lunatics, and 47 and 48 Vic. c. 46, which contains provisions relating to sailors, whether belonging to the Navy or to the Marine Service. As recently as 1886, there was an Act passed relating to the case of lunatics who might be Members of the House of Commons. That also is excluded. Under the Statute, the Commissioners of Lunacy are bound to report to the Speaker the case of any Member who is taken to a lunatic asylum. There is no such provision in the present Bill, and I fail to understand how the Bill can be regarded as a Consolidation Bill. It appears to consolidate certain Statutes, but others are left intact and unrepealed. Has that been done deliberately, or is it proposed hereafter to bring in another Consolidation Bill?

(4.30.) SIR E. CLARKE: This Bill does not purpose to consolidate all the enactments relating to lunacy, and the cases mentioned by hon. Members are expressly excluded by Clauses 270 and 274 from its operation. With regard to Members of the House becoming insane, I may point out that it is intended to deal with the administration of the law so far as it requires to be put in force, and our attention has not been called to the necessity for re-enacting those special provisions. The whole Act has been carefully gone through more than once in order to ensure a complete consolidation, and I think hon. Members will find it contains all that is required.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."
—(Sir E. Clarke.)

(4.32.) MR. J. MORLEY: I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will communicate with some of his Colleagues who are in the habit of saying that the Opposition exist for nothing but to obstruct public business, and will draw attention to the fact that the Opposition have afforded great facilities for the passing of this Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I shall certainly have great pleasure in calling their attention to the fact that the Opposition have given the greatest possible facilities for the passing of a Lunacy Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed without Amendment.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY AND REDEMPTION BILL.—(No. 169.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(4.33.) *THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): In calling the attention of the House to this subject, I think I need hardly preface my remarks by reminding the House that it is a question of so difficult and complicated a character, and one that excites so many different interests, that no Government would willingly press it as we have continually pressed it upon the attention of Parliament without being convinced that there is urgent necessity for the amendment of the law. But in the observations I shall make I do not intend to address my arguments to the present appropriation of the tithe. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has said that we should carefully sever in our minds those questions which relate to the present appropriation of the tithe from those questions which relate to the tithe itself. This is a Bill which relates to the tithe itself. We have no intention of dealing with questions which relate to the appropriation of the tithe. That appropriation we hold should continue as it is at present. With regard to lay tithe, whether it belongs to individuals or Corporations, I will say that it rests upon as good a title as any other property, and it could be no more equitably applied to public purposes without compensation to its owners than could the watch in the pocket of any Member of this House. In the case of ecclesiastical tithe we hold that it is not national property in the sense of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea; we hold that it is the property of the Church or of her ministers, held by her or by them in return for certain religious services for the benefit of the nation at large, and that Parliament has no right to devote it to other purposes. I do not expect many hon. Members opposite to agree to that view, but at least they will agree with the words of their leader when he said that the tithe itself is a property which ought to be respected and preserved, with due regard to the rights and position of all concerned in the administration and use of it. That it should receive that consideration and respect from those who hold it to be, as he holds it, the national property, and that in giving it that consideration we must take care that in our disputes about modes and circumstances we do not allow it to be frittered away. Whatever opinion we may hold as to the proper destination of tithe, this, at least, is not susceptible of argument to the contrary, that it is now a debt legally due from the tithepayer to the tithe owner, and I cannot understand how anyone can argue that it is right that the payment of a debt which is legally due should be withheld because the debtor does not agree with or approve the purpose to which his creditor will apply the money if it is paid. Now, I perceive with surprise that the hon. Member for Leicester, of all the Members of this House, has placed on the Paper a notice for the rejection of this Bill, because I read some words of his the other day, in which he expressed the opinion that it is the duty of those who regard the nation as ultimate landowners to keep a firm grip on that part of the rent which was accepted in 1836 as an equivalent for tithes. What I would submit is that he is not keeping a firm grip on the tithe under the present state of the law. I wish I could put before the House full statistics of the amount of tithes unpaid in Wales alone during the last three years. But it is impossible to obtain such statistics, because they can be obtained only from individual tithe owners, who would be reluctant to state their losses lest they might be made a ground for additional losses in future. But I have the facts with regard to 75 parishes in the diocese of St. Asaph, and I will state them to the House. In those parishes, during the two years 1888 and 1889, a sum of £38,918 of ecclesiastical tithe was due. Of that sum £10,230 remains unpaid, and £3,000 has been expended in compelling payment of the rest. Now, I can show that that non-payment has not been due to a general inability to pay, but that the tithe has been purposely withheld in large proportions in individual cases.

Mr. W. H. Smith.

Of these 75 parishes, in 42 between 10 and 20 per cent is unpaid; in 19 parishes, between 20 and 30 per cent; in seven parishes, between 30 and 40 per cent; in four parishes, between 40 and 50 per cent; and in three parishes, between 50 and 60 per cent. I will not dwell on the hardship to the clergy of this state of things. I am alluding, as the House will understand, simply to ecclesiastical tithes. I will not dwell, I say, upon the hardship to the clergy, although I think I should remind the House that in the case of the Welsh clergy no one can say that they are wealthy, grasping, or hard landlords; no one can say that it is their fault—if it be a wrong to anyone—that the Church is established. They are poor men, at any rate; men of small private means; men who have devoted their lives to the Church in the faith that the law will secure to them a small but an adequate subsistence; and it seems to me a strange Christianity which passes by, without regard to the suffering of such men as these—sufferings which have in some cases come very near starvation—and which would refuse to them the payment of their legal due, not from inability, but from very much less worthy motives. I do not know whether I shall be told that the proportion of tithe unpaid, after all, does not amount to much. I would say this, that the example of non-payment is very infectious, and if it is allowed to continue I feel quite sure of this, that it will be so widely followed that the funds from which hon. Members opposite expect to derive in future great things for Wales will become little more than a voluntary rate, and will gradually disappear. Now, can that be a result which hon. Members below the Gangway desire to promote? I can understand their objection to the present appropriation of tithes; but I cannot understand their opposing a Bill which does not touch the present appropriation of tithes, but which simply desires to secure that they will continue to be paid. The hon. Member for Leicester may think that he is doing a good deed in endeavouring to deprive parsons of their tithe, but the result will be that the tithe of which they are deprived will not long remain in the pockets of the tenant-farmers. It is absolutely certain that when a farmer has contracted to pay tithe rent-charge and declines to fulfil his obligation when he is able to do so, some other person will soon offer a higher rent to his landlord, that farmer will disappear, and the tithe will go into the pocket of the landlord. Is that the result which the hon. Member for Leicester desires? I can understand that the Liberation Society will praise him for opposing the Bill, but any praise of theirs will be outweighed by the condemnation those in favour of land nationalisation will bestow upon him for making over to the landlords a property which belongs neither to the owners nor occupiers of the land, and which his great predecessor in spoliation, King Henry VIII., took very good care they should not have after he despoiled the monasteries centuries ago. If my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea could have his way to-morrow, if he could by a stroke of the pen devote ecclesiastical tithe to those educational purposes which he had at one time in his mind, or to those large and vague financial purposes which he now seems to threaten the House with, I would still see sufficient reason and necessity for the measure of which I am moving the Second Reading. This matter is not only a Welsh one. No doubt it is only in Wales that those disgraceful riots and disturbances, that open resistance to the payment of tithe, which seems to have been copied from Irish models, have occurred; but in other places besides Wales there is a strong and mistaken feeling in the minds of tenant-farmers that the tithe is a burden on them, owing to the fact that under the existing law they are made parties to a transaction between tithe owner and tithepayer, in which they have no real interest whatever. The Tithe Commutation Act intended tithe to be paid by the owner of the land; and it is, perhaps, no wonder that the system which has been so widely adopted has led the tenant to believe that he bears the burden of a charge which certainly ultimately in any case must fall on his landlord. The object of the first part of the Bill, therefore, is to carry out the principle which I think was accepted with unanimity by the House last August, and to impose the liability for the payment of tithe directly on the landlord. An occupier will not in future be liable to the payment of tithe, and will be free, where the land is let, from being harassed by distraint for it. The liability will be, in all cases, on the owner, to be enforced by a Receiver appointed by the County Court. When an occupier has contracted to pay tithe rent-charge before the beginning of this Act, the tithe rent-charge paid by the owner will be added to the rent until it is otherwise agreed between him and his landlord. I do not think that anyone can contend that this is not a change which is to the obvious advantage of the tenant-farmer. In the present state of the land market he is able whenever he likes, practically, if the arrangement which the Bill provides is considered by him to be unfair to himself, to make a fresh arrangement with his landlord; and as everybody knows during the past 10 years there have been numerous instances throughout the country where tithe, having been formerly paid under an agreement by the tenants, the liability by mutual agreement has been transferred from the tenants to the landlord. Of course, the change will be an advantage, generally speaking, to the tithe owner for obvious reasons, but it is one, as I think, which the House will see involves an alteration in the security for the tithe. At present the security for the tithe, now that the occupier is liable, is the stock or produce of the land. That stock or produce, being the property of the occupier, and not of the owner, can no longer be security when the liability is placed directly on the owner. You must maintain, I think, the principle of the Tithe Commutation Act, which was that no personal liability should be imposed on anyone for the payment of the tithe. You must also maintain what was practically the principle of that Act, that nothing should be liable to the payment of tithe except that which arises out of titheable land. Therefore, maintaining both those principles, it is proposed that the new security for the tithes shall be that which is the produce of titheable land to the owner—namely, the net rent. Of course, it is not an easy thing to define what is the net rent of the land to the owner. In previous Bills it was defined as that which the County Court Judge should decide to be the net profit of the year for which the tithe was due, and the Bills provided that that tithe should never exceed that amount. That raised,

Sir Michael Hicks Beach

when examined, several very important difficulties. In the first place, was such net profit that which the owner had actually received or that which he might have received? It is obvious if it was defined as that which he had actually received during the year it would be open to a landowner, by collusion with his tenant, to remit a portion of his rent for a time or to postpone the payment of his rent, and thus absolutely defraud the tithe owner of what was due to him. On the other hand, where the land was not let, I should maintain that it would be absolutely impossible to discover what had been the net profit of the land to the owner and occupier in any particular year. You can only discover that by taking an average of years and considering what the land would let for from year to year, because anyone who knows anything about the matter will be aware that it would be perfectly easy so to manipulate farm accounts as to show no profit at all in any one year when a considerable profit might really have been made and put into improvements of stock or improvements on the land. Therefore, we have felt that net rent should be defined practically as the rent which the land would let at from year to year, and taking that view we have felt that the County Court Judge was not the proper person to decide upon it. He may have no knowledge of the particular locality. He is not a tribunal for valuation. The proper authority to decide upon it is the tribunal of valuation for the district, which is the Assessment Committee for the Union; and, therefore, we have inserted in the Bill provisions under which the tithepayer can obtain a special rateable value from the Assessment Committee of the Union, and with that special rateable value can appeal to the County Court Judge to reduce the tithe payable by him for that year to an amount not exceeding the special rateable value of the land on which the tithe is paid. I will endeavour by an example to explain the working of the 2nd clause. Suppose two farms in a parish, each of them let at a rent of £150 a year. Under the ordinary system the gross estimated rental of those two farms would be fixed at £150 each. Suppose one of them subject to tithe of £75 a year. In that case the gross estimated rental of the titheable farm to the occupier of it would be put at £75 a year, and the tithe of £75 on the farm would be assessed to the owner of the tithe. Suppose the rental of those two farms reduced to £70 a year each, the tithe remaining the same as before. Then the occupiers would both appeal against their assessments, and the gross estimated rental on the same principle would be reduced, that of the tithe-free farm to £70 and that of the titheable farm would disappear altogether; but the owner of tithe on the titheable farm would still continue to be assessed to the tithe at £75. That would be the case under the existing law; but now would step in the operation of the 2nd clause of this Bill. The payer of the tithe on the titheable farm would appeal to the Assessment Committee to give him a special rateable value. He would prove that he let his farm for £70 a year, although he paid a tithe of £75. They would reduce the gross estimated rental of the tithe from £75 to £70. A deduction of 10 per cent., which is the usual deduction in farms, would then be allowed in calculating the rateable value from the gross estimated rental, and that would bring the special rateable value of that farm to £63. Then the £63, minus any quit rent, would be the sum which the County Court Judge would decide would be the tithe due to the tithe owner instead of £75. I would remind the House that this provision is merely an adaptation of the provisions of the Act of 1836 to the change which imposes direct liability on the owner. Under the provisions of the Act of 1836 where there is no produce there will be no tithe, and where there is only an amount of produce corresponding to a certain amount of tithe it is all the tithe owner can recover. I believe in those provisions we shall have a change in the law which will be of advantage to all the classes concerned. It will be a fair relief to the tithe payer, but it will also be an advantage to the tithe owner, because it is surely very much better for him to obtain a reduced tithe than to be put to the loss and inconvenience of having the land thrown out of cultivation altogether, or to having to cultivate it himself. It will be an advantage to the public, because so long as there is any rateable value of land at all, so long will there be a reason why a tithe payer should keep it in cultivation, and the tithe will cease altogether in the almost impossible case of there being no rateable value of the land at all. I would submit to the House that those provisions of the Bill are no more than just to the tithepayer. Many suggestions, however, have been made that they are not sufficiently just, and that in return for the imposition of a direct liability upon the owner of the land some allowance should be made to him by this Bill. Reference has been made in some quarters to the allowance of 5 per cent., which was one of the provisions in the original drafts of the Bill of 1887. I can only say with regard to that that grave objections were made to it at the time, because a general average of that sort would work unfairly in many particular cases. Of course, where it is the present case that the owner of the land pays tithe, as often happens, without any charge whatever to the owner of tithe, it would hardly be fair to charge the owner of tithe with a deduction of 5 per cent. on account of the passing of this Bill. Where the collection from the occupier now costs less than 5 per cent. to the owner of the tithe, as it often does, there also it would seem to be unfair to charge him with a deduction of 5 per cent. on account of the passing of this Bill. Where, as it sometimes might happen, the tithe is now paid by a single large occupier for land belonging to several non-resident owners, and the Bill makes a change in the payment of tithe by those non-resident owners instead of by the single occupier, you certainly could not charge the tithe owner for what is no benefit to him at all. This appeared to us to be a sufficient objection to prevent us from inserting in the Bill the provision that there should be an average deduction of 5 per cent. from the tithe. But a larger suggestion has been made, namely, that there should be some re-opening of the tithe settlement of 1836. I should like to know what is meant by the suggestion. You certainly cannot re-open the tithe settlement of 1836, if you mean by that re-opening the award by which the sum to be paid in each parish by way of rent-charge instead of tithe was fixed as the average sum received for tithe during the preceding seven years, because the data are gone upon which the award was made. But it would be possible to re-open the process by which, under the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, that award was converted into a money payment varying from year to year—I mean the system of corn averages. The Act of 1836 provides that the rent-charge, when ascertained by the award, shall be commuted into a payment varying with the annual value of corn. The suggestion has been made, and it was carefully considered by the Corn Averages Committee of 1888, that this subject should be re-opened, so as to compel the corn averages to be calculated on the first sales, instead of the re-sales of corn, and also to include unsold corn in the average. I believe the latter proposition would be absolutely impossible in practice, because I do not see how you can ascertain the market price of unmarketed corn. As regards the first proposal, I will only say that these averages have ever since the Tithe Commutation Act been calculated not on growers' prices, but on market prices. Market prices must include all expense and profits between the producer and the consumer. But whether these suggestions are feasible or not, I would impress upon the House that the adoption of either of them would amount to re-opening the system of corn averages, and that in any such re-opening the tithe owner would have a just right to demand that the whole subject should be revised, and that other articles of agricultural produce, besides wheat, barley, and oats, should be taken into consideration in the calculation of averages, such as meat, hay, and wool. I can assure the House it would be absolutely impossible to alter that system by the insertion of other articles, or by varying the proportions of the articles in any way but one to the advantage of the tithepayer. The only way in which the present system of corn averages could be varied to the advantage of the tithepayer would be by taking the averages solely upon wheat, or in a larger proportion upon wheat than at present. That proposition was made and rejected at the time of the discussion on the Tithe Commutation Act. If it was not just at that date, it could not be held just now, when the proportion of wheat produced in this country to the amount of barley and oats is very much less than it was at the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act. On all these grounds I can hardly believe there can be any real argument in favour of re-opening the system of corn averages. I have this further argument against it: that there is no ground for any proposition which would involve a general or universal reduction of tithe. There is unquestionably in certain parts of the country a very considerable grievance—a grievance with which I sympathise myself most heartily, and a grievance which I can assure the hon. Member for Leicester is not due, as he supposes, to fox hunting, or the preservation of ground game. What is the grievance? It is that in certain parts of England, particularly in Essex and Berkshire, the value of the land on which tithe is charged has deteriorated since the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act more than the reduction of 22 per cent. in the value of the tithe as fixed by the Act. Where the land has deteriorated less than 22 per cent., or where it has increased in value since that time, then, if there is any grievance, it is that of the tithe owner. The only possible grievance to the tithepayer is where the land has decreased more than 22 per cent. in value. I think I have shown that there is no ground for a general re-valuation of tithe. But would a partial re-valuation be possible? The suggestion has been put forward that there might be a re-valuation of tithe in parts of England where the grievance which I have just mentioned exists. What would that mean? It would mean that where the Act of 1836 has given a good bargain to the tithe owner, you should annul that bargain, but where it has given him a bad bargain he should be held to it. It does not appear to me that such a proposal would be consistent with justice. There are tithe owners, like the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Colleges at the Universities, which own tithe in many parts of England; if you lowered tithe on these grounds in some parts of England, surely you ought to raise it where it is less than a certain proportion of the value of the land in other parts of England. But even in individual parishes in Essex and Berkshire; it might be found that one farm in a parish, perhaps through neglect, has fallen very heavily in value, while other land in the parish might have been much improved in value by the expenditure on buildings by the landowner. Would it be fair to the tithe-owner to lower the tithe on the farm which has fallen in value, and not to raise it on the farm which has improved in value by reason of the owner's investing his capital in it? But would it be fair to the tithe-payer to raise it on the land which has increased in value? It would be most unjust towards the landowner, who, relying on the settlement of 1836, and the abolition of the growing tithe, has invested his capital in improving his land. There may be a change in the circumstances of agriculture some day. I devoutly hope there will be, and that the value of land will go up again. If you reduced the tithe now on land which had fallen in value, ought you not to raise it again if the value of that land increased? If so, have you not struck a fatal blow at the principle of the abolition of the growing tithe, which was the great advantage of the Tithe Commutation Act, and which was more beneficial to agriculture in this country than anything else that has been done by it? It may be asked, "Is there anything in this Bill to meet the grievance of the tithepayer?" That brings me to the part of the Bill which relates to redemption. Provisions as to redemption, I think I shall show, are a boon to the tithepayer as well as the tithe owner, and may be a special boon to those parts of the country most affected by agricultural depression. We have not thought it right to propose anything like a compulsory or universal redemption of tithe. I do not believe that is desired by the tithe owner or the tithepayer at any price which an impartial tribunal would award as a fair price to the parties concerned. What we have thought it right to do is so to alter the law as to afford to either party desiring to redeem, every facility that can be granted for the purpose consistent with justice. The law with respect to tithe redemption in ordinary cases at the present time allows the Board of Agriculture, if they see fit, to order the redemption of tithe under 20s. a year at a price equal to 25 times the commuted amount, on the application either of the titheowner or tithepayer; and the redemption of tithe over 20s. a year at a price not less than 25 times the commuted amount, on the joint application of tithe owner and tithepayer, with consent of the Bishop and patron, where the tithe owner is the incumbent of a benefice; and it makes no provision which would enable the tithepayer to arrange to pay by way of instalments the capital sum fixed for redemption of the tithe. The provisions of the law with regard to redemption at the present moment are a dead letter. The Land Commissioners, to whom the Board of Agriculture have now succeeded, inform me that they did not think it fair to enforce upon the tithepayer the redemption of the small tithe at a price 25 times its commuted amount; and with regard to the redemption of the larger tithe it is obvious that with £100 tithe at the price of £78, and no allowance for rates and taxes, very few tithepayers would care to redeem at the commuted amount. What we propose in lieu of the present system is this—to abolish the limit of 25 times the commuted amount, and to allow the Board of Agriculture to fix the price in cases below 20s., or in the case of building land. In the case of lay tithe of a higher amount than 20s., the duty of the Board of Agriculture would be simply to sanction any agreement the parties might arrive at. In the case of ecclesiastical tithe over 20s., their duty is proposed to be the same, except that, in accordance with the precedent of the Glebe Lands Act, 1888, they may overrule the objections of the Bishop and patron on satisfying themselves that the redemption is for the permanent benefit of the benefice. Now, I would call attention to an important provision in Clause 10. In deciding on this, and in fixing a price for the redemption of the tithe, the Board of Agriculture will have regard, not as now to the commuted amount of the tithe, but to any increase or decrease on the current year and the six previous years, in the annual sum payable on account of tithe, which is, of course, a very different thing, and to the amount of rates and taxes charged on it during that time for which no allowance can be made now—not to any fixed number of years' purchase, but to the circumstances of each particular case, and especially to any such increase or decrease in the proportion between the annual value of the tithe rent-charge and of the land as may affect the security of the tithe rent-charge. The principle upon which these provisions are based is this, that you cannot fairly settle this matter on a system of averages. You must deal with the redemption of tithe as the commutation of tithe was dealt with, according to the circumstances of each particular case. Where the rates are low, and the amount of the tithe in proportion to the annual value of the land out of which it springs is low, so that the security is good, of course, in such a case the price of redemption would be high. But in those cases in Essex and Berkshire to which I have alluded, where the rates have become, owing to the depreciation in the value of other property in the parish, a tremendous burden on the tithe owner, and are now very high, and where the amount of the tithe, perhaps, almost swallows up the value of the land out of which it springs, so that the security for the tithe is very much reduced, there obviously the price of the tithe would be very low. The proposition is that each case shall be judged on its own merits. Now, I quite admit that redemption in each case is to be voluntary on both sides. But the sensible tithe owner would surely consider the risk he runs from the diminution of security and the increase of his rates, and would consent to redemption on fair terms, even though it might be at a comparatively low price. I need not dwell upon the advantage to the tithe owner and the tithepayer of increased facility for the redemption of small tithes or of tithes payable on land which is to be divided into small plots for building or other purposes. A small tithe is a nuisance to the tithepayer, and a great source of trouble and expense in collection to the tithe owner, and obviously it is the interest of the tithe owner to redeem such tithe on a very much less number of years' purchase than 25 years, which is now the minimum fixed by law. The tithe on land to be cut up into small plots for building or other purposes certainly ought to be redeemed in the public interest. It is not well that the owner should sell the land to a number of small freeholders, charged with little payments of this kind, of which the purchaser may be absolutely ignorant when he agrees to buy. We have inserted in the Bill provisions for enabling the tithepayer, where redemption has been agreed upon, to provide the capital sum for redemption in a manner which shall be easy to himself. Where lay tithe is concerned he will be enabled to charge his settled estate, or other estate, with a capital sum or with an annuity for its redemption. Where the tithe is ecclesiastical tithe he will pay the price of redemption by annual payments for 50 years, of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the capital sum to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They will form a Tithe Redemption Fund; and out of it they will pay interest at the rate of $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. on the redemption price to the owner of the tithe which has been redeemed. I do not think I need enter into the minor details of the Bill; and I have really to thank the House for the patience with which they have listened thus far to what, I fear, has been a dull exposition of a very complicated subject. What I would say with regard to the redemption scheme is this: I think I have amply shown that the law with regard to redemption does require amendment, and we have made proposals which, in our judgment, will be fair to both the parties concerned, and which shall also secure that the tithes shall not be frittered away. I do not suppose for a moment that our redemption scheme is perfect or incapable of amendment, and we shall receive suggestions for amendment, from whatever quarter they may come, with perfectly open minds, provided only those suggestions are just to the interests of both the parties concerned and to the interests of the public. I doubt whether it is possible, on any subject which excites so much interest as this, to propose a Bill which shall meet with universal approbation; I am quite sure it is impossible to do so on the tithe question; but this, at any rate, I may say, I make no objection whatever to the opposition with which this Bill has been met. I do not care for the opposition of those who oppose the Bill because they want to make the payment of tithe as difficult as possible, in order to injure the Church, or of those who think that they find in this tithe question a useful lever, as it has been called, for upsetting the Establishment, and wish that that lever should be kept in the hands of the people. Nor of those who are the foes to all property, and are trying to delude some unwary landowners into believing that the foundations of one kind of property can be weakened without injuring those of all other kinds of property. When I come to the criticism offered by tithe owners on one side and tithepayers on the other, I am very much disposed to set one against the other. When I am told by the Tithepayers' Association that this Bill is entirely in the interests of the tithe owner, I turn, on the other hand, to a letter which I read the other day from an indignant tithe owner, in which he described the Bill as an

Sir Michael Hicks Beach

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.

"Inhuman measure of simple spoliation, furnishing fresh evidence of the general decay of principle which threatens the very existence of society."

I say these criticisms may be set one against the other, and in the middle of them I find reasonable safety. I commend the Bill to the fair judgment of the House as an attempt to do justice to both sides, and to the interests of the country at large, and as a measure which, in our belief, if it should become law, will have this beneficent operation—that it will put an end to a mistaken grievance which is the main source of the strength, if not of the existence, of a lawless and dangerous agitation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.28) MR. PICTON rose—

*MR. SPEAKER. In point of form, other Amendments on the Paper will take precedence of that of the hon. Member.

MR. PICTON: I thought I was first.

No other hon. Member rising,

MR. PICTON said: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman has taken a sanguine view of the safety of a middle course in a case where "Cannon to right of them, cannon to left of them, volleyed and thundered." No doubt the question is a complicated one, and last Session the leader of the House promised that it should be submitted to a Joint Select Committee of both Houses, so that it might examine and report upon the complications to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded. That would have been a reasonable course, and it would have been especially reasonable and wise if the noble Lord, who has presided over a meeting of the Tithe Question Association, had been appointed chairman of the Committee. The right hon. gentleman has quoted something I have written, but he misunderstands my position. It is because this Bill relaxes the hold of the nation on the tithe, juggles with it, and turns into a portable form the nation's property, so that it can be easily carried off hereafter, that I, for one, strongly object to the Bill. No doubt the tithe is legally due from the tithepayer to the tithe owner, but it is likewise the property of the people of this country in general. I am anxious it should not be taken away from them, and I am anxious it should not be lessened in value. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the case of Wales. Wales will have much better exponents of her cause than I can pretend to be, and yet such is my sympathy for the Principality that I cannot help making some remarks upon the case of Wales. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the 75 parishes in the diocese of St. Asaph, where, out of £38,000 of tithe that is due, £10,000 remains unpaid, and he went on to refer to the strange kind of Christianity that passed by the sufferings of the clergy, which are brought about by this large proportion of the tithe remaining unpaid. In my opinion it is a strange kind of Christianity that leads the members of the Established Church in Wales to allow their clergy to suffer in this manner, and which seeks to throw the burden of the maintenance of the clergy of that Church upon the poor farmers of Wales. The right hon. Gentleman was quite wrong in his allusion to myself. He said I might obtain the praise of the Liberation Society for the course I am now taking. On the contrary, the hon. Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), who is a distinguished member of the Liberation Society, has expressed his strong disapproval of my action. Therefore, it is not to the Liberation Society I am looking for praise and encouragement. I look, as I hope to show presently, to the common sense and the substantial interests that are at stake. The right hon. Gentleman has also said that nothing is liable to be taken in satisfaction of the tithe-charge except what is grown upon the land, and that the new Act will carefully preserve that state of the law. I hope to show it will do nothing of the kind. Not only will the produce of any particular plot of land be liable for the tithe-charge upon it, but that of other plots held by the same farmer, as well as his furniture, will also be liable to make good any deficiency. Instead of abolishing distraint this Bill doubles the power, and extends distraint to the farmer's household goods, as well as to what is growing on the land. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that the value of land in Berkshire and Essex has very considerably diminished. So it has, and it is a great shame that in this country, which possesses the richest and largest markets in the world, the Government should have been so blind to the nation's real interest as to allow the value of land to go down as it has done. I cannot believe that this is an absolute necessity; and, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman himself looks forward to another and a better state of things, when the value of the land may be restored, and the value of tithe likewise. But he wants to sell tithe now when everything is depressed, and when a comparatively low price can be obtained for it. To that extent he will diminish the value of the nation's property. With that policy I entirely disagree. But the Government are evidently puzzled in this matter. This is the fourth Bill they have brought in on this question, and everyone has differed from the rest. This looks like uncertainty, vacillation, and weakness of purpose. The present Bill is no better than any of the others. It is simply an attempt to delude public opinion, which they dare not face. Does it conciliate public opinion on either side? We have the Resolutions of the Tithe Question Association and of the Farmers' Alliance; we have articles and letters in the Mark Lane Express, a paper not much inclined to Liberalism; and we have articles and letters in the paper called Agriculture, and all of them are bitterly opposed to the measure brought in by the right hon. Gentleman. With a good many of the articles and letters I agree, for my first objection to his measure is that it does nothing whatever for the relief of agriculture, or for the relief of the farmers working on the land. I am perfectly anxious not to be misunderstood on this point. I am aware that many crude proposals are made which assume that it would be a relief of agriculture to lessen the amount of tithe, or, in other words, to upset the settlement of 1836. I am not of that opinion at all. My method of relief would be very different to that. The Government will not face the real grievance, which is that the tithe system takes out of the land every year a very large sum of money which ought to go towards lightening the financial burdens of the people, but which is devoted to the purposes of what can no longer be considered a National Church. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the tithe is as much the property of the Church as a man's watch is the man's property.

Mr. Picton

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I was referring to lay tithe.

MR. PICTON: Yes; and the right hon. Gentleman denied that tithe was in any proper sense the property of the nation, adding that it was the property of the Church. For the belief that tithe is the property of the nation we have authority. That great statesman, Lord John Russell, in bringing forward the Tithe Commutation Bill in 1836, distinctly stated that the tithe was national property, and no one, either in this House or the House of Lords, has attempted to question the accuracy of that statement. At the opening of this very Session the right hon. Gentlemen who respectively lead on each side of the Table spoke of tithe as national property. No one, as far as I know, differed from them; but I will take the words of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that it is the property of the Church. What is the Church? Will he define the Church of England? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House in what respect the Church of England differs from the English nation? I am a member of the Church of England. I decline to be considered anything else. I was christened in the Church of England, and though I have not very frequently attended its services I have sometimes done so with, I hope, considerable profit. I disavow altogether that I have any desire to increase the difficulty of collecting tithes in order to injure the Established Church as a spiritual and a religious institution. But the Church of England is by law established. I defy the right hon. Gentleman to distinguish it from the English nation. I know the right hon. Gentleman may tell me, as learned professors and distinguished lawyers have done, that he himself is technically wrong in calling tithe the property of the Church, that it is the property of certain Corporations, some Corporations sole and others aggregate Corporations. He knows that is a technical description. He himself says it is the property of the Church. I maintain that tithe is the property of the English nation, considered as a Church; and that if the English nation wills that this property shall be put to other uses, it will never be deterred from acting by the reflection that it belongs to the English nation in its spiritual and not in its secular capacity, and so I do not think that the observation that it is the property of the Church will be of very much avail. Our real grievance is that large sums of money, amounting altogether to no less a sum than £4,000,000 sterling, are taken out of the land year by year and handed over to the Church, which ought to be applied towards lightening the financial burdens of the community. I may be told that this is not the light in which the Tithe Question Association and the Farmers' Alliance regard the matter. But I am not so sure of that. At any rate, I think they are very rapidly coming to that way of thinking, and, if anything will drive them to it, it is certainly the Bill now before the House. They want teaching; they want to understand that if their burdens are to be lightened it can only be done by diverting the nation's property to do the nation's work. The money might be spent in the provision of additional schools, or in the establishment of Agricultural Colleges, which are very much wanted, or in promoting higher education of every kind. I am persuaded that if the people once learn that such application of the property of the nation would lessen their burdens and tend to increase their profits, we should very soon have them on our side in dealing with the relief that is to be given to the occupying tenants and those who toil on the land. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill will prevent distress, and he based his assertion on the presence of the 1st clause. But under the 6th clause tithe is to be regarded as rent. How do people recover rent? Is it not usually by the process of distress? Would not the same power of distress apply to this tithe rent-charge, which is turned into rent? Suppose a farmer pays £50 rent and £50 tithe. At present, tithe cannot be recovered from him except by distressing on the crops growing on the land; but by the 6th clause the £50 will be turned into so much additional rent. He will owe it to his landlord, who, if it is not paid, may proceed by way of distress upon everything the man has got. Therefore, instead of abolishing distress, the Bill makes distress more acute, painful, and dangerous. Besides that, at present the farmer may only be distrained upon by one person, the owner of the tithe; but if this Bill passes he may be distrained upon by either of two, by the tithe owner or the receiver appointed by the County Court. The "receiver" includes the manager, and he will have power, if he thinks proper, to take the farm out of the hands of the farmer. Therefore, I contend there are two parties who may distress, not only upon the produce growing out of the ground, but upon everything in the stables and houses. I wonder at the boldness of any Government coming forward and saying that a Bill like this is any relief. Again, it is provided that application may be made to the Assessment Committee in order to obtain a special assessment. Just, in passing, let me ask the House if this is not tampering with the nation's property? You are to have the value of the tithe lowered in this insidious manner, and yet nothing would induce the right hon. Gentleman to disturb the settlement of 1836. It can be disturbed all over the country by the Assessment Committee. I have here a list of 18 farms, the letting value of each of which has gone down, in 20 or 30 years, by more than half, and, in some cases, by more than two-thirds, and even more than five-sixths. The tithe, of course, remains the same. I find a case of a farm, which formerly was rented at £1,600, with tithe amounting to £400. The landlord has agreed to let it for £650, the landlord himself paying the tithe. If the landlord goes to the Assessment Committee and obtains a reduction, into whose pocket will the profit go? It will go into the pocket of the landlord. And so landlords get as much as ever they can screw out of the tenants. If the landlords do not get more now, it is only because they cannot. If the special assessments are reduced, landlords who are accustomed to get as much as they fairly can will, of course, get the benefit of the lowered assessment. I hold that the clause providing for appeal to the Assessment Committee will almost invariably operate—and always in times of prosperity—in favour of the landlord, and not of the occupying farmer. Then, says the right hon. Gentleman, there is this magnificent project of redemption. In the Land Commissioners' Report for 1888 I find that an annual amount of tithe, reaching £17,500, has been redeemed for £443,000. What I should like to know is whether on those farms where the tithe has been redeemed the farmers get their land at lower rates? Do they not pay the interest on the money that was expended in the redemption of the tithes? Does the landlord hand over the interest on the money to the tenant? Certainly not, if he can avoid it. Whether the tithe is redeemed or not, the occupier is called upon to pay as much as the land will produce. But when it is said the landlords are made liable, I quite agree in the desirability of that. I think they ought to be more liable than they are now; but, as I have shown, the tenant is liable to the owner. You make matters worse for the farmer by giving the owner a firmer grip of him than he had before. It will be easier for the owner to get at the tenant, and he can do it at less expense. The Amendments which were proposed to the Bill of last year were much better than anything to be found in the present Bill. There the County Court was made a sort of Court of arbitration. That proposal was strongly supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) who, I am afraid, frightened the Government by the way in which he praised it; the result being that the clause has disappeared. Short of such interference as was then projected between the landlord and the tenant there is no hope of helping the farmer at all, except by the devotion of the tithe to the lightening of the burdens of the people. I maintain that that is the proper purpose of the tithe. From time immemorial one-tenth has been stopped out of the produce of the land. For whom is it stopped? I know some people will say, "It is stopped for the glory of God." I know no better way of glorifying God than in serving our fellow-creatures. No one would be so blasphemous as to suppose that the tithe can be of any use to the Almighty. The tithe was given for the purpose of doing good to our fellow-creatures. It was, of course, devoted to certain ornate church services; but, in addition, it was devoted to alms-giving, and to the help and relief of the sick. Why, Sir, the monasteries of old times, though they were associated, especially towards their latter end, with many abuses, were amongst the most beautiful our history can show. They were formed of men professedly, at least, and often really, associated together as brethren for the glory of God through service to mankind. All the tenants of the estate regarded the good brethren as indeed their brothers and their helpers. In all times of application the people went to them for help; in all times of perplexity they appealed to them for advice and were never refused. The monasteries were, at any rate for a long time, a source of beneficence in their neighbourhoods; and not merely of spiritual, but of secular service as well. Well, Sir, I say that the tithes which, in former days, were devoted to the use of the monasteries ought now to be devoted to the good works which the monasteries performed as far as those works are consistent with our times. The misuse of tithe in its devotion to a Church which is no longer national is bitterly felt in the Principality of Wales. Those spiritual wants which the mediæval Church supplied in its own way our fellow-countrymen in Wales meet by voluntary contributions. They build their own temples of worship, they support their own ministers, and the enormous majority of the people of Wales never trouble the so-called National Church for any service whatever. Whatever the Representatives of English constituencies do, I earnestly hope the Representatives of Wales will fight this Bill to the death, and never be content with anything but the restoration to the people of what is their right. The Welsh people have been far too patient, so patient that they have been looked upon as poor-spirited. I believe that if they had gone the right way about it, the way they have been taught by the Irish Members, they would have had the so-called National Church in Wales disestablished and disendowed a generation ago. Whatever Members may think, the fact is that the feeling in the Principality is becoming beyond endurance. The steam has got up so high that there may be an explosion any time, unless something is done to meet the discontent. Now, Sir, who will have to value the tithe? The Board of Agriculture is to have a great deal to do with it. What is the Board of Agriculture? It is represented in this House by a highly respected gentleman who professes to understand all about rural life, and who is a great authority on sport. But I presume the Board is composed of representatives of the land-owning interest, and I suppose they will see that the price at which tithe may be redeemed is brought down as low as possible. The Bishops are to have a voice in the matter; but I do not think they will avail against the worldly-minded astuteness of the members of the Board of Agriculture. The Board is a very dangerous Body indeed to deal with this national inheritance. Now, to whom is the inheritance to be made over? To the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Who are the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? They consist of two Archbishops, 31 Bishops, three Deans, and 21 laymen. The fact is, that the Commissioners are not a national Board, but simply trustees for a religious denomination. They are a Church Company Limited, and to this company Parliament is asked to make over the enormous capital that may be realised by the sale of tithes. Putting it at a very low estimate, tithes ought to realise a capital of between £60,000,000 and £70,000,000 sterling. It may be said that the transaction is too big to be effected, and that the probability is that the sales will never be carried out. Why bring in the Bill at all if that be so? I must assume that the Bill will be carried out. Just think of the difference between our condition and that of our children if we allow such a Bill as this to be carried out. We have a revenue of about £3,300,000 secured as a first charge on the national land. Our descendants, if this transaction is carried out, will possess some 60 millions in a very portable form, which can be easily carried off. Now, do not let me be misunderstood. Of course, I am insinuating nothing whatever against the perfect honour and high integrity of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but, after all, what is the duty of a denominational trustee? It is to do the best he can for his denomination, and in the event of disendowment if the Ecclesiastical Commissioners find themselves with 60 millions of Government and other securities in hand, they will, no doubt, feel it to be their duty as denominational trustees to do their best for the Anglican Church. Therefore, I strongly object to making over this property to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are entirely unfitted by their position to be entrusted with such a duty. I observe that the Farmers' Alliance, on March 10, passed a Resolution to the effect—

Mr. Pictou

"That no measure dealing with tithe will be satisfactory which does not demand that the redemption price be handed to the County Councils."

["Oh."] That shows that, in the opinion of the Farmers' Alliance, the County Council is certainly a more trustworthy and desirable Body to deal with the matter than the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It is said that the land of poor old England is worn out, and only fit for sport. Well, the fact is, the land of this country is no longer the poor man's farm, but the rich man's sporting ground, and until that is altered the land will never be worth more. But if this country has only 10 years of thorough-going Radical Government—not merely Liberal, but pure and unadulterated Radical Government—the value of the land here will be increased at the very least 50 per cent.; and while the tenants will be better off, the landlords may have reason to bless their stars they have had the Radicals in office; but the makeshift scheme before the House will only hinder such a blessed time, and retard the reform which is absolutely necessary. For these reasons, I move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Pictou.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

* (6.14.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid) :— In rising to address the House for the first time I desire to appeal for that indulgence which the House, in its generosity, always extends to new Members. I should not have ventured to address the House for the first time on a vexed and complicated question like this, except for one reason, and that is the intense interest my constituency, in common with all the other constituencies in Wales, take in the matter. I think it is very evident, from the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, that this Bill like the Bill of last Session, is brought forward simply and solely on account of something that has happened in Wales. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by saying that there was urgent necessity for an amendment of the law. I do not know where that necessity has arisen unless it be in the Principality. At the conclusion of his speech the right hon. Gentleman said he thought the Bill should pass, so as to put an end to a mistaken grievance and a dangerous agitation. From this again, it is very evident that the part of the country the Government have in view in proposing this measure is the Principality of Wales; and touching upon something that has fallen from the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton), if I may be allowed to speak on behalf of my Colleagues in the representation of Wales, I will say that it is our intention to do our utmost to defeat this Bill, both upon Second Reading, and also in Committee. I go further, and say that, as Welsh Members, we expect the English Liberals and Radicals to help us, and if we are not so assisted, Wales will have something to say about it. Of course, the Irish Members will assist us, I know. Now, the Welsh people take a very broad view of this matter. They regard tithe as national property, and, holding that view, they are naturally very dissatisfied with the narrowly conceived measure which is now before the House. We are supported in our contention by such an authority as the leader of the House, because in the recent debate on the Address the right hon. Gentleman said—

“The right hon. Gentleman (the Member for Mid Lothian) referred, in terms which I desire to re-echo, to the question of tithe.

He said that tithe ought to be respected and preserved as national property. I re-echo that sentiment, and it will be the effort of Her Majesty's Government to present a Bill to that effect.”

I do not know whether this measure appeals to the House as one which is going to preserve tithe as national property or not, but to us it does not so appeal. If it is national property, what does the measure do with regard to it? I have said it is narrowly conceived. I use the words advisedly, and I may say I was much amused in reading the debate on the Bill of last Session, to find observations made by a late Tory Member of this House, in which he compared the Bill then before the House to a little mouse. He added that the mouse was “a little animal deserving at the present time of very great care indeed, so that it might be brought to maturity”—I suppose this Bill is the maturity of the mouse of last Session—“so as to make it a useful animal not only in England but in Wales.” I admit that this Bill is a little more extended in its dimensions—it might be compared to a rat, but whether it is a rat or a mouse, it is equally objectionable. What does the Bill do? It merely touches the fringe of a very large question, and I think, with all deference to the President of the Board of Trade, it does reopen the settlement made in 1836, when the Tithe Commutation Act was passed. We hear a great deal about needy clergy, and about tithe owners having lost a large part of their property. We have not had the fact stated that since 1836, whereas the value of tithe has been below par for 22 years, it has been above par for 31 years. If the settlement is going to be opened at all it ought to be opened from the point of view of all the parties to the settlement. But this Bill is a Bill to help one party alone, and that party, of course, is the clergy of the Church of England. There is a little given to the landlord, but I think we are correct in saying broadly that the object of the Bill is to give relief to one class, and one class alone, and upon that ground it is a piece of class legislation, which this House ought not to pass. The measure is divisible into three parts. First, there is the remedy proposed for the recovery of tithe, and, again, we have the aid of the County Courts, though not in the same way as was suggested last year. The remedy given is not, as was proposed last year, by suing the tenant, but by making the owner liable, and enabling the County Court to appoint a receiver of the rents and profits of the land. The hon. Member for Leicester has pointed out that whereas the 1st clause in the Bill pretends to abolish the remedy by distress for the recovery of tithe rent-charge, other portions of the Bill heap distress upon distress. If the 3rd clause is passed in its present shape, it will not only be possible to distrain for the tithe, but for the costs, which may amount to 50, 60, or 70 per cent. Then the 6th clause of the Bill, as it stands, will also allow distress; therefore, the grievance as to distress is not done away with at all. There is another grievance which will be inflicted if the Bill passes, and that is that the receiver may also be made manager of the farm. [Cries of "No, no!"] I have read the Bill, and I think if hon. Gentlemen will read it they will say "Yes, yes." As to the remedy, I will merely add that in Wales we have heard a good deal about Church and State; it seems to me that if the Bill passes in its present form the phrase will be changed into Church and County Court. The second part of the Bill relates to the special rateable value. Under the Bill of last year, the tenant was to pay the tithe, and the tithe owner might more easily recover by suing him. There was to be no relief for the tenant. But this year, when the Government proposes to change the liability for tithe from the tenant to the landlord, the landlord is to have relief. As to the Assessment Committee, I hope that if the Bill gets into Committee the Government will be able to place the decision of the rateable value in the hands, not of the Assessment Committee (a body which does not command confidence, except that of the parsons and landlords), but in the hands of the County Councils. The third part of the Bill is that which deals with the redemption of tithe, and, so far as I can see, it does not commend itself to any portion of the community. We were told by the President of the Board of Trade that he did not propose to discuss the present appropriation of tithe. It is evident to the House already that the discussion has gone into that groove, and in that groove it will remain. But the Bill itself does have regard to the appropriation of tithe, because it says that if tithe rent charge is redeemed the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are to use the redemption value of the tithe for the permanent benefit of the benefice, that is, to establish for ever the present appropriation. It cannot be expected that the people of Wales, who are a nation of Nonconformists, are satisfied with the present application and appropriation of tithe. They might be more satisfied with it if, as in the olden days, a third of the tithe went towards the assistance of the poor. But from the days of that great spoliator—as he was called by the right hon. Baronet—Henry the Eighth, tithe has gone almost altogether into the Church channel. In Glamorganshire £40 a year only goes out of tithe to a charity instead of a third of the whole, as in the days gone by. Let me also draw attention to the fact that out of the County of Glamorgan, £3,000 a year is taken in tithes by the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. How can it be expected that the people of Wales, of poor little Wales, as the Principality is sometimes called, can be satisfied with such an appropriation of tithe by the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester Cathedral. I venture to hope that the Government, for their own sake, will do with this Bill as they did with their Tithe Bill last Session, that is, withdraw it. I am satisfied that it would be to the interest of the clergy themselves if the Bill were withdrawn. What ought to be done with tithes in Wales is to re-adjust them, and to nationalise them. We have heard of the grievances of farmers in England, but, strange to say, we find no relief in the Bill for them; the proposals are made in the interest of the starving clergy. Well, I hope the Church is not in such a degraded state as to allow its clergy to starve. I am afraid the Government take their views of Wales too much from the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General. An estimable man and an able administrator he no doubt is, but of Wales he knows next to nothing. I say it advisedly and without offence; more is required than a summer residence in the Principality to understand the views and aspirations of the Welsh people. If, after all, your clergy are starving what a commentary is that upon the conduct of Churchmen. They have had their churches built, and their parsonages and their rectories provided, and yet the rich people of Wales, landlords and merchants, allow their clergy to starve! Nonconformists have not only erected their own chapels but maintain their own ministers, and you hear nothing of their ministers being in distress. If the Government would only look the matter really in the face the decision to which they would come would be this: that the voluntary system which has succeeded in Wales in regard to Nonconformists, would also succeed in regard to the Church. We have no quarrel with the Church in Wales. We do not want to injure the Church; we want to get rid of the Establishment, not of the Church. If the adherents of the Church were to rely upon the voluntary system, and upon the liberality of its own supporters, I am sure we should hear the last of a starving Welsh clergy. I thank hon. Members for the attention with which they have listened to me on this my first time of addressing the House.

*(6.35.) MR. GEDGE (Stockport): I do not pretend to follow the hon. Member for Leicester through his very discursive speech, in which the whole civil and ecclesiastical history of the country was touched upon, more or less, but I feel indebted to him for putting at the close of his observations his objections to the Bill under four heads. To these I will endeavour to make a reply. The first great grievance is this: that the Government do not, as he says, face the real problem before them, that being, in his view, the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the National Church. The hon. Member who spoke last, and whom, though I am not an old Member of the House, I may congratulate upon the clearness and force of his first address, that hon. Member states, following the hon. Member for Leicester, that he has no wish to injure the Church; he only wishes to Disestablish it. Well, whether he would consider it an injury to himself to be deprived of his income, or even of his pocket-money, we can easily guess. For it is not a question of Disestablishment; they care very little for that, the real question is Disendowment, not Disestablishment. The hon. Member who wishes the Church disestablished would also have it disendowed, and that he calls doing it no injury! All I can say is that if any religious body can get on without any income, and finds no difficulty in raising funds to carry on its spiritual work that is a very fortunate body. I do not believe any body, especially such a body as the Church of England, which carries on its work so well—with some faults, no doubt—can, without great injury to its philanthropic and religious work, be deprived of the income which the piety of our fathers provided for some of our Ministers, for it is only a part who are thus paid, and the large majority are not at all well paid. It seems to me that when the hon. Member quotes Scripture to justify himself in the policy he recommends, I may remind him of another passage of Holy Writ where the refusal of tithe is called a robbery of God. If it was described as a robbery of God in God's own inspired language to take the tithe from the Church then, it is clearly a robbery of God now. If it was possible to rob God then it is possible to rob Him now. The hon. Member for Leicester is a believer in Scripture, as I am, and I ask him how does he show that what was robbery of God then is not robbery of God now? But, of course, we are not here to listen to lectures on behalf of the Liberation Society. We have had one, but I will not go into that matter. We are told the tithe is national property, and in some sense it is; it is Trust property, and, like other Trust property, and, indeed, like all property, it is in the power of the State to interfere if it is used in a manner detrimental to the State. Our lives and property belong to the State, in the sense that we may be deprived of either in the interest of the State. But I deny that tithe is national property except in one sense, except in the sense that every person may call himself a member of the Church. It is true any person in the country has a right to go into the Church, and to require the services of the Church ministers, and on these grounds it is perfectly fair that this national property should be devoted to the maintenance of the Church, because the whole nation is entitled to the services of the Church. Whatever may be going to happen at a future date, at all events at the present time the enormous majority of the people of England and Wales are in favour of maintaining the establishment and endowment of the National Church. When the majority is on the other side then you can do what you like, but even then I would submit to hon. Members that to disestablish and disendow a historic Church, which has existed for 1,600 years, and whose resources have been largely supplemented by contributions from its members within the last century—perhaps more was given to the Church in the last century than in all the preceding centuries—I say it is a very serious and a tremendous undertaking to disestablish and disendow such a Church. I do not remember the exact words, but I remember the force of an expression used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian not many years ago, when he stated that to separate Church and State would be tearing from the State its main part, leaving a scarcely recognisable mass. But we are not to come to the Disestablishment of the Church with a light heart upon the Second Reading of a Tithes Bill. Are hon. Members prepared to take up the position that nothing should be done to alleviate any grievance found in the actual working of things in the Church of England because they think it ought to be put an end to, or, at all events, ought to be disestablished and disendowed? Are they going to say that because they wish for a tremendous change, they will not deal with this grievance in relation to the collection of tithes? That is like the practice of the peace-at-any-price party, which refuses to go to war on any occasion whatever. I hope we shall not follow such a policy, but, as practical men, look at the existing state of things, find out where the shoes pinch, and, if we can, make them easier without regard to a tremendous change which may possibly come at some future time. The Bill, says the hon. Member for Leicester, does no good to the farmers. Well, many tenant farmers have very little to do with tithe payments at all, and they never have except by their own contracts, and where this is the case, the Bill leaves them pretty much in the same position as they are at present. But the existing law does interfere with farmers very prejudicially, and in a manner that has caused a great deal of the present trouble; and on this point it is the Bill proposes relief. The hon. Member says distress is professed to be taken away, but that it is not; it is made worse. But let us look at the matter. The tithe is supposed to issue from the land, and to be charged on the produce of the land. Every landlord, with a few exceptions, has bought or inherited his land subject to this charge, and, as a matter of convenience, landlords have frequently arranged with tenants to pay it, and instead of receiving a higher rent, including the rent-charge, the landlord receives a lower rent, leaving the tenant to pay the tithe rent-charge. And they have done this on this principle, that tithe goes up and down, in accordance with prices of commodities produced, and so when prices go up it is fair the tenant who produces them should pay rather more, and less again when prices are low. This arrangement has been found mutually convenient. But under the Act of 1836, though the land and its produce are ultimately liable, the tithe owner is not allowed to enforce payment from the landowner until he has first levied a distress on the crops of the tenant farmer, even though he pays a full rent and the landlord may have covenanted to pay the tithe rent-charge himself. Now, that grievance this Bill removes, and the tenant farmer will have a guarantee that his crops will not be distrained upon except he has himself brought himself under that obligation. Where is the hardship? If a man covenants with his landlord that he will make the payment, and if his rent is proportionately less, what hardship can there be? We are not living in Ireland; we are not under a Home Rule Parliament to upset all land agreements; we are living in England or Wales where the law requires all covenants shall be performed. I give it as the result of my legal experience that if a man has entered into a covenant, and has brought himself under liability, the simpler and speedier you make the process of recovery to compel payment the more merciful it is to him. You do not help the debtor by forcing the creditor to go a roundabout and costly process to compel payment, for the cost of this must ultimately fall upon the debtor; the truest kindness is to make the process of recovery sure, simple, speedy, and inexpensive. Therefore, to the extent to which the farmer owes this tithe rent-charge, to that extent it is a boon to him to have the means of recovery as easy as possible. Then there is an objection—it was not urged by the hon. Member for Leicester, but I have read it in a newspaper as an objection, the Bill affords no relief to the tithepayer or to the landlord. But why should there be a relief? If A owes to B and B has to pay, how can A or B get relief, except the one from the other? Both owner and payer, it is said, speak evil of the Bill, and how then can it find approval when it is cannonaded from both sides? But suppose the right hon. Gentlemen had brought in a Bill of which alone the landowner spoke well would not that Bill be open to still stronger condemnation from the tithepayer? The fact is, to use the old simile, you cannot get more than two pints out of a quart pot. If you have a tithe rent-charge payable to the person entitled to it, you cannot give relief except out of the pockets of the one or the other, unless the State intervenes with its credit, as has been proposed in the Irish Land Purchase Bill. Another complaint of the hon. Member for Leicester is that the value of this national property will be diminished by the new process of recovery, that the tithe rent-charge being national property, and put into a more portable form, may more easily be run away with. Let us bring this to a practical test. He was anxious to, what I should call, confiscate this national property, to take it away from those to whom it now belongs for certain purposes and give it to others. Which is easier, to confiscate it when put in a portable form under Trustees and under the control of Government, or when derived from land all over the country? The argument of the hon. Member reminds me of the Roman Emperor who wished that all his people had one neck that might be dealt with by one blow. Those who desire to confiscate should hail this Bill for bringing the property together in a portable form, that the hon. Member and his friends may, if they have the opportunity, walk away with it. He tells us the value will be depreciated because people will redeem the tithe rent-charge, when agriculture is depressed, and he indulges in a prophecy, which I am sure we shall be all grateful to have fulfilled, of an end to agricultural depression and a rise in the value of land of 50 per cent. True, the price we shall have to pay will be 10 years of Radical rule, and I dare say in the next quarter of a century he and his friends may have that period of power—I hope not longer—and if I live to see the result I shall be quite ready to congratulate them on management which has brought about higher rents for the landowners, better profits for the tenants, better wages for labourers, with corn remaining at a low price. But I venture to remind the hon. Member that except in cases where the commuted value of the tithe rent-charge does not exceed 20s. redemption can only take place by agreement between tithe owner and tithepayer, and is it consonant with reason, with even selfish reasons, that the tithe owner will consent to redeem at a period when values are low, and, even if, from personal motives, he does that, does the hon. Member suppose for a moment that the Bishops, whose intervention he scoffs at, are likely to consent to such a redemption? Until prices have risen to a normal condition it is not likely the tithe owner will consent to redeem, and I think the hon. Member need not fear for the national property being taken away because there is the advantage of it being more easily recovered. Better to recover £95 easily than £100 with great difficulty. The hon. Member's last objection is to increasing the power of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. But he should see, if he reads the Bill carefully, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have, in the sense he means, no power whatever. He objects to the devotion of the fund to Church purposes, but it is by law the Commissioners will be compelled to devote the funds to that purpose, and, whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or the County Council, as he would wish, act as Trustees, they would equally be compelled to comply with the conditions of the law, but as the Commissioners have the administration of other funds for like purposes it is but natural that they should include this duty as Trustees among others. As to the redemption to be paid for tithe in the possession of laymen, I see no such necessity, and I hope in Committee an Amendment may be introduced by which the Commissioners may not have the disposition of money with which they have nothing to do.

Mr. S. T. Evans

Mr. Gedye

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: They will not.

MR. GEDGE: I am glad to have that assurance. The hon. Member for Leicester is under an entire misconception as to the duties of the Receiver as to whom he expresses so much dread. He will be a Receiver for the landlord, not for the tenant, and the power to appoint a Receiver is found in every well-drawn mortgage, and, indeed, the recent Conveyancing Acts give the power without the clause. The Receiver will in no way interfere with the tenant's management of his farm; he takes the position of landlord and receives the rent from the tenant. There are defects in the Bill which I hope may be amended in Committee, as, for instance, the special assessment clause. By this clause if the rateable value of the land be less than the tithe rent-charge, then the tithe rent-charge is to be reduced to that rateable value, and that is a boon to which I am not sure the landlords are entitled. Under the Act of 1836 the landowner and tithe owner could, by agreement, exempt certain land in a parish from tithe rent-charge on condition that the charge should be transferred to other land in the same parish. Thus, supposing an owner has 1,000 acres, he could make 600 acres free, and transfer the whole charge to the remaining 400, providing that the latter was three times—not 10 times—the value of the tithe charge. Therefore, it does seem to me that on the principle that you cannot eat your cake and have it too, this special assessment clause confers on all landlords an advantage they cannot claim in such cases. But I very cordially support the Second Reading of the Bill, leaving what I consider defects to be dealt with in Committee.

*(7.0.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): As perhaps was inevitable from the course of events, the Bill undoubtedly, from our point of view, shows a certain advance on the measure introduced last year. The Government have been taught by the sad experience of last year to avoid certain pitfalls, and, no doubt, at first blush, it would seem there is a transfer of burden from tenant to landlord. The more closely the Bill is looked into, the less, I think, will it be liked. We find that the measure contains certain clauses relating to redemption. That, no doubt, is a very praiseworthy object; but when matters come to be closely examined, we discover the probability that these clauses, in the case of certain lands—in Berkshire for instance—would produce the result that the tithe might possibly be redeemed at three or four years' purchase, and then this property, in which, as the President of the Board of Trade once said the nation has a reversionary interest, would be largely frittered away. Another, and perhaps the most important proposal contained in the Bill, is that the payment of tithe shall in future be made by the landlord and not by the tenant. That was obviously the intention of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, and no doubt that is in itself a praiseworthy aim; but when one examines the method by which the tithe may be recovered under this Bill, it is seen at once that the tenant farmer is not in reality placed in a position of greater advantage than he previously occupied, because, instead of there being only one process by which the amount of the tithe can be recovered from him as now, he may be subjected to at least two processes. The first of these is that of distraint, which, under the Bill, will still be retained; the second is the new process instituted by this measure—a process of recovery through the mechanism of the County Court agency, by a Receiver who is also to be manager of the farm. The result of these proposals will be to make the tithe more valuable to the tithe owner by increasing the security, while it will at the same time make the tenant farmer's position more difficult. Take, for instance, the case of a tenant farmer who now pays his tithe in the shape of increased rent. Suppose that the landowner becomes suddenly insolvent after the tenant has paid his rent, but before he (the landowner) pays the tithe to the person who is entitled to receive it. What would be the result? After three months the process of recovery in the County Court will be resorted to; and as I understand the Bill, it is possible that the tenant may be compelled to pay the tithe twice over—after having once paid it in the form of increased rent, the Receiver appointed by the County Court might come down upon the produce of the land, and upon the stock of the farm and secure the tithe for the tithe owner——

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: Oh, no.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Well, I hope that this point will be made quite clear later on in the debate. All I can say is that, at the first blush, it seems to me that the Bill exposes the tenant to this serious loss. There is one point of view from which it has been suggested this measure may be likely to prove a gain to the tenant. When the tenant leaves a farm at the present time, he must, to some extent, leave behind him an amount of sunk capital, in spite of the Agricultural Holdings Act, and that amount of sunk capital acts as a lever in the hands of the landlord, by which he is able to extort certain terms from the tenant. Therefore, the transference of the payment of tithe from the tenant to the landowner appears in some slight degree—although possibly in an infinitesimal degree—to operate in favour of the tenant. Still, the burden of proof of this remains on the side of those who favour this measure. There is, however, a class which the Act is not likely to benefit. There are a considerable number of freeholders in Lincolnshire, Wiltshire, and other parts of the country, and how, I should like to know, will they be benefited by the provisions of the Bill? The measure increases the security of the owner, and it gives him additional methods of recovering tithe, but no benefit of any kind can accrue to the tithe-paying, land-owning, cultivator. That class is not so numerous as it ought to be, and as I should wish to see it; but still it is a very considerable class, and I must say that this measure will have the inevitable effect of placing additional difficulties in the way of increased proportion of the population of this country becoming land-owning cultivators. I do trust that if this Bill is read a second time these provisions will be carefully examined in the interests of the class to whom I am alluding, and that amendments in their favour will be introduced in Committee. There are other provisions contained in this Bill which will have to be closely scrutinised; for instance, those provisions which professed to give relief to the land in certain exceptional cases where the value of the tithe exceeds the rateable value. I do not see how the Act will benefit those cases in which the tithe comes up to the amount of the rent, or how, in other cases, it will prevent the tithe continuing to swallow up both rent and profits. It has been pointed out by one hon. Member for Wales that had it not been for the grievances in Wales this Bill would never have been brought forward. Though the grievance was very sore in Wales, this measure will not affect Wales most as far as the actual monetary value of the tithes is concerned. The evil is felt in this country to an even greater extent than in Wales. Let us take the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Kent. Those four counties, including the amount of tithe payable to clerical appropriators, parochial incumbents, and lay improPRIATORS, and to schools and colleges, between them pay one-fourth of the tithes of all England and Wales put together. In all England and Wales the tithes amount to about four millions. Those four counties pay a quarter—that is, about £993,000. That, of course, shows that the four counties named are very largely interested in the question. How will this measure affect them? There is one portion of the Redemption Clauses by which I think they will be very much affected in the long run, and that is the provision by which the sum of money obtained by redemption is to be handed over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. It is true the Commissioners are to be bound to pay the interest where the sum obtainable from the tithe is expended now, but what guarantee have we that sooner or later a move will not be made for expending that money obtained out of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Kent, in other places than those in which the money is expended now. Whether or not the tithe is national property, it seems to me that the money should not be expended in other parts of the country, but only within the limits where it is now raised. That is, I think, altogether in accordance with the requirements of justice and the needs of the case. If you hand over all the money obtained through the medium of redemption to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, you cease to have any guarantee whatever that that money will not be expended elsewhere.

Mr. F. S. Stevenson

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The price of redemption in each case must be placed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the separate account of the particular benefice to which it relates.

MR. STEVENSON: If I remember right the interest is to be paid for ever to the particular benefices upon which that money is now expended. I think, however, that most hon. Members will be of opinion that the words "for ever" in an Act of Parliament must be taken with a certain grain of salt. Those words "for ever" occurred in 1782, when the Act calling Grattan's Parliament into existence was passed. The words, however, did not mean more than 18 years. What guarantee is there that these words mean very much more in the present instance? There are many counties in which hardly any tithe is paid, and, consequently, very little expended. In the County of Westmoreland the tithe rent-charge of all kinds only amounts to £7,500 a year. It would be obviously unfair that money should be taken, as might ultimately be the case, from the four counties I have previously referred to, and expended in other parts of England. Other considerations have to be met before we can support in full a measure of this kind. It is very desirable to know why the Government have not been able to deal with that wider question of the Corn Averages. I failed to gather from the statement of the President of the Board of Trade any conclusive reason why the House is not to be called upon at the same time to deal with that portion of the question. Is this great question of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 to be opened up mainly in the interests of one of the parties to that settlement, namely, the tithe owner, and not in the interests of the tithepayer, when undoubtedly in certain portions of the country the tithepayer is rightly complaining of certain admitted grievances? A Select Committee of the House of Commons which sat upon the question of Corn Averages did not find any very conclusive reasons against adopting remedial legislation in the direction of improving the method by which these corn averages are arrived at. The grievances on this point are conclusive. There is, first of all the grievance which raises a great deal of interest amongst farmers. It is, that some 50 years ago they were in the habit of sending all their corn to market, and consequently the valuation was taken upon the whole of that corn, whereas now the worst description of corn is consumed on the farm, and it is only the better kind which is sent to market, so that it is upon the prices fetched by that better kind that the valuation is made. Would it not be possible to introduce some legislative device to deal with that portion of the question? Then, again, there is another question connected with the subject of the corn averages which excites more attention, though it is, perhaps, of less importance than the previous consideration. Corn is bought at small markets by middlemen, and then taken to larger markets and sold at a higher price; and it is upon the second rate that the valuation is taken. Then there is a third, and, perhaps, greater grievance than any other—the taking of a septennial valuation. I think it was urged before the Select Committee, and with a great deal of truth, that in 1887 the value of £100 of tithe rent-charge, calculated on the annual average, amounted to £70; whereas, calculated on the septennial average, it was £84. No doubt there are difficulties in the way of taking an annual average, but there are no difficulties in the way of taking a triennial average. If we are to re-open the settlement of 1836 at all in the interests of the tithe owner, we must, at the same time, re-open the question in such a way as to meet such requirements of the tithepayer as are in accordance with justice and the fitness of things. Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell were both of opinion that the settlement of 1836 was effected for the benefit of the agriculturalists in order to remove restrictions which had previously prevented the free and unfettered application of capital to the soil. Sir Robert Peel, when he introduced his Bill in 1835, said—

"The object of the measure is to put an end to the discouragement of agricultural improvement and to the demand for an increased tithe in proportion to the improvement of the land."

In the same year Lord John Russell, in answer to a deputation of his constituents, who petitioned that tithe should be commuted for a money payment equal to one-tenth of the rent, said that tithe was not one-tenth of the rent, but it was a tenth of the produce. He added that he considered tithes to be an institution of a barbarous age. These, then, were the views of the men responsible for the settlement of 1836; and those views, though perhaps they are to be taken generally in connection with the legislative proceedings of that time, also have a more permanent value, because they show distinctly that in the minds of those who were responsible for that settlement, it was regarded not so much as a final settlement, but rather as a temporary settlement with a view to the then existing state of agriculture. The amending measure of 1839 shows that at that time the Act was not regarded as altogether a final settlement. These, then, are some considerations with which we might expect to be confronted in a Bill of this kind, and yet the measure contains no provisions of that kind at all. I venture to submit that even from the point of view of tithes being a national property, there is no reason why, because the nation has an ultimate reversionary interest in tithes, grievances should not be remedied. I ventured to submit to this House last year the principle that at the present time it is really the community as a whole on whom the tithes fall as a burden, and for this reason: It cannot be said the tithes fell as a burden on the landlord, because the landlord has bought his land subject to that burden. They do not to any great extent fall upon the tenant, because if the tithes were abolished to-morrow, they would be a present to the landlord. They do not fall upon the labourer, because the labour market fluctuates according to the law of supply and demand. Therefore, as the tithe does not fall as a burden upon either of these three classes, it falls as a burden on the community at large; and if the tithe is to be abolished, it will be necessary to introduce a corresponding Land Tax in its place, and to impose it for the benefit of the nation. If we acknowledge that the burden falls upon the community and the nation has an ultimate reversionary interest in the matter, it strengthens the argument very considerably for granting to Parliament that power which, I believe, it now possesses of being able to deal with the tithe in such manner as it pleases either by decreasing or increasing it. In the present case, in consequence of the enormous fall in the value of agricultural produce, there is, undoubtedly, a case in favour of remission and not in favour of any increase. For my part, I have come to the conclusion that the amount of good which may be contained in the measure is very small indeed as compared with the amount of evil, and therefore if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester is pressed to a Division, I shall go into the Lobby with my hon. Friend. Of course, I do not mean to imply that I agree with all the hon. Member said; but I do adhere to the conclusion that the tithe is a burden on the community, and that the nation has an ultimate reversionary interest in it, and I submit that there is no reason why we should not deal with admitted grievances when those grievances are found to interfere with the economical resources of the country. Let the House bear in mind what occurred at the time of the French revolution. The tithes were abolished all of a sudden in France, and made a present to the landowners. In that country there is an enormous number of landowning cultivators. But the present was not a permanent one, because a few years later taxation was put on the land to a greater extent than the burden of tithe which previously existed. Does not this bear out my theory that the general community has an ultimate reversionary interest in tithe? I can only, in conclusion, again point out that this Bill does little or nothing for the benefit of the occupiers, and entirely fails to redress the grievances of landowning cultivators, yeomen farmers, and small landowners.

Mr. F. S. Stevenson

(7.28.) Mr. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I hope that the Bill will become law, as I regard it as an honest attempt to settle this vexed question upon a fair and rational basis. The whole object of the Bill is to throw the burden of paying the tithe upon the landowner, and to excuse the tenant from that burden altogether, and therefore it may well be called a Tenants' Relief Bill. At the present time, as hon. Gentlemen must know, a tenant invariably prefers to take his farm tithe free, and he makes his own terms with his landlord. I believe that the majority of new leases provide for the taking of the farms tithe free. The hon. Member for Leicester has suggested that the reduction of the assessment will prove a boon to the landlord; but surely he knows that the occupier invariably pays the rates, so that he will be the gainer by the reduction of the assessments. Stress has been laid on the proposal enabling the County Court Judge to appoint a manager of the farm in default of tithe payment; but this is, after all, merely a legal expression. The agent appointed will not manage the farm; he will only be the receiver of the rent under the process. The landowner has certain charges on his land which he is bound to pay; and whatever may be done between two people, one of whom receives and the other pays rent, you cannot benefit one without injuring the other. The hon. Member for Leicester would rather like to injure the landowner in some way; while the hon. Member who seconded the Amendment equally dislikes the Church. This Bill brings the two parties into direct communication by means of the Redemption Clause, and, I believe, with benefit to both. Now, the value of the tithes, roughly speaking, is £4,000,000 a year; and of this the parochial incumbents and clerical appropriators receive £3,000,000, while the remainder is devoted to colleges and schools and lay appropriators. I know that in Wales it is considered a very bad principle that the Church should receive anything at all. But we must remember that this property belongs to the Church, just as private property belongs to the individual. A good deal of friction between the incumbents and the parishioners will be done away with by this Bill. I know that the opponents of the Church dislike this, especially in Wales. In the South Wales Daily News, on August 15th, 1889, appeared the following:—

“ Plain speaking is best, and we may plainly say that tithe is a useful lever for upsetting the Establishment, and the people must keep hold of that lever.”

Therefore, it is quite apparent that in Wales the tithe is to be used as a lever for disestablishing the Church. It is said in the Bill that tithe of the value of 20s. is to be compulsorily redeemed. I should be very glad to see that increased to £5. I think there are a number of small freeholders on whom tithe is a burden they would be glad to get rid of, and I hope that this portion of the Bill will be extended to allotments. Where land is cut up into allotments, I think the tithe ought to be redeemed so that it may no longer be a burden. With regard to excess of tithe over rent and redemption, no doubt those two points are chiefly interesting to landowners. It may be a great grievance, but I think that there are very few cases in which the tithe exceeds the rateable value of the land. In future, wherever that happens, the excess is to be eliminated altogether. That is a strong point, and we must remember that the gross rent is not the rateable value of the land. The rateable value is from 10 to 12 per cent. below the gross rent. Therefore, it is a very considerable reduction in some cases. It is quite fair; and I believe that the tithe owners agree to it, and it certainly will be of immediate benefit to the tithepayer. It has been said, why not fix the redemption value? It has also been said that redemption cannot be carried out because it is an indefinite affair, and that it will be a difficult thing for the landlord and tenant to agree upon a certain price. But the difficulty in the way of a fixed redemption is that the rates vary so in different localities. In three adjoining parishes in Hampshire the rates are 2s., 3s., and 4s. 2d. in the £1 respectively, or 10, 15, and 21 per cent., so that the nett value of £100 of tithe rent-charge in those parishes would be £90, £85, and £79. It is manifestly impossible to fix any certain number of years' purchase which would be fair and equitable throughout the country. What I should like to see would be that when the tithe owner and tithepayer agree to redeem, the matter should be referred to the Board of Agriculture, or some other known valuers, to fix the price of the tithe redemption so that it could be carried out at once. If that were done, I think, in many cases redemption could be very easily carried out. With regard to reducing the septennial averages to triennial, I do not think the tithepayer would like to do that. I think they are in favour of the septennial average. Seven years ago the tithe was at £100; it is now £78; next year it will be about £75, at which I believe it will remain for some time. If corn went up in price suddenly next year and the following years, we should have higher tithes under a triennial system, but under this septennial average we must have it low for several years. Every £100 of tithe rent-charge is at present worth £78 under the septennial averages, and you must take off another £20 at least for rates, &c., before the tithe owner touches his money. In any redemption scheme all that would have to be calculated, and you would also have to consider the increased rates which would fall upon the landowner in lieu of the rates which were formerly paid by the tithe. It has been calculated, taking the whole of the agricultural land in England and Wales, that these increased rates would come to about 2d. in the £1. All this must be carefully considered, and, therefore, it is the more necessary when the two parties agree to redeem that the price should be fixed by some Body like the Board of Agriculture. I am sorry that the Government have not guaranteed the money for redemption at a lower rate. I think the case might have been met by means of a Government guarantee, such as that proposed for Ireland. By such a scheme, I think, both the tithe owner and the tithepayer would benefit, because the one would be eager to redeem and the other would be only too glad to get his money. If the interest were reduced from 4 per cent. to 3½ per cent., or something like that, it would be a great boon to the tithepayer. For myself, although I am only a poor landowner, an agriculturist I may say, I should be very sorry to be relieved of any of my burdens, or enriched in any way at the expense of the Church. I hope there are very few gentlemen in the whole of England who would be willing to enrich themselves, or seek relief from any of their burdens, at the cost of the Church. I do hope this Bill will be read a second time and become law, and so bring this question to a final settlement.

*(7.43.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): Sir, I think it must be clear after the very forcible maiden speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Glamorgan, that this Bill is in truth a Welsh Bill, though it has no support from Wales whatever. Wales is already beginning to speak about it. The County Councils of Wales are speaking. The County Council of my own county of Montgomeryshire passed this resolution:—
Mr. Jeffreys

“That this Council expresses its opinion that no Tithes Bill will be satisfactory to the Welsh people unless it takes into consideration in what manner all the Welsh tithe rent-charges now applied to ecclesiastical uses may be devoted, so as to benefit the whole nation. Further, that any measure having for its object merely an alteration in the mode of collecting the tithe rent-charge, or removing the responsibility for the payment of the tithe rent-charge from the tenant farmer to the landlord will only increase the objection which, in consequence of the present application of the tithe rent-charge, exists so strongly in Wales against its payment.”

And the County of Merionethshire passed this resolution—

“That this Council having learnt that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to deal with the tithe questions in the approaching Session of Parliament, urges upon the Government the necessity of introducing a Bill that will acknowledge the tithe as national property to be applied to national purposes only.”

I have no doubt that the County Councils by a large majority will take the trouble to express themselves to the same effect. Surely the fact that Wales is practically unanimous against this measure ought to be taken into consideration. We hear a great deal about the suffering produced and the oppression that is exercised in regard to this question, and I ask what better justification could we have for asking, for demanding the right to legislate for ourselves, and what other course is open to us than that which we now take when the Government proposes a measure like this, which is deliberately aimed at Wales, without taking the trouble to ascertain the feeling of the Welsh people with no attempt to conciliate public opinion on the subject. It is said, however, that we are naughty children and should be punished, and everybody regards this as a punitive measure. It is because we have misbehaved ourselves that the Bill has been brought in, but whatever movement there has been in Wales in relation to this question, has been absolutely and entirely spontaneous. It has sprung from the agricultural and peasant population of Wales. It has not been set on foot by writers on the press, or by popular representatives competing for popular fame, but it has sprung entirely from the agricultural population, who regard their present relation to the clergy as intolerable. The people of Wales refuse to pay for work that is not done. We all know that they do the work themselves in the noblest spirit, and in the most generous manner. They find their own spiritual advisers and ministers, and they object to pay for those who profess to do the work, and who do not perform it. It has been alleged that they have a pecuniary interest in this question, but it would be hard and unjust on the part of this House, or of the English people, to endorse any such accusation. The Welsh provide more amply for ministrations to their spiritual wants than any other people in the United Kingdom, and it is no mercenary motive which influences them. It is with them purely a question of principle—a question of right and morality, and the reason they are so unanimous against this measure is because they cannot consent to any Act of Parliament that will perpetuate a state of things amounting to the gravest injustice. I think the Government ought to have been more ready to take notice of the fact that in the matter of tithes our Welsh people were really more conservative than the English people. The distinction which may be drawn between England and Wales on this question is, that while Wales generally admitted the burden and is prepared to protect the property and to assist in carrying out any legislation for the purpose of that protection it nevertheless rejects the application. In England, however, this is not the case; England admits the application, but is, to some extent, beginning to reject the burden. Already, there are indications in this country, of which the Government ought to take note, that the burden of tithes on the English farmer is setting him at loggerheads with the parson in too many cases. This Bill is intended to flog, but it flogs the wrong man, and is likely to raise dissatisfaction through the entire regiment. We ask ourselves what are likely to be the consequences. We see plainly it is a measure of police, and I trust that Parliament will listen to the protest of Wales, whatever may be the view of Her Majesty's Government. I think the Welsh Members generally will agree in advising the Government that as a measure of police this Bill will certainly not make it easier to keep the peace in Wales. Doubtless, you alter the form of procedure, but you do not take away the objections to it; you render the process more punitive, but I am quite satisfied that those who have studied the question most intimately, and who desire to save Wales from the risk of any intemperate action on the part of the people, would be the first to assure the Government that in their honest belief this measure of police will not make it easier for them to keep the peace in Wales. As to its being a protection to property the measure will simply be the means, in a number of cases, of setting landlord and tenant by the ears. It will transfer the grievance from the parson to the landlord, and will help to create a land question in Wales. If the Government intend to render this measure a protection for property in tithes, they will make a re-adjustment and valuation of tithes absolutely necessary in England. As is said the measure is intended as a means of relief to the Welsh clergy. Well, Sir, I am sorry for the Welsh clergy; their lot is a miserable one. They are a peasant clergy, who are isolated and alone, and if anything is done that can add to their present hardships, it would be to me a matter of regret, but do you make it easier for them by this Bill, which will have the effect of rendering their present isolation more complete? It makes the clergyman absolutely dependent upon the squire, and renders his chance of recovering his hold on the people even less than it was before, if that be possible. If it is really the intention of the Government to hide this question from the public view, and prevent the external exhibition of the sentiment of the Welsh people in the matter, nothing could be more puerile. The tenant must know what he pays for tithes, the tithe will vary every year, and the tenant must certainly be possessed of the fact that he is paying the tithe, in whatever way he does pay it; therefore, to try and hide the matter must be a complete failure. But after all, the main object of this measure is to give a lingering life to the Church Establishment in Wales. On this question I would ask the Government whether they have ascertained the opinions of the Welsh Members, whether Conservative, Unionist, or Liberal, on this point. For my own part, I am quite certain that they would not advise the Government that this Bill will afford the slightest chance of extending the dwindling days of the Church Establishment in Wales. All it will do is this, it will do something towards involving the question of Church Establishment in England, and the Government ought to be aware that they are running this risk. For my part, I do not care whether it produces this effect or not, because I am a Liberationist at heart. I trust, however, that the Government of this House will face what is the real question in Wales. If they do this the solution will be easy enough. It is to relieve Wales of the Establishment. There is no desire in Wales to attack the Church itself, except as an Establishment. Welsh people are a religious people, and never attack religious institutions, and I know that they have an immense respect for the history and tradition of the British Church. They are in the position now of having had a great quarrel with it, and still desire a reconciliation. I think it is a most serious and unhappy error of judgment, through want of personal contact with and knowledge of the people, to suppose that the Church of Wales would be other than benefited by being relieved of Establishment. The whole object of this measure is simply to save a little time. I think the delusion is entertained by friends of the Establishment in England that if the Establishment in Wales only has a little longer lease of life it will recover its hold upon the people. Their policy of holding on I believe to be an immense mistake. I do not want to indulge in figures, for I think there is nothing that may be made more misleading, but so far as the material progress of the Establishment is concerned I would ask, has it gained of late more hold in the affections of the people? We see plainly that Wales is more in earnest in this matter every day; and any one who faces an election in the Principality knows perfectly well that it can have no other result than a demand for Disestablishment. What is the policy which has led to the introduction of the present Bill? It is more than the policy of gaining time. It is a challenge to the people of Wales. Does Parliament desire to assist the Establishment in Wales in the business of proselytising, by upholding the Church in an unfair position? If Wales cares for Disestablishment and for her own nationality, she cares still more for fair play and justice, and she will never abide the result of any contest where the fight is not fair. How can it be said to be a fair fight when the Church possesses all these revenues, which the Welsh people think she ought not to possess. It is clear that the least the Church can do is to enter the arena on the same footing as Nonconformity, and to rest like Nonconformity on her high and sacred calling and mission; and then, in a fair and honourable rivalry for the general good of the people, to take that result which her merits, her energies, and her zeal will give her. To pass an Act of Parliament in order to assist her in maintaining an unjust state of things will never help her in the eyes of Wales. In her own interests, as much as in the interests of justice, the Welsh are only doing their duty in resisting this Bill to the utmost of their ability. (8.5.)

Mr. Stuart Rendel

*(8.35.) VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire is always entitled to great respect in the House whenever he speaks of the affairs of Wales, and consequently his criticisms both as to the possible effects this measure will have, if passed, not only on the Church question in Wales, but also on the probability or otherwise of its succeeding in its avowed object, the protection of property and making the enforcement and collection of tithes more easy, his opinion of the success or failure of the Bill in that respect is worthy of consideration by the House. But when the hon. Member leaves Wales, where we allow his opinions are entitled to all respect, and enters into the field of prophecy, or the possible and contingent relations not only of the Church question in England but also the relations between landlords and tenants in England, then I think we are entitled to turn to him and say that on English questions our opinions are, at least, as worthy of consideration as his. I wish most emphatically to express my dissent from all he says as to the probable or possible effect of the Bill in regard to England. First, I will deal with that portion of the hon. Member's speech in which he, in sense, if not in actual words relied on the all-pervading fallacy that farmers in England have anything to do with the tithe question. It is true that, by a most unfortunate use of the Act of 1836, landlords have used farmers as the most convenient instruments for the payment of this debt, but it is also true that the farmer has only been an instrument, and has no further interest in the payment of the debt than the hon. Member would have if he paid sixpence for me at the neighbouring post office. Surely this consideration somewhat clears the ground, and surely, that being so, all question as to the Bill not effecting a relief of the farmer and doing the farmer no good, all this argument is beside the mark entirely. If it has any effect on the farmer at all the effect is favourable, for it will relieve him from the false position of being distrained upon for a debt he does not owe, and it may have another effect in the adjustment of the rent between himself and his landlord, when he will have the "pull of the market," and in bad times may be able to get a little abatement. But that is the whole extent to which this Bill can affect the farmer. It really seems unnecessary to go over this well-trodden ground again, but the fallacy on this point is so prevailing that it may be necessary to recapitulate. Does the farmer pay the tithe? Obviously he does not; for if he farms two adjoining pieces of land, and pays tithe on the one and not on the other, he pays an equivalent in rent in the latter case. Does the landlord pay the tithe? No, he does not. Here I come to a very ingenious theory of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Stevenson) but to which I must dissent, but at the same time allow me to point out that the speech entirely answered in advance that of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, who argued against the injustice of making the Welsh farmer pay tithe at all to the Church. The hon. Member for Eye proved conclusively that the farmer does not pay tithe at all, and the basis finally arrived at by the hon. Member was that the tithe is paid by the community. This is an extraordinary theory to have recourse to. The landlord does not pay the tithe, for if he inherited the land he paid the less succession duty than if there had been no tithe, and if he paid cash down he paid a sum much less than if there had been no tithe rent-charge. But does the fact that neither the landlord nor the tenant pays the tithe involve the vague and shadowy theory that the community pay it? Suppose the hon. Member for Eye had left me a fortune with a charge of £100 upon it for the National Gallery, can it be said that this is a charge on the community? No; the original donor pays it. The original donor of the tithe, long since defunct, pays the tithe; it is not paid by any living organism, landlord, tenant, or community. That brings me to the "conscience" argument. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire appealed to Members to believe that he and his friends in their advocacy of Welsh Disestablishment did so on the principle that they believed it would be for the best for their country and for the Church, and we should be ungenerous and unjust to deny them the credit of this, though we may be opposed to them, and they will equally give us credit for conscientious motives. This leads me to that argument so often used that Welsh farmers object to pay tithes to an alien Church. Now, I do not wish to raise this question of an alien Church, or of Disestablishment, but I do want to examine this particular plea, and I ask how can men object to pay that which is not, and never has been, their own? The money which the Welsh farmer, acting as the agent of the landlord, hands over to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or to the clergyman, is not his money or his landlords. It makes no difference in tracing the origin of the property; and the agency by which it is paid, it makes no difference in point of fact whether the money is paid to the Church, or whether, in the time of the millenium referred to by the hon. Member for Bradford, it is paid for the draining of your neighbour's field or mending local roads. In neither case does the landlord or the tenant pay the money; he merely hands over money that never has been his, and if he keeps it in his pocket he robs the person or Body to whom that money belongs. I can quite understand that Welsh farmers who have not had the opportunity of examining the very intricate question of the origin of tithe are conscientiously convinced that they are paying this money to the support of an alien Church. I do not quarrel with the Welsh farmer, for this his argument is based upon ignorance for which he probably is not responsible. Now members take exception to that remark; but if they are of opinion that children at a Board School, or even at any public school, are educated to understand the Tithe Question, I do not agree with them. It is an extremely elaborate question on which many well-educated men are ill-informed, and I therefore insinuate nothing against the intelligence of the Welsh farmer when I say he may be legitimately ignorant of the true nature of tithe. Therefore, in this debate we have two classes of objectors to meet—we have the objectors whose principles are embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Farquharson) and the class of objectors to whom the hon. Member for Eye gives some sanction when he said how hard it is that the yeoman or small landowner cultivating his land should have to pay tithe upon it in those years when agricultural distress and Free Trade have so reduced the value of corn. Well, it is a very hard thing that he should have to pay this and his other claims, such as taxes, for instance; but I do not see how the small landowners can be dissociated from landowners as a whole, and I maintain that whether the tithe is paid to the Church or to some Public Body, in neither case has the landowner any claim whatever to have this question re-opened for his benefit. I am glad to see there is one part of the question upon which hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway take the same stand with me, differing as we do on the Church question. What is the history of the Tithe Commutation Act that it is sought to re-open? The hon. Member for Eye says it ought to be re-opened in the interest of payers as well as owners? Why, it was a settlement which no doubt was largely brought about with a view to taking away hindrances to the development of agricultural science. Yet it was a settlement from which landowners have reaped enormous profit. I should like to read to the House the evidence of Sir James Caird, and I suppose we all admit his authority on matters of land value. Before Mr. Inderwick's Committee in 1881 Sir James Caird was asked—

Viscount Wolmer

“Do you adhere to what you said, that if the old rate of participation had continued in regard to tithe the income of the Church would have been £2,000,000 more than it has been, and that the whole of that difference has gone into the pockets of the landowners?”

Sir James Caird's answer is—

“So far as I know. I do not know where else the difference can have gone.”

Well, if that is the case, as I believe it is on what past principle can the advocates of the landowners ask that the question shall be re-opened in their interest? Surely they have done pretty well by the bargain. Therefore, the real question before us, whether we are Churchmen or whether we are Liberationists is how the value of the tithe can be properly maintained. Whether the Church is to be disendowed and the tithe used for the various purposes such have been referred to or not, it is quite clear that it is the interest of those who advocate either view that the tithe should be as large as possible. I do not think the members of the Liberation Society are likely to lend their votes to any Amendment having the effect of re-opening the question in the interests of the landowners. But, says the hon. Member for Eye, there are certain districts in Berkshire, in Lincolnshire, and elsewhere, where land has so deteriorated in value, that payment of tithe has become an impossibility, and where exceptional circumstances have prevailed exceptional measures must be taken or agriculture will be at a standstill. Now, I have no personal knowledge of such districts, and I view with a little suspicion any proposal to re-open this question in however small a district, for it is obvious that the first person to derive benefit will be the landowner; but if an argument can be made in favour of any scheduled district, no doubt the House would be ready to listen to such an argument if properly supported by facts. But, upon the general ground of re-opening this question, I must protest against the claim of the tithepayer to re-valuation. It being alike the interest of Churchmen and Liberationists to see that payment of tithe is made secure, and that tithe should be made as stable as possible it is difficult for me to appreciate the attitude of hon. Members who oppose the Second Reading of this Bill. I can understand their special technical objections levelled at the Redemption Clauses, but I do not understand such opposition levelled at the earlier portion of the Bill which has no other object in view whatever except rendering the collection of tithe more secure. What was the argument running through the speech of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire? He appealed to us, and he will do me the justice to allow that I give him full credit for the conscientiousness of his appeal, upon the principle by which he is actuated. But granted that he is actuated by principle only, how does the question of the collection of tithe at all affect the subject? If he is actuated by a principle quite extraneous to all outside considerations, as I believe it is, how can it affect the advancement of that principle so dear to our opponents, that tithe should be collected by the County Court and not by means of distraint? There is a section of Liberationists in Wales who openly avow other motives, but I do not believe the hon. Member gives them sympathy or aid. We have heard read to-day an extract from the South Wales Daily News, in which it is openly stated, "We must keep this open as a lever for the Disestablishment of the Church." I appeal to hon. Members who are above such motives as that, whose views on the question are dictated by a sense of what they consider right, and not as a means of keeping open a sore for political ends; I appeal to them to regard this Bill from the point of view whether it will bring about a greater amount of kindness and peace to the country; whether it will help to explain to the tenant that tithe is but a debt due from the land, and will put an end to scenes of ill-blood and disorder, which have brought discredit on the fair fame of Wales. If the Bill is approached in this spirit, and not in a hostile spirit such as finds expression in the sentiments of the South Wales Daily News, I feel confident that although details of the Bill may be open to criticism, and they may do good service by suggesting amendments, that hon. Members will support the principle of the Bill and unite with us in bringing about a better application of a law, which they hope some day to turn to their own advantage.

MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): The noble Lord (Viscount Wolmer) has asked what will bring peace to Wales. Disestablishment will bring peace to the Principality—nothing else and nothing short of it. I thank the Government for bringing in a series of Tithe Bills, for I am bound to say that by their action they have done more to advance the cause of Disestablishment than all the efforts of Liberationists put together. I regret, however, that the Government have put on the landlord the duty of collecting tithe. In Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire, those counties in Wales about which I know most, the most cordial relations exist between landlord and tenant; but if the landlords have to collect the tithe, I certainly have fear as to the future. I should have thought the Government would have taken to heart the lesson they were taught last year. They must not suppose that all those who voted for the Amendment to last year's Bill were at one with that Amendment. As a matter of fact, they were not, and many of them only voted for it because it was the only means they had of expressing their opposition to the measure. It is said that the Welsh tenant farmer objects to pay tithe. He does not, any more than he objects to pay any other just debt. What he objects to is that the tithe should go to a small Church, to the Church of the landlord, the Church of the wealthy people, the Church of about one-sixth of the people. I do not know whether the majority of the people of England object to the Establishment or not, but my mind is quite made up on that point as regards Wales. Of 34 Members returned by Wales, 28 were returned to advocate Disestablishment. As to the provisions of the Bill, I cannot find much fault; my objection is to the application of the tithe. It has been said by some Gentlemen that tithe is required in order to ensure the success of the Church of England, and last year the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. B. Reed) asserted that the Church of England has succeeded not only in the English-speaking districts of Wales, but in the Welsh-speaking districts. I rejoice if the Church of England has succeeded, but I think the hon. Member will agree with me that the Church has succeeded nowhere in Wales more than in Cardiff. In that town the Church of England has 18 places of worship and sitting accommodation for something over 10,000 persons. But to carry on her great work there how much does the Church receive by way of tithe? Not a larger sum than £350 a year. As a matter of fact, the Church of England succeeds most in Wales in the very place where she receives least tithe. I do not deny that in the ranks of the Church there are many very popular men. For instance, there is no more popular man in Cardiff or Glamorganshire than the Dean of Llandaff. But the question of Disestablishment in Wales is the burning question. The people may be divided on other questions, but as to Disestablishment they are at one. The Government may legislate as much as they like in regard to tithe; but until they bring in a great and comprehensive measure for the Disestablishment of the Church of England, there will be no peace in the Principality.

*MR. HEATH (Lincoln, Louth): I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill because I think the Government have dealt very ably with this thorny question of the tithe. The measure contains three principles which seem to me to be well worthy of support, namely, making tithe apply like any other debt; putting the actual burden of the tithe upon the proper shoulders—those of the landowner—and facilitating the redemption. At the same time, I think the Bill has some defects, and I hope we shall see it amended before it becomes law. One defect is, that it gives a great deal more to the tithe owner than to the tithepayer. We have heard a great deal to-day about the landowners; but this question does not affect the landowners or large farmers at all. In the case of the large farmers, the tithe is reckoned in the rent. But there is a very large class of small freeholders in this country—in the division I represent there are 2,000 of them—and it is on them the burden of the tithe falls. I hope some Amendment will be carried which will give some quid pro quo under this Bill to these small freeholders. When the Tithe Commutation Act was passed, the tithe owners took the remedy of distress, because at that time that remedy was probably the cheapest and readiest to adopt. Now, owing to circumstances, the remedy of distress is no longer so easy as other remedies. These small freeholders, under present circumstances, have certain advantages. It is not worth while, for the purpose of getting a small payment, to incur the odium and cost of distress, and, in many instances during the hard times of the last few years, the small men have got reductions and time, which they would probably not have got if this Bill had been in force. I hope the Government will see their way to giving them some compensation for the loss of this advantage—something in the nature of the 5 per cent. proposed when the original Bill was introduced. That would make the measure much sweeter to them if this were done. I hope, also, we may see another Amendment carried. We are going to advance 33 millions of money to the Irish farmer to allow him to redeem his rent, and I hope the small English freeholder, whose desert and whose need are quite as great as those of the Irish tenant, may have the same advantage as you are going to give the Irish tenant. I trust we shall enable the small freeholder to redeem his tithe by means of a small annuity extending over 49 years at 4 per cent. In my opinion, this Bill will settle a great question which has been troubling us for many years; will remove what has been for a long time a great stumbling block in the way of the English Church; and, with the Amendments I suggest, will be received by the tithe owner as well as the tithepayer as a great boon.

Mr. A. Thomas

*(9.20.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorganshire, S.): The right hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading said that in the settlement of 1836 the principle was laid down that there should be no personal liability. If the House will allow me for a moment to turn back to the proposals of the Government on this question during the last few years, they will find that this is, at all events, a new discovery on the part of Ministers. In 1887, for reasons with which I need not now trouble the House, a great deal of dissatisfaction had arisen with reference to the incidence of the tithe rent-charge. The clergy could not get their tithes, and the farmers said that they could not, or would not, pay them. The Prime Minister introduced a Bill in the House of Lords, in which he proposed to abolish distress and to turn the tithe rent-charge into a civil contract due from the landlord. He also proposed to bribe the landlord with 5 per cent. commission in order to induce him to become the collector of the tithe. The provision gave rise to a storm of opposition on the part of the clergy, and the proposal to pay 5 per cent. was rejected or withdrawn. In an essay which appeared in the Quarterly Review, and which was attributed to Lord Salisbury and his nephew, there was a very hostile criticism on the attitude of the Whigs at the time of the publication of the Unauthorised Programme. One epigram used in that essay has remained in my memory. The writer said, "The Whigs regarded the Unauthorised Programme with public approval and private imprecation." A similar attitude was adopted by the landlords when it was proposed that they should become liable for the tithe as a simple contract debt to be recovered in the County Court. Another Bill was brought in in the Session of 1888. That measure proposed to abolish distress and adopted substantially the same method as we find in the present Bill. It gave great dissatisfaction. The whole of the landlord party throughout the Kingdom evidently regarded it with jealousy, suspicion, and dislike, and it was dropped. In 1889 it became necessary that something should be done in a substantial way. The Welsh people struck against the payment of tithe. The Bill of 1889 abolished distress, and it also proposed to put the payment of tithe on the tenant. The Government now come back to the method of 1880. They propose to avoid the Scylla and Charybdis of personal liability of both tenant and landlord; but, at the same time, to impose grievous penalties very often upon both. Though the order of the County Court Judge can only be enforced nominally against the landlord there is only an apparent withdrawal of liability. It seems to me there is a very close family resemblance between the provisions of the Bill and the eviction process adopted in the case of the Irish tenants. The difficulty arises when the landlord has paid the tithe and has put it on the rent. My hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire has pointed out in reference to this Bill that 28 out of the 30 Members for Wales are opposed to it, and that those 28 Members represent an enormous majority of the Welsh farmers. But I contend that it does not stop there. I wish to submit that they also represent the land-owning classes throughout Wales. I find in the Times of December, 1889, a very curious report of a great meeting at Rhyl. The Times' report says of this meeting that the most diverse opinions were entertained on all the subjects brought forward with the exception of one, and that was that there was a perfect unanimity of feeling to the effect that the Tithe Bill which laid the burden of paying the tithe on the Welsh landowner was impracticable. Mr. Humphreys, a Welsh landlord, is reported to have said that the Government proposal simply transferred the onus of the payment of tithe from the tenant to the landlord, and that all it meant was that the estrangement which had existed between the clergy and the farmers would in future exist between the landlords and the clergy. Another Welsh landlord, Mr. Priestley, in his speech, gave utterance to similar opinions, and added that he "had no doubt that tithes must go sooner or later, and the Church, and all of them would be the stronger for it. The Conservative Party and the Government ought to be warned that the great majority of the people in Wales looked upon these proposals (the Government tithe proposals) as absolutely inadequate." Well, the result of this meeting was, of course, an immediate outcry on the part of the Welsh clergy, some of whom wrote to the Times complaining of the attitude and demeanour of the landlords towards the Church. One letter which appeared in the Times asked "what the landlords had done to help the Church and to increase its popularity," and the leading article which appeared in the same issue said the answer to that question must perforce be "very little." The article also went on to speak of the falling out which had taken place between the clergy and the landlords of Wales as "a very unlovely quarrel." Now, that was a state of things which arose in Wales when these proposals of the Government were first made public. It was felt that the result of adopting them in Wales would be to transfer the friction which exists with the clergy from the tenant to the landlord class, and it was held that nothing could be more undesirable. This Bill, as has been well said, is nothing more nor less than a Bill of "pains and penalties," by which a most invidious duty is cast upon the land-owning class—a duty which must cause a great deal of ill-feeling and difficulty between the landlords and the clergy. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade made an observation about the lawlessness of the refusal to pay a just debt; and I think his observation was directed mainly against my Colleagues and myself in this House, seeing that we represent the great body of the Welsh people. I think it is most unfortunate that, in discussing a Bill of this kind, such a tone and temper should be adopted by a Minister of the Crown. I, for my part, do not for one moment refuse to accept responsibility for what has taken place in Wales. It is perfectly clear that this Bill is the outcome of the Welsh agitation, and it behoves the House and the Government now to face the whole matter. The late Dean of Bangor, the brother of the Bishop of St. Asaph, himself admitted that "five-sixths of the Welsh-speaking people are outside the Established Church in Wales." Archdeacon Howell also, in a remarkable sermon, declared that "The majority of the Welsh people are not to be found within the pale of the Church whose adherents were largely made up of English settlers and anglicised Welshmen."

Now, Archdeacon Howell is himself a Welshman; he was born within a mile or two of my native place; he was brought up among the Welsh people; he is an eloquent Church clergyman; and here we have from him a distinct admission that almost the whole of the Welsh-speaking people are outside the pale of the Established Church. Now, who are the people who have set on foot the agitation which has led to the introduction of this Bill? They are the Welsh Congregationalists and Baptists, and members of other denominations. These people have built their own places of worship out of their scanty earnings—the colliers, the peasants, the agricultural labourers, the small farmers, the small shopkeepers, have been for centuries building up the whole structure of that great religious faith which is so vital throughout Wales. For generations they have been doing these things; and yet, during the whole of that time, £280,000 a year has been withdrawn from the produce of the soil, in the shape of tithe, in order to pay the clergy who minister to only a small minority of the population, a minority which consists mainly of English born people. Up till 1868 they had to submit quietly to this state of things, because they had no adequate representation in this House; but in 1884 they began to give utterance to their views, and, having had the franchise extended to them, they were able to state their opinions on this and many other matters of great interest to their country. In regard to the agitation in Wales on the tithe question, I wish to point out that they have not violently resisted the operation of the law, except in a few cases where they have been irritated by injudicious treatment. In the majority of cases they have adapted the system pursued by the Quakers in reference to the church rates. They simply said, "Here is public money which you apply to purposes contrary to our principles. We will not resist you, but we will not pay these tithes until you put in operation the methods which the law affords you for executing process against us." For my part, I do not want to see any change in the attitude of the Welsh people, and I hope that they will continue determined to oppose this payment towards the maintenance of an alien Church. I trust they will maintain that attitude until the tithes which are collected are applied to national and public purposes.

Mr. Arthur Williams

*(9.45.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I should not have taken part in the debate at this stage had it not been for the somewhat pointed references made to myself by the hon. Member for East Glamorganshire. I noted with some satisfaction that the observations which it was my privilege to make in this House when the subject of the Church in Wales was debated last year fell upon an interested hearer in the person of the hon. Member. Sir, the personnel of this debate, so far as it has proceeded, is a sufficient index of the premises of this measure. It is a fact that, so far as the opposition to the Bill is concerned, it has been mainly expressed by Welsh Representatives; and I am perfectly willing to admit that it was the fact of the peculiar difficulty in Wales in connection with the collection of tithe-rent charge which gave rise to the necessity for legislation in this respect. I am not by any means desirous of limiting, nor, indeed, does the Bill propose to limit, this reform in legislation.

to the Principality of Wales. On the contrary, I hold that the tithe owner and the tithe-payer all over the country will be benefited by the provisions of this Bill, which is shortly to become law. I think the tithe owner and the tithe-payer will find their relations in regard to this peculiar form of rent-charge more harmonious and more convenient than they have been in the past. I have been very much puzzled to understand in the course of this debate the attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I have been accustomed for a number of years to hear, not only in the House of Commons, but also in the country, declamations from hon. Gentlemen opposite and their associates against the payment of tithe as a State tax; and I have been accustomed to hear these Gentlemen urge public audiences to agitate for the abolition of tithe, not on the ground of its wrong application, but on the ground that there is a bad principle involved in the tithe itself.

MR. PICTON: Name. No, no.

*MR. BYRON REED: In spite of the contradiction of hon. Gentlemen opposite, I say, from my personal knowledge of the facts, that that has been the vein in which the tithe controversy has been carried on; and I am speaking in the recollection of the House when I say that objection has been made to the payment of the tithe itself, and not to the application of the tithe. But now, Sir, we hear that tithe is a most excellent charge, and one most proper to be paid, and one which should be cheerfully met, if only its application were fair, and that the real objection to this Tithe Bill is not in the fact that the tithe payment is to be enforced, but it is to the religious purposes to which some of the tithe payments are applied. I am not in the councils of the Liberation Society; but I believe hon. Members opposite, who are members of that Organisation, claim that tithe is national property, and, being national property, that it ought not to be handed over to a religious body—it ought not to be diminished by one jot or tittle in bulk or volume; so that by-and-bye, when a future Parliament comes to deal with the question of Disestablishment, the tithe will be more easily available for secular purposes by reason of the operation of the provisions of this Act. I am not, Sir, now attempting to draw aside the veil of the future. I merely mention this matter by way of expressing surprise, and of taking public note of that extraordinary metamorphosis in the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, which has been exhibited in the course of this debate. I heard with some interest the speech of the hon. Member for Leicester, and I have to thank the hon. Gentleman for a most important and valuable admission which he made. The hon. Gentleman, speaking in reference to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, said that the Commissioners were not a national body, but were trustees for a religious denomination. I do not understand him to dispute the accuracy of my quotation. Then, what becomes of the claim of hon. Members opposite to the property which these Commissioners hold in trust? What becomes of their claim to this as national property? If the Commissioners are trustees for a religious denomination, then surely the application of the property held in trust must be to that religious denomination. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Leicester for giving me a weapon to be used in the controversy outside this House. There is another observation of the hon. Gentleman which merits further notice. He has thrown a curious side-light on the motives and aims of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He said that tithes are a first charge on the national land. I do not know what he meant to imply by that expression, and whether he meant to suggest that he is a disciple of Mr. Henry George, and that this House may look forward to a debate at no distant period when the hon. Member will propose a Resolution in favour of the nationalisation of the land, which, being interpreted, means taking away other people's property. But the observation, coming from him, struck me as being peculiarly significant, being associated, as it was, with the desire to deprive the National Church and other tithe owners of their property in this form of rent-charge. I commend the observation to landed proprietors on the Opposition Benches, who are, on other subjects, often found associated with the hon. Member for Leicester. It is a matter which may give them some concern. And now I pass to the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glamorganshire, to whom I must say I listened with considerable pleasure, and in whom I recognised a decided acquisition to the debating strength of this House. The hon. Gentleman quoted some remarks made by the First Lord of the Treasury not long since upon this subject, and he suggested that the right hon. Gentleman admitted that tithes were national property. It may not be within the knowledge of the hon. Member that the First Lord of the Treasury, having had his attention drawn by the Member for Stockport to the language which he had used, two days later explained to the House the precise meaning which he attached to the term National, and that he thereby considerably modified the impression which his previous words had conveyed. No doubt that explanation escaped the hon. Gentleman's notice.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: No: it had not escaped my notice; I happened to have the explanation in my hands when I was speaking, and had any remarks fallen from the First Lord of the Treasury I was quite willing to refer to that explanation. I rather think, as a matter of fact, that the right hon. Gentleman adhered to his statement that tithes were national property, although he qualified his statement by saying that he did not agree with our proposals regarding the application of them.

*MR. REED: I will not further contest the point. I am speaking in the knowledge of the House, and I believe that hon. Members on both sides will agree that the First Lord of the Treasury qualified his original statement in a very marked degree. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Welsh, as a nation of Nonconformists, were not satisfied with this appropriation of national property. I venture to point out that it matters not to the House whether the Welsh are a nation of Nonconformists or anything else, or whether they regard tithes as national property or otherwise. I regard the payment of tithe as a duty which every honest man who contracts it ought to pay. Let it be remembered that tithe is not a charge forced upon a man against his will. No man need contract to pay tithe unless he likes to, and if he does undertake the obligation he receives a full consideration for it. If he becomes a tenant of a farm upon which tithe is payable, he gets the holding at a lower rent than he would have to pay for a tithe-free farm; and if he purchases land liable to tithe he gets it at a proportionately lower price than is charged for land on which there is no such liability; and I say it is the essence of the grossest dishonesty for a man who has made a bargain under these conditions to come to this House with a grievance on his lips and ask for relief from a contract to which he became a party with his eyes open. I am sorry to be hard on the hon. Member; but I should like to correct him as to a matter of history. Reference has been made by the hon. Gentleman to the tripartite division of tithe, and I am aware that it is said by some controversialists that in the old days tithe was divided into three parts; one third for the maintenance of the fabric, one third for the support of the minister, and one third for the relief of the poor. The hon. Member apparently adopted that view, for he has referred to the third part as that belonging to the poor. May I point out to him that it must be in the knowledge of almost every scholar and every antiquarian that that tripartite division was never the law of the land in Britain? It was the law in certain countries on the Continent; but it was never the law here, and at the most it was only a recommendation—an expression of an amiable hope to the Bishops of the Church, more than 1,000 years ago, that some of the tithe should be thus devoted to the poor. I believe the highest authority to whom I could refer the hon. Member is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who, I think, will confirm my view that a tripartite division was not a part of the law of this land. Now, I pass on to the concluding observations of the hon. Member. He spoke in tones of complaint of the effect of the tithe on a certain parish in Glamorganshire. The hon. Member stated that the County of Glamorgan paid £40 a year to the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester.

Mr. Byron Reed

*MR. S. T. EVANS: What I said was that £3,000 per annum went from Glamorgan to the Dean and Chapter, and that there was only one solitary sum of £40 that went to charitable objects.

*MR. BYRON REED: I apologise to the hon. Member for having confused his statement, and of course I at once accept his explanation. The point is, as I understand it, that the poor country of Wales has to contribute large sums of money in tithe payments for ecclesiastical purposes to a rich country like England. But even if that is so, Wales receives much more from England in return. I have here a Return dated 12th April, 1889, showing that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners received from Wales £28,796 per annum—a very formidable sum, I have no doubt the hon. Member for Glamorgan will say. But, on the other hand, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have paid back for ecclesiastical purposes in Wales the sum of £67,634, showing a balance given for ecclesiastical purposes by England to Wales of £38,838. This Bill has been described as a “Clergy Relief Bill.” I am not ashamed to accept that designation. But I would prefer to call it the “Clergy Protection Bill.” It is something more, because it protects the lay as well as the clerical tithe owners and not only that, but it protects the Nonconformist ministerial tithe owners; and that there are such may, perhaps, be in the way of information to some hon. Members. I am not ashamed to defend the temporalities of the clergy, who have no direct representation in this House. The clergy, at any rate, have a good claim as citizens for the preservation of their temporalities. By reason of their office, by the necessity of their environments, by the fact that most of them are poor and isolated, the clergy have a peculiar claim to our consideration. When I think of their heroic examples, their kindly and boundless charities, their exalted personal character, and their high education and learning, I feel impelled, as a layman of the National Church, to stand up and defend the temporalities and rights of the clergy in this honourable House. It is because I believe that the present measure will, in a great degree, bring that about, that I wish most cordially to support and aid by all the means in my power its speedy passage into law.

(10.7.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Mr. Speaker, the clergy of the Church of England have hardly any right to complain that they are not well represented here, at all events as long as they are represented by the hon. Member who has just sat down. At the outset, Sir, I must deny that the farmers of Wales seek to escape the payment of tithe. They have objected all along, not to the payment, but to the application of the money. Now, this is essentially a Welsh Bill, and admittedly nothing would have been heard of it if it had not been for the agitation in Wales. The name of the Postmaster General is on the back of the Bill, and he is a sort of standing counsel to the Government in Welsh matters. But on this matter I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman represents the opinions of the University of Cambridge rather than those of Wales. Having just come from the Principality, I can assure the Postmaster General, with some confidence, that the Bill is generally, if not universally, condemned. It is not liked by landlords, tenant-farmers, County Councillors, or Nonconformists; and I much doubt whether the clergy would like it if they were not just now bound to be thankful for small mercies. It is looked upon as an attempt to do that which nothing short of a miracle will do, namely, to set the Church of England in Wales on its legs again. The Welsh landlords and tenants regard it as a Bill to set them at loggerheads for the benefit of the Welsh parsons. I think, however, we ought to be grateful to them for it, for in the Carnarvon boroughs, when this Bill was introduced, it created such a scare that the Conservatives found the greatest difficulty in obtaining a candidate, and, like the people in the parable, they had almost to go into the highways and hedges to compel someone to come in. The Government in bringing forward the Bill at the present time has not exactly shown the wisdom of the serpent. The position of the opponents of the Bill is perfectly well defined. They do not object to the incidence of the tithe; what they object to is its application. They claim as their authority the First Lord of the Treasury, who described tithes as national property. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last stated perfectly truly that the right hon. Gentleman qualified that statement by saying that the tithes are national property, because the property of a national Church; but that is true only in a limited sense; and it is not true of Wales, where only three out of 30 Welsh Members can be rallied to vote against the disestablishment of the Church. The right hon. Gentleman drew a picture of the sufferings of the Welsh clergy. No one sympathises more than I do with the sufferings of the Welsh clergy; but do not those sufferings show that they have lost the affections of their flocks? Are ministers allowed to starve by the Baptists or Congregationalists of Wales, the Wesleyans of Cornwall, the Unitarians of Birmingham, or the Roman Catholics of Ireland? A clergyman of the Church of England, the Rev. H. W. Clarke, has recently published a pamphlet on The Past and Present Revenues of the Church of England in Wales. The figures are taken from official sources, and it is there shown that in the three dioceses of Bangor, St. Asaph, and Llandaff the tithe rent-charge payable to incumbents amount to £101,856, while the pew rents, fees and offerings for the maintenance of the incumbents in 748 Episcopal churches amount to £4,738, or £7 a year from each congregation, consisting of the richest classes of Wales. For every pound each clergyman derives from the tithe rent-charge he obtains from his own congregation the sum of 10½d. The Bill begins at the wrong end. Let the tithes be applied to national purposes, and it will be found that the collection of them in Wales will be as easy a matter as the collection of Poor rates and School Board rates. That seems also to be the opinion of English farmers, for at a meeting of the Farmers' Alliance a Resolution has been passed declaring that—

“No measure will be satisfactory which does not demand that the redemption price be handed to the County Councils, or which makes any alteration in the mode of recovery.”

But then it is argued that, as this Bill deals simply with the mode of collecting the tithes, we, to whom the collection is comparatively a matter of indifference, have no right to oppose it. I cannot accept that view of the case. We who oppose this Bill believe that a State Church is an evil in itself, and we absolutely decline to be parties to any measure which has for its object the securing in perpetuity of the revenues of the Church. No doubt it is unfortunate for any Church to be unable to collect its revenues without coming to the House of Commons for aid. But that is the fault of the system, not the fault of those who oppose the Bill, and they cannot be blamed for taking the opportunity to raise such a debate as this. The Bill has met with strenuous opposition from all interests; but with regard to Wales, the strongest opposition seems to have come from the habitual supporters of the Government. A Conservative meeting at Rhyl was held three or four months ago, preceded by a conference of Conservative landowners. The meeting was held to consider the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill of last Session, practically the same measure as that before the House, and the First Lord of the Admiralty spoke. Here is a paper with a report of his speech, surmounted by a portrait of the noble Lord, which hardly does him justice. But though the meeting was called to bless the Bill, it reversed the part of Balaam, for it ended in cursing it altogether. Every one of the papers interested in agriculture, too, oppose the Bill, root and branch, and as was stated by a speaker at the Rhyl meeting in Wales, Conservatives and Liberals are united, not in an objection to pay tithes, but in an objection to pay them to the present recipients. The Bill is divided into three parts. The first deals with the means of recovering the tithe rent-charge, substituting an action in the County Court for distress. The second transfers the liability of the rent-charge from the occupier to the owner; and the third part contains the redemption clauses. I do not think these latter clauses will be of much use, because the tithe owner will not desire to redeem, in view of the lower interest which he will receive, and the tithepayer will not in many cases be able to do so. In Wales there is the very strongest objection to the substitution of the County Court for distress. The Welsh farmer hates nothing so much as the County Court, and for the clergy to bring their parishioners into the County Court would certainly not help to increase their popularity. Moreover, the proposition of the Government substitutes an expensive remedy for a comparatively inexpensive one; and the occupier would become liable not only for the tithe, but for all the costs of the County Court action, amounting at least to £10 or £12. Then the execution is to be carried out by Receivers (who are also to be managers), and I can assure the House that there is not a more cumbersome and expensive process than this. In fact, those who wish to disestablish the Church could not serve their ends better than by strongly supporting this part of the Bill, for it is sure to intensify the unpopularity of the Church. In substituting the owner for the occupier as the person liable for the charge, little benefit will be achieved, because the landlord will be sure to add the tithe to the rent. Then, of course, the large number of small Welsh occupiers, who are also owners, will receive no relief, and nearly every one of them is a Nonconformist. They have before offered a passive resistance to the tithe, and they will still continue to do so, while the people of Wales will continue to sympathise with the sufferers. One of the effects of the Bill will be that under Sections 1 and 6 (Sub-section 2), the tithe owner and land owner will be able to agree as to the amount of the tithe behind the back of the occupier, who will become ultimately liable. I will also say that the Government have chosen a singularly inopportune moment for bringing in this Bill. Just when the three counties which bore one-fifth of the whole tithe-charge of England—Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk—were recovering from the agricultural depression, the Government, the friends of the landed interests, are re-opening the question of tithes in the interest of the tithe owner. I also think the moment singularly inopportune with regard to the state of the agitation in Wales, which was beginning to die out. So long as the Establishment remains some form of agitation will remain, but this particular agitation was beginning to die out. Things were beginning to settle down when the Government rake up the slumbering embers. I cannot help thinking that it would have been better to let sleeping dogs lie, especially as it seems to us that the proposal they are making contains the maximum of irritation with the minimum of result. There are three methods of dealing with such a question as this. You could boldly grasp it and treat it as a great national question—that is the best way. The second best way is to let it alone, and the third, or worst of all way, is to potter and tinker with it. That is the method adopted by the Government who have brought forward these cumbrous proposals. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman opposite has a docile and obedient majority at his back who will pass the Second Reading of the Bill; but I warn the right hon. Gentleman that it is not until the measure gets amongst the shoals and quicksands of Committee that its real fate will be decided. In the meantime, I ask is it wise, just, or statesmanlike, to force on a Bill of this kind, admittedly designed to meet the case of Wales, against the unanimous feeling of Welsh Members, for not one single Conservative Welsh Member has had the courage to get up and support the Bill, although five Welsh Members have spoken from this side against it. Is it wise to force a Bill of this kind down the throats of even a small nation like Wales—for the measure is especially aimed at Wales? It is because I hold it to be neither wise, just, nor statesmanlike that, whatever may be the opinion of my Colleagues around me, I shall feel bound to vote against it at every stage.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

(10.35.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): The information of the right hon. Gentleman is singularly misleading. He has first of all assured us on his own knowledge that the objection to pay tithe in Wales is wholly on account of its application. I take leave to contradict that statement, flatly. Several of the fights about tithe have been in cases where the owners are not ecclesiastical, and the principal fight has been about the tithe paid to the undenominational society of Christ Church. The objection to the payment of lay-tithe, therefore, has been as great as that to the payment of ecclesiastical tithe. I think I am entitled to correct the right hon. Gentleman on this point. But the right hon. Gentleman then brought us news of certain Conservative meetings at Rhyl, and he tells us that declarations were made against the Bill of last Session.

*MR. O. MORGAN: I referred to a Conference that preceded the meeting at Rhyl.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Well, let me assure the right hon. Gentleman that that Conference passed by an unanimous vote a resolution approving of the Government Bill of last year, which the right hon. Gentleman says was the same as that now before the House. I think, therefore, I have a right to say that the right hon. Gentleman, before setting himself to tell us what the opinion of the people of Wales is on this question, should have satisfied himself thoroughly as to the accuracy of his information. Then the right hon. Gentleman tells us that the Church people are very few in Wales, as if that had anything to do with the question. As a matter of fact, the Church people are a larger Body than any other religious denomination in Wales. ["Oh!"] Yes; the Calvinistic Methodists, who are the next in number, are 50 per cent. smaller. ["Oh!"] Will the hon. Member who challenges the statement name any Religious Body which is more numerous than the Church?

*MR. S. EVANS: There are three, at least. [Cries of "Name."]

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Those are the inaccurate assertions which are made by the opponents of the Church in Wales, while the men who make them are afraid of a religious census, and content themselves with gathering statistics at chapel doors. They know that if they had a census the facts which are now well-known would then be placed on an authoritative basis. The right hon. Gentleman objected to throwing the burden on the owners instead of the occupiers, and making the tithe rent-charge recoverable by the owners.

*MR. O. MORGAN: No; I said I had the greatest objection to altering the remedy from distress to the County Court.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: That is the same thing. If you have a distress you must distrain upon the occupier; you cannot do so on the owner, as he has no visible property to distrain on. The right hon. Gentleman has not so much criticised the Bill as gone off upon broader issues. He has said that the tithes are national property. Well, that is a matter upon which we hear so many loose opinions that, perhaps, it will be as well to mention what the law is. Lord Brougham has said—

"I think the right of the Church in the property it enjoys is sacred as the rights of individuals to their estates and freeholds, and that the parson of the parish has as good a right to the tenth part of the produce of the soil as the body of the proprietors and occupiers to have the other nine-tenths."

And that the pastor of a parish has as good a right to a tenth part of the produce of the soil as anyone had to any property. Then the right hon. Gentleman may have once read Blackstone, though he has forgotten him now. Blackstone says—

"The clergy have precisely the same right to the tithes as the heir-at-law has to his ancestor's estate, and the proprietor has no more reason to complain that his land is not tithe free than he has that his neighbour's field is not his own."

Professor Freeman also says—

Mr. Stanley Leighton

"Church property is not national property except in the same sense that all property is national."

After this, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman will not repeat the statement that the tithe is national property. He and his friends may wish it to be so, and use arguments coloured by that desire, but national property it is not. I decline to discuss this question as though it were an ecclesiastical question. I hope it will be dealt with on the broad principle of the security of all property. The payment is now to be made by the landowner as we all know it was intended to be by the Commutation Act. I defy any Welsh Member to go to an agricultural constituency and put it before the farmers whether they would like to have the tithe paid by themselves or their landlords. I defy any Member to get a majority in favour of tithes being paid by the farmers themselves. Why, only the other day the Farmers' Club declared that the landowners, if they paid the tithe themselves, would have little to complain of. I have taken pains to ascertain what the opinion of the agriculturists is on the point; and when I brought forward a Bill some four or five years ago to make the tithes payable by the landlord, almost all the Chambers of Agriculture were in favour of it. Farmers to a man were in favour of it, though they may be, as the Mover of the Amendment described them in the Contemporary Review, men "of obstinate and bucolic habits." The agitation in Wales is described as a spontaneous agitation, but it is nothing of the kind. It is a got-up agitation. It has been described by a great authority on the question as "an artificial growth, assiduously cultivated by Liberationist orators and a vernacular Press." The same writer declared—

"It may, in fact, be truly said that the anti-tithe agitation of North Wales has, in the main, emanated from the office of the Banner at Denbigh. The Organisation and pulpits of the chapels, aided by house-to-house visitations of Calvinistic Methodist deacons, backed by the inflammatory harangues of itinerant agitators, and encouraged by the promises of the vernacular Press, spread the contagion from parish to parish. In one case which has come to my knowledge, the principal agitator was a local money-lender, who put the screw upon his debtors to join the agitation. Threats, coercion, intimidation, were freely used."

*MR. STUART RENDEL: Whose language is the hon. Member quoting?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I am quoting the language of Mr. Prothero, who is, I suppose, one of the best authorities on the subject. I am glad to say that the right hon. Gentleman opposite has described the Welsh people as the fairest-minded people in the world. Yes, and so they are. It is only a minority of agitators supported and backed up by political partisans who are unfair. The great body of Nonconformists strongly protest against the method of the hon. Gentleman and his friends, and one Calvinistic minister, the Rev. Parry Hughes, has said—

"I conceive that nothing so unjust or illogical as the present persecution of the clergy was ever projected, and I acknowledge with shame that it has been reserved for the Nonconformist promoters and supporters of the anti-tithe campaign in Wales, in defiance of the claims of morality, justice, and fair play, to trample ruthlessly on the rights of men who, through no fault of their own, depend for the necessities of life for themselves and their families on the ancient eū system of this country. It is not certainly all the Nonconformists who approve of the methods adopted by hon. Gentlemen and their friends, and the farmers in Wales and England are one and all in favour of the Bill. I looked forward on this occasion to the strong support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). I do not know why he is not in his place—and I do not know where he is—but his language last year was so kind with regard to a Bill, which was really the same Bill as this, that I certainly thought he would have been here to assist the Government.

"I will undertake," said the right hon. Gentleman, "to do all I can to assist the Government in passing the Bill, because it contains three valuable principles—payment by the landlord, abolition of distress, and reduction of the tithe when the land will not bear it." I defy anyone to say these are not the three leading principles of this Bill. I can assure the Government that they have in this matter the whole popular feeling of the farmers at their back; that the landowners, on the whole, are willing to accept the Bill; and that probably the owners of the tithe rent-charge, although they will suffer in some respects by the Bill, will, for the sake of peace and quiet, which above all things they desire, accept it.

(10.55.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I can hardly congratulate the Government upon the Representatives of Welsh opinion among their supporters. It is a very singular fact that no one on the other side of the House is able to express with any authority the opinion of Wales on any question which agitates the Principality. The hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) can in eloquent terms say what the opinion of the Principality is, but we fail to find any Representatives of a Welsh constituency who supports the statements which those Gentlemen use. I wish to question altogether the axiom laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and to which he himself does violence in his own Bill, with regard to the nature of the property in tithes. The Authority which, under the Bill, has to deal with the subject of tithes is the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. If the right hon. Gentleman had consulted the history of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, he would have found it was too late in the day to say that the property which belongs to the Church Establishment is not property which can be dealt with by the State. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners were constituted by Act of Parliament, and dealt with Church property on the footing of its being national property. They take away the endowments of one diocese or of one parish and transfer them to another. The hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) does not know the depth of feeling on this subject which exists amongst the Welsh farmers. These men are not, as the hon. Member seems to suppose, in favour of the abolition of tithe on the ground that it is a private debt. They consider it as the misapplication of public property. If I should be asked to describe this Bill, I should say it is merely an attempt to prop up the Establishment in Wales from the outside. I agree that the Church in Wales has done a good religious work; but if the Church desires to have its influence extended, it is not from the outside sources it should seek its strength, but from sources within its own walls. If those who are the devoted members of the Establishment in Wales desire to extend its work let them do their duty to their own Church in the same way as members of other Churches in Wales do their duty to their own religious denominations. If that is done, no doubt considerable influence will be exercised on the religious feeling in Wales. But this is not an attempt to strengthen the Church from the inside; it is an attempt to strengthen the Church from the outside; to strengthen it by means of money which is dragged from the pockets of those who do not believe in the Establishment in Wales as a religious institution. The farmers of Wales raise the objection to tithe because they have a settled conviction that they are paying money which had its origin in national purposes towards a religious institution which only ministers to the religious wants of a small minority of the population. I was very much surprised to hear that the hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. S. Leighton) had the hardihood to say that the Church in Wales is the strongest religious institution in the Principality. I do not know how he measures strength. [Mr. S. LEIGHTON: By numbers.] There is a different way of measuring strength. I should like him to measure strength in this way, which, I think, would be a fair method: Let him take the support of the Church that is rendered by those who are members of the Church. He will then find that the Church of England in Wales is one of the weakest religious institutions in the Principality. Let him subtract from the revenues of the Church the contributions of those who are not members of the Church—contributions which are forced from them by the law of this country—and he will find that the Church is one of the weakest of the religious institutions in the country. Last year the Postmaster General spoke of the distress of the Welsh clergy, and said it was a scandal. Of course it is. No one denies that; least of all do the Welsh Representatives. But to whom is it a scandal? Is it a scandal to those who do not profess to support the clergy? Is it a scandal to those who do not regard the clergy of the Church of England as their ministers? No, Sir; it is a scandal to those who profess the same religious opinions as the clergy; it is a scandal to those who, being best able to support ministers of religion, fail in their duty and leave it to outsiders to find the means by which the clergymen can live properly. Now, this Bill is very complicated. I admit it has been very carefully prepared; it is very much superior, so far as draftsmanship is concerned, to the Bill of last Session. But, at the same time, its object is easily seen. Its object is not in the least degree to benefit the payer of tithe, but to benefit the owner of tithe. I think the right hon. Gentleman might have explained a little more what he means by the provision as to the appointment of a Receiver. As I understand, it will be competent for the Receiver to manage the farm. What does that mean? Why, the costs of the Receiver will add enormously to the burdens which have to be borne by the tithepayer; and if the Receiver is also to manage the farm, he may borrow money and expend it in management, so that the man in occupation may be kept for years out of the beneficial enjoyment of the holding. Poundage and the costs and expenses of the Receiver and manager will more than double that which the tithepayer was originally expected to pay. And this, it is said by the right hon. Gentleman, is to be a benefit. I do not believe that the ownership of tithe is inimical to the tithepayer. As a rule, tithe owners and tithepayers have that amount of common sense which shows them that they are in fact partners in one concern, and I do not think the tithe owner can agree to a measure which he sees places an additional burden upon the tithepayer as this Bill does. I hope that the Government will profit by the experience of last Session, and withdraw the Bill. The Postmaster General, who stands in the place of a Welsh Secretary, is anxious, I understand, to send a message of peace to Wales. But the right hon. Gentleman must see that there is no message of peace in this measure; but, on the contrary, that there is in it a great element of discord between the tithe owner and tithepayer. The right hon. Gentleman would do well to persuade his Colleagues that this measure will not prove the means of bringing round the people of Wales to favour Establishment. If I were speaking merely as a Party man, I should say I desire nothing better than this Bill; but I am not anxious to speak as a Party man. I am anxious for this question to be settled, but the settlement ought surely to proceed upon the principle that that which is public property ought to be applied to public purposes.

Mr. Warrington

*Sir W. BARTHELOT (Sussex, North-West): I desire to say a few words on this important question. Any one who has listened attentively to the debate must say that up to this it has run very much in one groove. I should like to remove it from that groove. It has been, in reality, a Welsh debate. I sympathise with those gentlemen who are anxious to state their views with regard to the Church of England in Wales, yet they must remember that this Bill applies to the whole of England. I think no one will deny that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has very clearly laid before us that which he intends by the Bill. Let me go back for a moment to ancient history. We had a Tithes Bill in 1887, but it was not pressed to a Division in this House. In that Bill there was 5 per cent. to be paid to the landowners. That was to cover other proposals in the Bill which they thought might be very objectionable to many of the landowners. But that 5 per cent. was cut out of the Bill, and then the Bill itself disappeared from the scene. We then had another Bill. That Bill contained a provision which placed upon landowners a personal responsibility, indeed more than a personal responsibility. If, for instance, you lived in Middlesex and had property in Yorkshire, and the Yorkshire tithe was not paid, the tithe owner could come down on your property in Middlesex and take sufficient to satisfy the tithe in Yorkshire. That was a proposal which no reasonable man would have accepted. I would have fought it to the death. Such a proposal would never have passed into law. After that another unfortunate Bill was brought forward. If the opinions of many gentlemen on this side of the House had been listened to that Bill would not have been pressed so far as it was; but the Bill was pressed on, and then what a change of front took place! Why was the change made? Because my hon. Friend the Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Mr. C. W. Gray) nearly carried an Amendment embodying the first principles of this Bill. My hon. Friend, therefore, ought to be satisfied with the present measure. The right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), who was then leading the Opposition, stated distinctly that the change the Government had made was one which he could absolutely support, and that he believed hon. Members on the Opposition Benches would support the Government in carrying the Bill. That Bill was ruled out of order. The Government, however, profiting by the experience of the past and relying on the fair and reasonable support of the House of Commons, now places before it the provisions which were in the proposed Bill withdrawn last year. I think the Government are right in bringing forward this Bill, and I believe that any fair and reasonable Amendments will be carefully considered by my right hon. Friend in charge of it (Sir M. Hicks Beach). I think my right hon. Friend has done a great service to the House. If there is any man who has suffered from the agricultural depression it is he. I believe he has looked at both sides of the question, and can represent the views of all who are interested in it. A right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench said he should oppose the Bill on every point. I hope this declaration will strengthen my right hon. Friend in the determination that, as far as the main principles of the measure are concerned, he will adhere steadfastly to them if he really means to carry the Bill at all. There is not a man in the House who would not say it would be a disgrace to a strong Government like this after bringing in a Bill for the fourth time to withdraw it from the consideration of the House on account of the opposition of a few Gentlemen on the opposite side. If they go on boldly I hope they will pass a measure which will settle this question for many years to come. Reference has been made to the disturbances which have gradually sprung up in Wales since 1887. The way to prevent disturbance from growing is to be firm at the commencement. If the Government had been firm, if with a steady and resolute hand they had put down the disturbances they would not have grown at all. I venture to think that the provision with regard to the special rate is one that is in the interests of the landowners as well as the tenants, because they will be able to go to the Assessment Committee and get the absolute sum approved, which sum if less than the tithes, then the tithes will be reduced to that sum, and the tithe owner will have to pay the rates, no rates being charged upon the land. I would suggest to my right hon. Friend that he might go a step further in that direction. We have heard that there are a large number of small holders who suffer tremendously by the present depression. We know that when the tithe commutation took place in 1836 the rates were more than double what they are at present. Who has benefited by the reduction of the rates? Has it not been the tithe owner? If you read the statements made at the time by Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, you will find they were both agreed that if the price of wheat went down, some re-arrangement ought to be made, and that they went further, and said the object of the commutation of tithe was to enable those who were putting their money into the land, namely, the landlords, to make such great improvements as have been made since the Act of 1836. Then it was said the reason for fixing the payment was that there should be no extraordinary change; that it would be most unfair if an increase of tithe were made on account of the improved cultivation of the land, and, though an enormous change has taken place since the repeal of the Corn Laws, yet it would be dangerous to reopen the fixed basis. We have to deal with it as it stands, and I venture to hope and I believe that the relief, small as it is, will be of service to a large number of people. But I go one step further in regard to the Redemption Clauses. My right hon. Friend has been much criticised upon these, and an hon. Member has said—

“Whatever you do if you redeem the tithe and get rid of the burden on the land, we shall place some other burden on the land, for that is what we think we ought to do”

But I would like to ask the hon. Member for Leicester about this. He cannot be of that opinion he will not put another shilling on the land for has he not undertaken that if he should have the management of affairs, if he should ever sit there as Prime Minister, he would get an increase of 50 per cent. from the land? I confess I should like to know how he proposes to do it, and if he succeeds I will be his humble disciple. We have heard lately through the elaborate speech of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary how he proposes to deal with tenants in Ireland; and surely if we are to have a redemption scheme worthy of the name, we may urge upon my right hon. Friend, with the assistance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and with the magnificent security of a first charge upon the land, that we might have the money advanced to us at a very much more reasonable rate than that mentioned in the Bill. That is one of the questions I hope my right hon. Friend will take into account; but believing that, upon the whole, he has endeavoured to fulfil the pledge given by the Government last year, and although there are some points in the Bill I do not approve of, and which may be amended, yet still I believe that if my right hon. Friend is only firm and steadfast in his purpose, he will carry this to a successful conclusion, and at the end of the Session we shall have the credit of having placed upon the Statute Book a measure which I venture to hope will settle this difficult and dangerous question of tithe for many years to come.

Mr. Warmington

(11.30.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): As one who strongly opposed the Bill of last year, I feel bound to say that I think the present is a very carefully prepared Bill, and one which might, by amendments in Committee, be made a very good measure. The debate so far has been carried on upon two lines; by those who have supported the Bill and mildly criticised it, and others who have dealt with the measure from a Welsh point of view. The arguments of the Welsh Members may be summed up in this, that they would find no fault with the Bill provided it were to include a clause which should disestablish the Church in Wales. Whatever differences of opinion hon. Members may have with regard to the proper use and disposition of the tithe rent-charge, we must all agree that the tithe should be preserved in its integrity for any use to which Parliament may choose hereafter to devote it. That is exactly the principle of the Bill. I am exceedingly glad that the Government propose to relieve the tenants from the payment of the tithe rent-charge. It was the greatest mistake that the tenants ever had to pay it, and it is contrary to the intention of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836. I believe it was brought about by the land agents to save themselves the trouble of making those small payments. In Lincolnshire, Northumberland, and many other counties, on all the large estates the tithe rent-charge is paid by the landlords; but where it is paid by the tenant it is for the convenience of the landlord, and the tenant gets a return for it at the rent audit. I am quite certain the system has been a very bad system, and I think no one who reads the Act of 1836 can fail to see that the idea of the tenant paying the tithe is much deprecated. I am therefore very glad that it is proposed to make payment by the tenant illegal, and we shall get rid of the scandal of a tenant being distrained upon for that which he is not bound to pay or entitled to pay except as a matter of convenience for the landlord, and I believe recovery through the County Court is the proper method to adopt. With regard to the certificate of the Assessment Committee, I agree with my hon. Friend who spoke last that this is a valuable provision of the Bill. It is fair to everybody all round, because land is depreciated in most counties from 22 to 25 per cent., and therefore the tithe owners' charge on the land ought to be reduced by the same amount. But I am not very well pleased that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be the Body to administer the Act, because they have a very good character for running up expenses, and a very bad character for expediting business, and I am afraid a great deal of toll will be paid by the clergy for the work transacted for them. In regard to the redemption clauses of the Bill, I should like to ask why it is that when the landlords are unable to pay the capital amount of redemption, they are asked to pay 4 per cent. on mortgage to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for I find in another part of the Bill that the Tithe Receiver gets $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. What becomes of the other five-eighths paid by the landlord? Surely that should not be allowed to fall into the jaws of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Surely it would be better if matters were carried on as now, and that landowners might pay direct to the Tithe Receiver an amount say of $3\frac{1}{2}$ or $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. It would be a saving to landowners and to the tithe receiver, and the only people who would lose by the arrangement would be the officials of the Ecclesiastical Commission, with whom, I confess, I have no sympathy. Then I would call attention to Section 3, Sub-section 1, under which power is given to provide that all lands in the possession of the same owner shall be liable for the tithe due upon part of the land. Now I cannot see why these words should be included. Surely whether a man is a large or a small landowner, or whether his occupancy is small or large, he should be dealt with on the same terms. But under this clause a man might have a large farm, part of which might be of great value, and part very poor land, paying badly, yet the grass land might be made liable and brought under the Receivership for the tithe not paid on the clay land. I make these remarks with a view to assist the Government in the Bill. I cordially support the Bill, and hope that every one who can assist in making it a perfect measure and a benefit to all concerned will vote for the Second Reading.

(11.40.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I have been very much interested in the reasons assigned for supporting the Bill, but most of all by the right hon. Gentleman who told us generally that the Bill was for the benefit of tithe owners and tithepayers; but nine-tenths of his speech was devoted to the Bill as it would affect the people of Wales. Wales was in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman throughout. The President of the Board of Trade has told us of some imaginary opponent of the Bill, whose picture, as the right hon. Baronet drew it, was like Henry VIII. Well Henry VIII. was a Welshman, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that there are still Welshmen who would strike as big blows at the Ecclesiastical Establishment as ever Henry VIII. did. It is plain from the right hon. Gentleman's speech that he has in his mind the interests of tithe owners only. He wants the tithe owners in England to have the same facilities for borrowing money from the taxpayers, as he and his Party are ready to give to the landowners of Ireland. To describe the Bill as a Tenant Farmer's Relief Bill is to describe it quite wrongly. How will the tenant be benefited? If the obligation to pay tithe is shifted on to the landlord, but if the tenant in his turn has to pay the amount to the landlord, how will the tenant be better off than before? When the hon. Member opposite argued that tithe is the property of the Church, I think he ought to have consulted his leaders on the Front Bench. The First Lord has explained, I think, that when he said tithe was national property he did not mean exactly what others did; but the President of the Board of Trade had admitted the same thing.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: No.

MR. PHILIPPS: I do not wish to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman, but I thought he used the expression "national property," though he qualified it with other words.

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I never used it. What I did say was that the hon. Member for Swansea had described the property as national, but that I did not agree with him.

MR. DILLWYN: When did I do so?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: In the terms of the Motion of which the hon. Member gave notice.

MR. PHILIPPS: I find that the right hon. Gentleman did not use the words "national property," but the words "public property"; so there is not a great distinction. Then the hon. Member for Hants said that he did not wish to be relieved of his own burdens at the expense of the Church. Well, I can assure the hon. Member that the tenant farmers of Wales have no such wish either. They protest against the payment of tithes on public grounds, and not from any notion of private benefit. The agitation in which they have taken part has landed the farmers of Wales in very heavy expenses. Then we had the speech of the noble Lord (Viscount Wolmer), which, I suppose, was directed to showing that he has inherited a legal mind, but really it amounted to no more than the assertion of absurd legal quibbles. Then, from a Lincolnshire Member we had quite a pathetic appeal to the Government to make the thing a little sweeter to tithepayers, for there were 2,000 such among his constituents. And doubtless the Government will do this, and the assistance of the British taxpayer will be asked to lend money at 2½ per cent. Night after night we have heard taunts in this House of speeches being paid for; but the speech of the hon. Member for Bradford is delivered almost nightly at 30s. and second-class return fare. We have heard the speech often, and I suppose often shall hear it again. Then we had the speech of the hon. Gentleman from Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton). It amused us, coming among some very dull speeches; but who is the authority Prothero he quoted? Is he another of the 30s. speakers? Hon. Members think such allusions are bad form, perhaps, but let them remember this when they use taunts against us on this side. There are four Conservative Members for Wales, but they are not in the House, and they will not dare to speak in support of the Bill, although they may vote for it. The Bill will not put down agitation, which will be carried on by farmers who own their farms. Agitation is not the cause but the effect of a real grievance, and agitation will go on until the Church in Wales is disestablished.

Mr. Philipps,

(11.55.) Debate adjourned till tomorrow.

SOUTH INDIAN RAILWAY PURCHASE BILL.—(No. 195.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Upon this Bill I desire to offer a few observations, general and particular. In the first place—

THE CHAIRMAN: This first clause contains only the short title, and I do not think the hon. Member would be in order in discussing the merits of the Bill upon this clause.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): Seeing that on a recent occasion when this Bill was before us, and at some such an hour as this, the First Lord of the Treasury cut short the discussion with the Closure Motion, and seeing that there is no time now for debate, I trust the right hon. Gentleman will agree to postpone the Bill to afford opportunity for raising the few points that require discussion. In order that this stage may not be hurried through, as the Second Reading was, I move that you now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."
—(Dr. Tanner).

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): The other night, in the course of a 10 minutes discussion, I ventured to ask for an explanation which, however, I did not get, and the First Lord stopped all discussion with the Closure. I hope, therefore, the Government will not attempt to press the Bill further now, but will accept the Motion and report Progress.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have no objection to the Motion, but let me remind the hon. Gentleman that an explanation was given to the effect that, under an arrangement entered into 20 years ago, the Indian Government paid five per cent. on the company's capital, and that payment would continue for a long term of years, unless the Government availed themselves of the right of purchase which the agreement gives them this year. By the exercise of that power the Government will effect an economy of £36,000 a year in Indian expenditure. If the Bill is defeated, the effect will be that the Government of India will pay £36,000 a year more for the entire period of the agreement. However, I consent to the Adjournment now.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I wish to explain that I am opposing the Bill, not from any motives of obstruction, but because I believe the Bill is a mistake financially and in other respects.

It being 12 o'clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

HERRING FISHERY (SCOTLAND) ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 196.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (PREVENTION) BILL.—(No. 210.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 19.

(12.11.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): One point appears to have escaped the attention of the Committee, in connection with the clause relating to the method in which penalties shall be recovered before the Court instead of in a summary manner. This Bill is so framed that what are generally meant by contagious diseases are all brought under its operation. Under the Bill there is no clause defining particular diseases, but the Public Health Act, Clause 6, names a certain number of diseases, and the following clause states that the Local Authorities may add to them as many as they choose. Consequently, a particular class of disease, which I need not especially mention, might, if the Local Authority so decided, come under the operation of this Bill, which would constitute a tremendous weapon and enormous power in dealing with these matters. By Clause 132 any Justice of the Peace, acting in and for a district, may direct the detention in hospital of persons suffering from these diseases with a view to preventing the spread of the disorder. Now, that virtually means imprisonment in a hospital; and if the powers under the Bill are taken in the sense to which I have alluded, they legalise a course which ought not to be sanctioned by a Committee of this House without full intention and knowledge of what it is about.

(12.14.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I think the hon. Gentleman has entirely failed to comprehend the purpose and principle of this Act. No extension of the list of diseases can take place without the consent of the Local Government Board; and if the list were extended in an improper manner, that Authority would be summarily called to account. Nothing is further from the intention of those who framed the Act than to extend the list in the direction suggested by the hon. Member.

CAPTAIN VERNEY: But it may be done.

(12.15.) MR. POWELL: I have never heard any suggestion of the kind, and feel greatly surprised that such wild observations should be uttered by the hon. Member. I hope that the Bill will be allowed to proceed.

CAPTAIN VERNEY: I entirely agree with the hon. Member that this was never contemplated; but still it may be done, and that is my reason for bringing the matter before the House.

(12.16.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Will the Local Government Board give us some assurance that this will be made impossible? There may be no intention on the part of the promoters of the Bill to do this thing, and to bring in these other diseases; but so long as there is any possibility of its being done, it behoves us to guard against it. We have been taken in several times in the past, and we do not wish to be taken in again. Surely the Government or the hon. Member in charge of the Bill can insert words expressly limiting the effect of the measure.

(12.17.) MR. W. H. LONG (Wilts, Devizes): I cannot, in the absence of the President of the Local Government Board, give any such assurance; but I may point out that the list of these infectious diseases cannot be extended except with the consent of the Local Government Board, and that implies that extension cannot be made without the knowledge of Parliament.

*MR. M'LAREN: Why not?

MR. W. H. LONG: All I can say is that I will undertake to lay this matter before the President of the Local Government Board before the Report stage is reached.

(12.19.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I do not think we can proceed any further. This is too serious a matter to be left merely on the understanding that it is to be dealt with on the Report stage. We must clearly understand that there is no possibility of doubt on this question. Under these circumstances, I move to report Progress.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): May I point out that this Amendment is one proposed by the hon. Member for West St. Pancras, and that I had merely proposed it in the absence of the hon. Gentleman. Of course, if there is any objection to it I am quite willing to withdraw it.

(12.21.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: My position is simply this: A difficulty has arisen which the responsible Representative of the Government is not able to clear up. This Bill has been advanced with startling rapidity. The hon. Gentleman in charge of it cannot complain of any delay in putting it forward, and I think it is only due now to the House that we should not proceed any further.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

Mr. M'Laren

TREES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 70.)
Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, after the word "shall," to insert the words "subject as hereinafter mentioned."
—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(12.23.) DR. TANNER: I have already explained this matter to the Committee. The hon. Member desires to introduce Amendments which were introduced in the Bill by the House of Lords on a prior occasion, and inasmuch as our constituents decline to accept this Amendment because it will practically emasculate the measure, I must object to further progress being made.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SMALL HOLDINGS.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Small Holdings be re-appointed to inquire into the facilities which exist for the creation of Small Holdings in Land in Great Britain; whether, either in connection with an improved system of Local Government or otherwise, those facilities may be extended; whether, in recent years, there has been any diminution in the number of Small Owners and Cultivators of Land; and whether there is any evidence to show that such diminution is due to legislation.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Broadhurst, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Jesse Collings, Viscount Curzon, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Sir William Hart Dyke, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Llewellyn, Mr. James William Lowther, Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Halley Stewart, and Mr. Angus Sutherland, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That five be the quorum.

Ordered, That the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee on Small Holdings in 1889, be referred to the Committee.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 28th March, 1890.

APPEAL COMMITTEE.

First Report from ; read, and agreed to.

EARL ERNE (CLAIM TO VOTE FOR REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND).

Ordered and Directed, That a Certificate be sent by the Clerk of the Parliaments to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, stating that the Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom has reported to the House of Lords that the right of the Earl Erne to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland has been established to the satisfaction of him the said Lord Chancellor; and that the House of Lords has ordered such Report to be sent to the said Clerk of the Crown in Ireland; and it is hereby also ordered, that the said Report of the said Lord Chancellor be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland.

COUNTY COUNCILLORS (QUALIFICATION OF WOMEN) BILL.

A Bill to enable women to be elected and to act as County Councillors—was presented by the Lord Chaworth (F. Meath); read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 50.)

BILLS OF SALE BILL.

A Bill to exempt certain letters of hypothecation from the operation of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882—was presented by the Lord Chancellor; read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 51.)

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL. (No. 52.)

A Bill to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to industrial schools in Great Britain :

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS BILL. (No. 53.)

A Bill to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to reformatory schools in Great Britain :

JUVENILE OFFENDERS BILL. (No. 54.)

A Bill to amend the Summary Jurisdiction Acts with respect to the punishment of juvenile offenders :

Were presented by the Viscount Cross; read 1^a; to be printed, and to be read 2^a on Monday the 21st of April next.

VOL. CCCXLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

TRUST COMPANIES BILL.—(No. 42.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I had not an opportunity of saying anything upon this Bill when in Committee, and I take this opportunity of expressing my regret that the clause as to carrying on other businesses was altered in the manner in which it was in Committee. The result of that alteration will, I think, be to render the Bill absolutely nugatory. It is evident that no company at present exists which has for its sole business the performance of the offices of executor administrator or Trustee, and I do not think it would be possible to establish a company which should have as its only object the undertaking of those duties. I think if it is desirable to enable companies to act as Trustees or executors, it is essential that these companies should also be permitted to undertake other business of a remunerative character.

LORD HERSCHELL: I, of course, agree entirely with all my noble and learned Friend has said. I do not propose to go over the ground again which I traversed when the Bill was in Committee. I cannot think the alteration then made will afford any real protection to the public; because while it empowers such a company only to undertake the performance of the duties of executors and trustees, it in no way limits the investment of its funds by such a company, and does not prevent it involving itself in the very speculative investments which were the ground of objection to companies which undertook not only that business but other businesses as well. The Amendment which I have on the Third Reading is upon Clause 24, which is taken verbatim from my noble and learned Friend's Bill relating to Public Trustees, and I have merely made the Amendment to bring it into the final shape which that Bill assumed. It is in line 25, after "of" to insert "any of," and to leave out the words "or of any such persons." Then in line 27 to leave out the words after "bank" and insert words, so that it shall read "that the company or bank shall not be deemed liable by reason of having had notice thereof."

F

Amendments agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL.—(No. 43.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I do not propose at this stage to revive the discussion which took place in Committee upon this Bill, or to ask your Lordships to re-consider it in any way. My proposal to omit certain words, which I will allude to in a moment, was defeated in this House, and, of course, here, where my noble and learned Friend can count upon the big battalions, it would have been useless to divide. But I desire to call your Lordships' attention to the Bill as it stands, because I cannot think it is really appreciated, or that, when appreciated, it can be permitted finally to pass in its present form. The Bill provides that where any property which is subject to any liability, such as shares, on which calls may be made, is vested in the Public Trustee, the Public Trustee shall not be liable to the payment of any such calls. Whatever may be said for limiting the liability of Trustees, I think it ought only to be done under careful safeguards. Here the proposal applies, of course, only to a Public Trustee, and I must invite your Lordships' attention to what will be the effect of the Bill as it at present stands. If the owner of shares in a company, upon which large calls still remain to be paid or can be claimed, thinks fit to vest those shares in the Public Trustee upon trust, we will say for a member of his family, the effect would be that the beneficiary would, under that trust, obtain all the advantages of belonging to the company in the way of receiving dividends in common with all the rest of the shareholders; but should the company go into liquidation, neither the beneficiary nor the Trustee, nor anybody else, will, in respect of those shares, be liable to make a penny of payment towards satisfying the claims of creditors, and, of course, that will have the effect of throwing the whole of the burden upon the other shareholders. Now, this is not merely a question of the liability of Trustees, public or otherwise; it is a question in which every public company and everybody who holds shares in a public company is interested, because, of course, in the event of liquidation or loss, they are all liable; that is to say, if there are debts of the company they will fall to be paid by all the shareholders alike, and if any shareholder is freed from that liability it throws a greater burden upon the others. If you say that the Public Trustee shall not be liable beyond the amount of the property which he holds under the trust, the creditors will still have to be satisfied, and therefore heavier calls will have to be made on the other shareholders. That will be the result of freeing the Public Trustee from liability under this Bill. I cannot think that that is the intention of your Lordships' House, or that it ought to be carried into effect. What reason is there for it? Simply the result will be that if a man makes the Public Trustee his Trustee in regard to shares in a company, he thereby wipes out that portion of the capital of the company. Suppose that the capital of the company is £1,000,000, and a large number of the shares representing that capital are put in the hands of the Public Trustee, the result will be that whereas the capital of that company appears to be £1,000,000, it is, in reality, so much less. That result is brought about simply because one of the shareholders chose to vest his shares in the Public Trustee. It may be said that may not be done to any great extent; but there will be every temptation for people holding shares to do so. Suppose a man vests shares in the Public Trustee for his son's or his daughter's marriage, he will get all the benefit of being a shareholder, and be at the same time freed from all burdens. Your Lordships know there are many prosperous companies who may, nevertheless, get into trouble. Suppose the capital of a company is in £25 shares, on which £5 may have been paid, so that a liability of £20 remains upon them. We will suppose 1,000 of those shares settled, and that the Public Trustee is made Trustee. £5,000 has been paid upon them, and of course that is the amount of the property settled. The company goes into liquidation; the other shareholders can be called upon to the extent of £20 per share on the amount of their shares, but no call can be made upon the 1,000 shares settled in the hands of the Public Trustee, and the result is that that unpaid £20,000 is as much wiped out of the capital of the company by the action of the shareholder investing it in the Public Trustee as if the company had been started with a so much smaller capital. I have spoken only so far of a company being wound up; but I hardly know what is to happen if a company is still a going concern. The Public Trustee is not to be bound to meet a call that is made—can the shares he holds be forfeited? If an ordinary shareholder does not pay his calls, the company can forfeit his shares; but could the company forfeit the shares held by the Public Trustee, who, the Legislature has said, shall not be liable to pay beyond the amount of the property he holds? I think that is a matter which is at least open to grave doubt. I will only add that I have thought it right to call attention to the matter in order that it may be considered elsewhere. Here it is quite hopeless now to expect a consideration of it; but if the Bill passed in its present form I think it will be found hereafter very difficult to justify such legislation. The truth is that the Public Trustee ought not to take shares in trust unless he has ample property in his hands to meet the liability upon them, or gets an indemnity which shall be sufficient to satisfy him that he is secure. No Trustee need hold shares in trust; and it seems to me that if the Public Trustee does so it would be right that the shares he holds should remain subject to the same liability as other shares, because otherwise they are at once, by that difference in liability, in fact deducted from the capital of the company. This is a matter which will not only affect future transactions, but will affect existing companies, which may be in that way deprived of part of their share capital in some cases, and in others have to throw greater burdens upon their other shareholders.

Lord Herschell

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not desire to argue the question over again; but it seems to me that my noble and learned Friend entirely forgets the difference between the positions of the Public Trustee and an ordinary Trustee. Unless some such provision as this were incorporated in the Bill, the Public Trustee could never accept a trusteeship or executorship which involved taking over shares. The extent to which he will be liable is the full amount of the trust property, and no more. Being only a public official and not a private Trustee, there is an entire difference between his position and that of an ordinary Trustee. Practically, the effect of the alteration which my noble and learned Friend desires to make would prevent the Public Trustee ever undertaking any trust or executorship in which there were shares at all; and I hope your Lordships will not allow the effect of the measure to be defeated by altering this excellent provision, as it seems to me, for limiting the liability of the Public Trustee.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: I would venture to suggest that, if it is desirable to relieve the Public Trustee from all liabilities in respect of shares, it would be a simpler plan to prohibit the Public Trustee from holding any but fully paid-up shares. I confess it seems to me that my noble and learned Friend behind me has made a very strong point in pointing out the unfairness with which companies would be treated under such a Bill as this.

Bill read 3^a (according to order); Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION ACT, 1888.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the Lord President of the Council and the Lord Privy Seal yesterday, on behalf of the Government, read quite correctly the words of two Standing Orders. I naturally, feeling that I was responsible, and being perfectly aware that your Lordships have a right to enforce any Standing Order, immediately gave way, and I took the course which was suggested by those two noble Lords. My only compensation at the time was that I thought it would call even a little more attention than would otherwise have been paid to the objections which a small number of Members of this House desire to record, and whose example it was just possible a larger number might follow. Upon further inquiry, I find that there was no error committed at all yesterday. That entirely relieves me, and I may state now what happened. The chief officer at our Table, with that courtesy with which he always assists Peers on both sides of the House, undertook to put the notice in exact form. He advised that some notice should be given, and those were the words which he adopted. I have here a list, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, of instances during the last seven or eight years, where Motions of this kind have been made, absolutely without any notice at all, and therefore, if notice had been given in the way proposed, it would have been an innovation, and contrary to the practice of your Lordships' House. I do not, in the slightest degree, retire from the position I then took.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNOTSFORD): I thought it was contrary to the Standing Orders.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): There is one question which I would like to ask the noble Earl, whether he is now alluding to the first or second of his Motions? The noble Earl will remember that he has made two Motions. The first Motion is now for the suspension of the Standing Order.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am talking of the objection which was raised yesterday to my question proceeding without notice previously given of the suspension of the Standing Order. Upon that, I say at once it is quite clear that any Peer has a right to say the Standing Orders shall be carried out to the letter; but that the constant practice has been, and the authorities are not aware of any single exception to it, that such permission has been given to Members of the House without any notice whatever. Therefore, what I propose now to do with regard to the first Motion is to ask your Lordships to do exactly what the Lord President of the Council and the Lord Privy Seal requested should be done. My second Motion is of a different sort. It is that owing to a misunderstanding, and to a change having taken place in the practice of the House, the names of some Lords, who yesterday, under a misapprehension, signed the Protest, be permitted to stand. I think, considering that it is an innovation which your Lordships have introduced into our practice, and considering the alacrity which I showed to meet the wishes of the House, it would only be in cognisance with the usual good feeling of the House if that permission were given.

Earl Granville

Moved, "That Standing Order No. XXXV. be dispensed with."—(The Earl Granville.)

*THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: My Lords, I am quite sure that the noble Earl will understand it is not with any desire to be discourteous to him that I say I hope you will not accede to the Motion he has made. The Standing Orders of your Lordships' House are not, as it seems to me, made to be broken. They are, I think, of some value; and if your Lordships accede to this Motion, all that noble Lords need do on another occasion when they wish to evade them will be to get up and move their suspension. If that is so I fail to see what use Standing Orders can be. I recollect the noble and learned Lord Herschell saying on one occasion that the difference between the Standing Orders of the House of Commons and those of your Lordships' House is chiefly this—

"That those of the House of Commons are not so severe, but they are always in force; whereas those of your Lordships' House, though much more severe, are very seldom enforced."

No doubt the Government may from time to time move the suspension of the Standing Orders in order to enable Bills to pass quickly through the House during the Session. That is a privilege which I think everybody will agree that Governments of whatever shade politically ought to possess. There may be cases where it is necessary to exercise that privilege; but in this instance, neither yesterday nor to-day, has the noble Earl given your Lordships a single reason for suspending the Standing Orders. He has now explained why he did not give notice of his Motion in the form which was suggested by Lord Cranbrook and Lord Cadogan; but why your Lordships should allow the Standing Orders to be suspended and should accede to the proposal he makes for allowing those noble Lords, some of whom were not present at the debate at all, and some of whom, I am told, were not even in England, to sign this Protest, he has not given a single reason. I need only refer to Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice to show what the custom of your Lordships' House is with regard to these Protests. He says this—

"Sometimes leave is given to Lords to enter Protests against any vote of the House some time after the period limited by the Standing Order."

And that is part of the proposal of the noble Earl. I have looked back to see what other occasions there were of this kind: they are not numerous, but there were undoubtedly two upon the Irish Church Bill. Then he says—

"By the usage of the House of Lords the privilege of entering a Protest is restricted to those Lords who were present and voted when the question to which they desire to express their dissent was put; but leave is sometimes given to Lords to sign the Protest of another Peer, although they were not present when the question was put."

But not a word about their not being present when the debate took place, and I can find no instance of any Peer being allowed to sign a Protest who was not present during the debate.

EARL GRANVILLE: Before the noble Earl proceeds I should like to call his attention to a few instances. On the 21st July, 1882, without any notice of Motion whatever being placed on the Paper, it was ordered that Lord Stratheden and Campbell be allowed to sign a Protest, and "that he sign the same before the rising this day." This Protest was entered and signed by, among others, Lord De L'Isle and Dudley, who was not present that day. Then, upon the Army Discipline Bill, in 1881, it was ordered that Lord Stewart of Garlies have leave to enter a Protest "before 2 o'clock tomorrow," he and such Lords as desired; and the Protest was entered and signed by, among others, Lord Hylton and Lord Waveney, who were not present. I really do not think I ought to trouble your Lordships by going through all the precedents which I have here.

*THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: This is rather a long interruption, and I think it would have been better if the noble Earl had given those precedents to the House when he made his Motion; but I do not gather from them that the Peers mentioned were not present at the debates.

EARL GRANVILLE: Yes: none of them were present.

*THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: However that may be, I will presently call attention to an authority to whom I think some of your Lordships, at all events, will pay respect—Lord Brougham—showing that this is not the practice of the House. In 1823 the Duke of Somerset, who had not voted on the question, nevertheless protested, and upon Motion, he having been present at the debate, though he had not voted, the Protest was allowed to stand on the Journals; but that was an extremely exceptional case, and was made dependent on the fact that though he had not voted he was present at the debate and had then protested against the Motion. Now some of these noble Lords were not present at the debate. Then there is reported in Hansard another occasion which occurred in this House on the 16th July, 1846. That instance was with regard to a Protest against the Corn Importation Bill. On that occasion the Earl of Radnor was allowed to call their Lordships' attention to a question of some importance as he conceived. He alluded to the Protest of certain noble Lords against the Third Reading. That Protest was signed by 93 Peers; and he always understood that only those Peers who were present could enter their protest, and that was a salutary rule. He was present when the question was put, and he denied that more than one-third of those Peers were present.

"It appeared on an examination of the Journals of the House that 10 or 12 Peers had put their names to the Protest against the Third Reading of the Corn Importation Bill, who were not in the House during any part of the discussion of that measure. He (the Earl of Radnor) was not desirous that any Peer who wished to have his name handed down to posterity as professing the opinions expressed in that Protest should be deprived of that honour; but he thought that, under the circumstances he had stated, it was a matter for their Lordships' consideration, and he would leave the House to deal with it as it thought proper. He found, on comparing the number of Peers in attendance on the discussion of the Bill with the number of names affixed to the Protest, that the names of 10 or 12 Peers who were not present at the time were appended to that Protest. Now, if their Lordships overlooked the first objection, he hardly thought they would overlook the second; because the inference would be that any Peer, at any time, whether he took part in the discussion or not, might come down and protest against it, even although his arguments and reasons had been refuted in the course of the debate."

Upon that occasion Lord Brougham, an authority, I think, as I have already said, to whom your Lordships will pay some attention, said that he conceived his noble Friends had done great service by calling attention to this irregularity, which he believed was no doubt unintentional, and arose from those noble Lords not having attended to the Rule of the House. After what I have ventured to say to your Lordships, I think you will see that the irregularity in this case cannot have arisen from that cause, and the Rule is, undoubtedly, that no person who was not present could protest. He lays that down without reservation, and he concludes—

“It was not so in the Irish Parliament, for in the Irish Parliament they could vote by proxy and protest by proxy.”

But clearly, where that is not done in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, this cannot be done. Now, my Lords, I will ask whether we are, for no reason whatever, to abolish that undoubted custom of Parliament in favour of these noble Lords, some of whom I am credibly informed were not even in England when the debate took place, and one of whom has not yet even taken his seat in this House. If that noble Lord had been foolish enough to gratify the noble Earl by signing this Protest, he would have rendered himself liable to a penalty of £500.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: I should like to say a few words on the question of procedure in reference to the Standing Orders of this House. It appears to me that two questions have been somewhat confused in this discussion: the first is whether Peers have ever been allowed to sign a Protest, not having been present at the debate, and the second is the manner in which that leave has been given. I believe my noble Friend behind me (Lord Granville) is perfectly right in stating that Peers have been allowed to sign such Protests; but the method by which that leave has been given has been to enter it simply on the Minutes, without bringing it before the House at all. In this case the question of suspending the Standing Orders did not arise at all. When the question is brought before the House, as it was by my noble Friend yesterday, the question of the Standing Orders at once arises. There, again, my noble Friend opposite (Lord Cadogan) was right in saying that notice should be given before Standing Orders are suspended; and I think your Lordships will agree with me that there is no case in which it is of so much importance that notice should be given as the suspension of Standing Orders. Under these circumstances, it seems to me the noble Earl is now quite in order, and if the noble Lord goes to a Division I shall certainly vote with him.

The Earl of Milltown

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM: I think the course we are asked to take is rather an unusual one. We are asked to suspend the Standing Orders in order to relieve certain noble Lords who were not present during the debate and enable them to enter this Protest. Why are we to be asked to act contrary to the Standing Orders of this House? What is the intention of this Standing Order? It says—

“Such Lords as shall make protestations or enter their dissents to any votes of this House, as they have a right to do, without asking leave of the House, either with or without their reasons, shall cause their protestation or dissents to be entered into the Clerk's Book the next sitting-day of this House, before the hour of 2 o'clock, otherwise the same shall not be entered, and shall sign the same before the rising of the House the same day.”

Now the debate took place this day a week ago, and the Protest was not entered in the Clerk's Book before 2 o'clock of the next day of the House sitting: on the contrary, I believe it was not entered until Tuesday week, and the noble Lords did not sign on that same day. What was the object of this Standing Order? It was, I apprehend, to ensure that noble Lords should be present at the debate, or should be, at all events, attending in Parliament. Of course, the Protest could not be drawn up until the result of the debate was known; but the Rule points out that the Protest shall be entered on the very next day of the sitting of the House, and shall be signed the same day, that is to say, the very next day afterwards. We are now asked to say that this Rule shall be suspended nearly a week after the debate occurred, and in favour of noble Lords who were not, in some instances, as the noble Earl has stated, even present. He has stated that they were to have signed on the morrow, and he now asks us to suspend this Rule in order that these noble Lords shall sign it. I think it is a very irregular course, and therefore I ask your Lordships not to assent to it.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should like to call attention to a precedent in this matter. On the 7th April, 1881, on the occasion of the Third Reading of the Army Discipline Bill, a Protest was entered nearly a month afterwards. On the 5th May it was ordered that Lord Stewart of Garlies should have leave to sign a Protest. The Protest was entered accordingly, and was signed by several noble Lords who had not been present.

LORD KNUTSFORD: The Easter holidays may have had something to do with it.

EARL CADOGAN: As the noble Lord has mentioned my name in connection with the proceedings of yesterday I will take this opportunity of stating that it was far from my intention either to act with discourtesy towards the noble Earl or to take advantage of the forms of the House to obstruct the Motion which he then made. But I would remind your Lordships that in proceedings yesterday two Motions were made by the noble Earl. First, there was a Motion brought forward contrary to one of the Standing Orders of this House, without any notice to suspend that Standing Order for the purpose of the Motion; and the second was a Motion to suspend the Standing Order at once without any notice. I felt that the last state of the noble Earl was worse than the first; because however inadvisable it was for the noble Earl to take the course of moving in opposition to a Standing Order, as he did in his first Motion, at all events it might be said that he gave notice of that Motion; but the Motion for the suspension of the Standing Order which he subsequently made was given without any notice whatever. I quite agree that the practice of this House with reference to matters of order is at all times lax, and especially so in comparison with the practice of the other House. I cannot say that I regret that laxity; but, at the same time, I am bound to remind the House that it is—and I speak subject to correction—very unusual to move a suspension of Standing Orders without notice.

EARL GRANVILLE: Certainly; we are all agreed about that.

EARL CADOGAN: I think the noble Earl will agree that it is not only an unusual but an extremely undesirable course. It was for that reason that I ventured to protest yesterday against the course which the noble Earl took. With reference to the Motion which he has this day placed upon the Paper, it is, not, in my opinion, a matter for Government to decide; it is a question which the House must decide for themselves. I venture to think that perhaps too much importance and too much stress has been laid upon this Protest, of which we have now heard so much; and, for my own part, I can only say that if my noble Friend behind me goes to a Division I shall deem it my duty to vote with the noble Earl opposite, and in saying that I believe I am expressing the opinion of my Colleagues who sit on the same Bench with me. I have risen chiefly to explain to the noble Earl the reasons for the course I took yesterday, and to explain that I shall not be prepared, in case of a Division, to vote against him.

*EARL FORTESCUE: It seems obvious, notwithstanding the precedents which have been cited, that a blot is often not hit until the matter raising the question has been brought conspicuously into notice; but I think it is a sort of reductio ad absurdum with regard to the privilege of signing a Protest which is to be preserved to these noble Lords, of whom I am told one is not in England and others heard not a word of the debate, to enter a week afterwards their names on the Protest. No doubt, in times past, very remarkable Protests have been made and signed by men of great eminence; but every argument that applied to the disuse of the practice of giving proxies, which your Lordships agreed to within my recollection as being one that was unseemly, seems to me, at least, as applicable to the signing of Protests by absentees a week after the debate has taken place. Whether the privilege of signing Protests is worth maintaining I do not know: I have no very strong opinion on the subject; but, I do say that if ever there was a reductio ad absurdum of a practice I think we have had a sample of it to-day, and therefore I shall vote against the Motion of the noble Earl. I think its effect would be to abolish practically the signing of Protests incidentally and in an ignominious way.

On Question, their Lordships divided :
—Contents 34 ; Not Contents 23.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Moved, "That the following Lords be at liberty to sign, before the rising of the House for the Easter Recess, the Protest entered against the Resolution of the House of Friday 21st March, although their Lordships were not present when the question was put:—

M. Breadalbane.	L. Acton.
E. Chesterfield.	L. Aberdare.
E. Ashburnham.	L. Hothfield.
L. Camoys.	L. Northbourne.
L. Wentworth.	L. Hobhouse.
L. Vernon.	L. Burton.
L. Thurlow.	L. Hamilton of Dalzell
L. Leigh.	L. Thring.

And that the names of

V. Hampden,
L. Coleridge,
L. Kensington,

who signed yesterday (27th March) under a misapprehension, be permitted to stand (Earl Granville) ; agreed to."

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) ACT, 1889.

*THE EARL OF LEITRIM: My Lords, before proceeding with my Motion, I should desire to give notice that as soon as possible after Easter I will introduce a Bill to amend the Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1889. With regard to the application of the Light Railways' Act to Ireland generally, I need make no explanatory statement as to my reasons for bringing forward this Motion. As far as it applies locally, and as far as my Motion applies to the Grand Jury of the County of Donegal, I should like to state what steps I have taken before introducing this Motion to your Lordships. I have given private notice to the foreman of the Grand Jury, to the mover of the resolution of the Grand Jury, with reference to the Letterkenny and Dunfanaghy Line, to the Duke of Abercorn, who was foreman of the Grand Jury of Donegal for many years ; I have put notices in the county papers, and I convened a meeting in the district to which the second part of my Motion refers in the County of Donegal, through which the Letterkenny and Dunfanaghy Line would run. I have circulated among your Lordships a report of what took place at that meeting and it should be in your hands. I know it was in the hands of many of your Lordships this morning. I desire, as far as possible, to deal with general principles, and also to avoid, as far as possible, all names of individuals or of places. My Lords, taxation without representation stinks in the nostrils of taxpayers of the United Kingdom ; but in the case of the Tramways of Ireland Act, the pill was gilded with the grant of £1,250,000 from the Treasury, and it was shipped to Ireland as a remedy for the congested districts. I should like, before I pass on, to say something about the definitions which have been given of what are called "congested districts." I have never seen any intelligible definition of what a congested district is. The Commissioners under the Tramways Act asked some of the witnesses what their idea of a congested district was, and one witness would say that it was—

Earl Fortescue

"A district in which there were a great number of people ;"

another gentleman would say that—

"The number of acres to the unit of population might represent what would be a congested district."

But when tested, I find that that definition does not work at all ; on the contrary, it gives exactly the inverse ratio : that is to say, that in these congested districts large areas exist per unit of population, but the land is worth nothing. It may be worth 6d. or 1s., sometimes nothing an acre, for it is nothing but stones and rocks. Therefore, that will not work. Another gentleman, the foreman of the Grand Jury, seems to have endeavoured to define a congested district by a negative process. He says—

"We have the most civilised district in the county, and we are seven miles from the nearest railway, and no chance of getting any nearer."

A civilised district appears to be his idea of what is not a congested district. The writer of a letter to a newspaper from the Parish of Rossgull takes the trouble to answer that definition, and he says that it would be curious and interesting to know by what criterion this gentleman judges the different degrees of civilisation. Do they, in his district, all use tooth-brushes, or do they wipe their noses with pocket-handkerchiefs, or have they reached that stage which a writer of note says is characteristic of the highest culture—"Do they take jam with their mutton?" I do not think, my Lords, that one will work any way. But I will endeavour to give you my idea of a congested district. My definition of a congested district is this: that the degree to which a district is congested may be estimated by the proportion that the population of a given area bears to the valuation of that area in pounds sterling. I have tested it, and I should like to give a few examples to illustrate it in the County of Donegal. I have taken the parish as my area. Of course, you can apply it to electoral divisions; you can apply it to a Petty Session district, or a Union, or any other district you choose; I have taken the parish. Now, the most congested district in the County of Donegal is what is called the Rosses, that is to say, the parish of Templecroome, and the population there is just three and a half times the valuation. The next are the parishes of Lettermacward and Tullahobegley, and there the population is two and a half times the valuation; and so it goes on until you get down to the valuation and population on a par, when it goes on until the valuation exceeds the population, and there we find a healthy and prosperous state of things. Now, my Lords, coming to the working of the Tramways Act; the defect in the Act, as far as I have been able to lay my finger upon it, seems to be that the congested districts must in every case make themselves responsible for the whole of the working expenses of these lines. I desire to point out to your Lordships the very serious and grave danger that I foresee, and that is that in certain cases this pill will leave such a nauseous after-taste that the patient will vomit. In other words, the congested district will turn upon the political physician, who will have produced an excretion which will have germinated into a white elephant, the burden of the working expenses will be greater than the relief to the taxpayers. The next defect that I would refer to in the working of the Act is this, as I understand it: The Board of Works have decided that no new lines should be scheduled for the Summer Assizes. That, in my opinion, would be a very wise policy; but I differ with the Board as to what may be considered new lines of railway. I hold that where the Board of Works have provisionally allocated a certain sum to reach a certain objective point, a deviation or entirely new method of reaching that objective point should not be considered a new line, but should be investigated between this and the Summer Assizes, and have its merits weighed against any alternative route that may have been scheduled. Let me illustrate this. Point Z is your objective point in a congested district, and P is a terminus of an existing line. A sum of, say, £200,000 has been provisionally allocated for a line from P to Z. But it is now discovered that A is really your base, and that a line from A through P to Z, your objective point—that is to say, from your base to your objective point—would be 10 miles longer, and therefore at £5,000 per mile would cost £50,000 more than a line from A, your base, through a point Q, to Z. That is to say, line A P Z would be 10 miles longer than A Q Z; and supposing you can show that there are existing communications from A to Q, as well as from A to P, why not make this line, which is 10 miles shorter, and connect with existing communications from A to Q? Why not make this bit of line from Q to Z? Supposing, also, that that line would better open up the congested districts; supposing that that shorter line was supported by a large and representative body of the ratepayers, I ask would it be wise, would it be business-like, would it be politic, to treat such a line as a new line and refuse to schedule it? I do pray the Government not to allow such red-tape notions to prevail. Other advantages may also be derived from the shorter line—there would be reduction in working expenses, and reduction in the rates per mile; there may be even lower rates from A to Q than there are from A to P. All those considerations may, I say, if such a line were scheduled, be then taken into consideration by the Commissioners and be duly weighed, and thus you will get the best value for your money, or whatever part of the £1,250,000 you are granting from the Treasury. There might be a further advantage in this shorter line. £200,000 was the sum which I stated might be the full amount required to construct the line; £50,000 would be saved by the 10 miles at £5,000 a mile, and if that £50,000 were placed to a reserve fund for that line it might be applied to meet one of the very great defects of the working of this Tramways Bill, that is to say, it might be applied towards defraying the deficit in the working expenses. A short one-clause amending Bill might be necessary, but see what you would save! You would save a considerable amount of taxation upon a congested district which already is struggling to live. Those are the remarks I desire to make to your Lordships as far as the Act may be applicable to the whole of Ireland. In regard to the latter part of my Motion, I desire to call attention particularly to the resolution of the Grand Jury of the County of Donegal, with reference to the Letterkenny and Dunfanaghy line. I should like to read to the House the resolution of the Grand Jury, or that part of it, at all events, which says—

"And owing to the ratepayers and the Grand Jury unanimously condemning the deviation recommended by the Board of Works,"

and so on. Now, to state that thousands and thousands of ratepayers were unanimous seems to me absurd on the face of it; but was that statement warranted by facts? The mover of the resolution was a land agent on the Grand Jury; and at the time he framed the resolution he had in his possession a letter from one of the largest cesspayers in the district, which said this—

"I do not think the lines proposed interest Milford or Mulroy at all; nobody in these parts cares in the least which of the proposed routes is adopted. Of course, if taxation is proposed on these districts they will be very much interested, and I think you will find they will be to a man against either route."

That letter was in the possession of the mover of the resolution, which says that the ratepayers were in favour of the route that was condemned in that letter, and the writer of that letter, I think, made good his case, for at the public meeting which I have already referred to, this resolution was adopted—

"That this meeting regrets that the Grand Jury should have resolved that the ratepayers are unanimous in condemning the deviation recommended by the Board of Works. That, believing this meeting to be representative of
The Earl of Leitrim

£20,000 of the £48,000 proposed to be taxed in the barony of Kilmacrenan, we desire to support the Commissioners of the Board of Works in their deviation from Creeslough via Carrigart to Milford, and we protest against the Grand Jury resolving that the Letterkenny and Gweedore scheme met with the approval of the ratepayers proposed to be taxed."

Now, my Lords, that meeting was a public meeting, and was in every way representative. Land-owners, priests, parsons, ministers, doctors and the masses, were all represented there, and what took place has been fully reported in the county papers. I have circulated it to your Lordships this morning. Three other resolutions were passed, but I will only trouble the House with one more. One was praying the Government to send Commissioners to hold an inquiry in Milford, so that the cesspayers in these districts may have the same opportunity of expressing their opinions as has been granted to Letterkenny, Dunfanaghy, Bunbeg, places all on one side of the barony. Another resolution was praying that the line which I have sketched by the letters A Q Z should be scheduled and inquired into on its merits. Now, my Lords, I would only make further one or two short references to the Grand Jury, and I desire to do so with every courtesy that I can. In the first place, the Grand Jury was summoned by the High Sheriff, who was a promoter of the line that was disapproved of by the Commissioners, and which the Grand Jury appear to have adopted. I do not think the High Sheriff should have acted as a promoter; but I believe that it was an unintentional blunder. I do not wish to imply that he packed the jury in any way, I merely mention it as a fact. The mover of the resolution was also a promoter of a line opposing the Commissioners' line; and in promoting his line he used, as he had a perfect right to do, every technical means that his skill could devise to impede the advantages of this Act in the district in which this great meeting which I have spoken of was held. In taking that course he was endeavouring to secure his own interests and the interests of his neighbourhood as he had a perfect right to do; but when he carried his promoters' tactics into the Grand Jury, I think he committed a very grave and serious error of judgment; and I would ask your Lordships, who are familiar with the practice of magistrates, whether we have not got precedents against such a course? Take the Bench, or take first of all your own Parliamentary Committees. I apprehend that the Grand Jury is, as nearly as possible, analagous in the work it has to preform on this occasion to your Parliamentary Committees. Would it be allowed for a moment that a Peer or Member of the other House should be deeply interested in promoting a line, and yet should be sitting upon one of your Parliamentary Committees? I apprehend not, my Lords. Parliament has, to a certain extent, lost control over the working of this Light Railways Act by committing it to the Grand Jury. We have no control over the Grand Jury, and I am not aware that there is any Executive control in any way over the Grand Jury. The Grand Jury which acted in this case is, so to speak, dead. The matter will possibly be dealt with again by the same Grand Jury, but not necessarily so, at the Summer Assizes. Therefore it is, my Lords, that I have endeavoured to influence the great voice of public opinion in this matter, so that it shall not be possible for a promoter to act in the face of public opinion as a judge in his own cause. I fear the Grand Jury have not risen to the occasion. Parliament has confided to them a great responsibility, and I trust that some good may come at the Summer Assizes from this Motion. Before I sit down I should like to say that I think the Government should exercise the greatest supervision that is possible over the administration of this, as I believe, great healing measure. My desire is that it should reach not merely the homes, but that it should reach the hearts of the people in the congested districts. I desire to move that the Report and the Evidence taken before the Commissioners be laid upon the Table.

Moved—

“That the Report of the Commissioners and the Evidence taken before them, under the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, with reference to the Letterkenny and Dunfanaghy Line be laid upon the Table.”—(The Lord Clements, E. Leitrim.)

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I think the House will hardly wish me to follow my noble Friend into all the subjects upon which he has touched in his, if he will forgive me for saying so, discursive speech. I think it would hardly assist us in arriving at a conclusion upon the question he has raised if I were to discuss with him what is the real meaning of the term “congested districts.” No doubt that is a matter which it is somewhat difficult to explain to the satisfaction of all; and, as I understand, he merely alluded to the congested districts, because he considered that the Light Railways Act of the Government, was intended, to some extent at all events, to benefit those districts. Therefore, I do not think I need allude any further to that matter. But, my Lords, the noble Earl made some general remarks upon the working of the Light Railways Act, and he came after a time to the discussion of the particular case to which I think he intended in the main to direct the attention of the House.

*THE EARL OF LEITRIM: No; to its working.

EARL CADOGAN: The noble Earl gave as an instance certain railways, the points of which he defined by letters of the alphabet, and in a later portion of his speech he reminded us that those letters of the alphabet which he had previously named stood in reality for two places which he has named in the notice of his question. Therefore, I thought I was justified in imagining that the real object of my noble Friend was to call attention to the particular railway in which I believe he has an interest. He has called attention specially to the constitution of the Grand Jury, whose duty it was to decide upon the railway which is mentioned in the notice paper, and he referred to one of the members of that Grand Jury, who was personally, to a large extent, as I understood, interested in the alternative line which at that time was discussed; and he told us that, in his opinion, it was exceedingly improper that a man should in such an inquiry as that be a judge in his own cause, and should be called upon to decide a question in which he had a large pecuniary interest. I believe that is the argument really of my noble Friend. I cannot, of course, for one moment differ from my noble Friend's view in that matter; but I think he will admit it is not one in which Her Majesty's Government are competent to interfere. Nobody knows better than my noble Friend that the Government have nothing to do with the striking of a Grand Jury. There is no power even of challenging members of a Grand Jury; and it is impossible for the Government, in the review which they must ultimately make of these proceedings, to take into account the personal predilections or circumstances of any persons who serve upon the Grand Jury. Therefore, I am afraid to that extent I cannot offer my noble Friend any satisfaction. But I think perhaps the House will allow me, as the noble Earl has alluded to the general working of the Act, to state, in a few words, for the benefit of those who may not understand the matter as well as my noble Friend does, what has been the course adopted in deciding upon the various lines which are to be carried out under the Act. The several schemes which have been brought to the attention of the Government were sent to the Commissioners of Public Works on the 2nd September, and further Memorials were forwarded to the Commissioners as they were received. A notice was issued on the 25th October calling upon persons interested in any lines who had not already submitted Memorials or Statements to send them in before November 1. A list of lines to be scheduled was subsequently made out and embodied in an Order in Council passed on November 1. Immediately on receipt of the plans from the promoters of the several schemes the Board of Works summoned the several persons selected to make the public inquiries to a conference, when the most minute and detailed instructions were given to them as to the manner in which they should conduct their inquiries, and the nature of the Report to be furnished thereon. On January 6 formal appointments were issued to the several Inspectors to hold the inquiries, as set forth in an advertisement notice, which was published in the Local as well as in the Metropolitan papers, and all the plans and other documentary information furnished by the promoters, in accordance with instructions, were transmitted to the several Inspectors, with a request that their Report should be handed in not later than February 17, in order to enable the Board to complete their communications with the Treasury, and have the cases laid before the Grand Juries of the several counties concerned at the approaching Spring Assizes. They were also furnished with special maps showing the baronies and electoral divisions of the scheduled districts, and the fishery piers and harbours therein, together with statistics of population, taxation, and other matters bearing upon the subject of their inquiries. The last of the public inquiries, which were of a most exhaustive character, was closed on February 3. The Board of Works subsequently communicated to the promoters the result of the inquiries. But they have not yet furnished a General Report to the Government, who are, therefore, not yet in a position to come to a final decision in the matter. Therefore, I think my noble Friend will see that inasmuch as the Government have not yet received the General Report, it is impossible for them to deal piecemeal with one Report at a time from the different districts. It is quite obvious that if my noble Friend succeeded in inducing the Government to discuss with him this particular proposal with regard to his district, other noble Lords who are interested in other parts of Ireland will feel themselves entitled to call in question the decisions of the Grand Juries throughout the country. I think the noble Lord will see that it is impossible for the Government to encourage that method of procedure. He has also told us that there were no possible means of revision or control over the proceedings of the Grand Jury. I think in that he was inaccurate.

Earl Cadogan

*THE EARL OF LEITRIM: No; the noble Earl is referring, I suppose, to the Treasury?

EARL CADOGAN: At all events, if what is done does not meet with the approval of the Lord President in Council there is further power given in that respect. Under those circumstances, I hope my noble Friend will not be dissatisfied when I say that we are unable to lay this particular Report to which he alludes, with the evidence relating to it, on the Table of the House; but I can assure him that as soon as the Government have received the Reports from all the various districts, information relative to them all will be laid before Parliament.

*THE EARL OF LEITRIM: My Lords, the statement of the noble Earl is entirely satisfactory to me. It is just what I desired. I may say that the concluding part of the Motion was really formal in order to afford me an opportunity of speaking in reply. My speech was directed, perhaps, quite as much outside this House as to Her Majesty's Government, and I will not trouble your Lordships, therefore, with any further remarks.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

HERRING FISHERY (SCOTLAND) ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1st, and to be printed. (No. 55.)

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till
To-morrow, Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 28th March, 1890.

NATIONAL DEBT.

Return ordered—

"Showing at the close of each financial year, from 1835-6 to 1889-90, both inclusive, the aggregate Gross Liabilities of the State as represented by the Nominal Funded Debt, estimated Capital Value of Terminable Annuities, Unfunded Debt, and other Liabilities in respect of Debt, the estimated Assets, and the aggregate Net Liabilities, also the Exchequer Balances; and, showing at the close of each financial year, from 1835-6 to 1889-90, both inclusive, the Gross and Net Expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund on account of the National Debt, and other payments in respect of Debt."
—(Sir W. Harcourt.)

EAST INDIA (CRAWFORD CASE.)

Address for—

"Copies of, or Extracts from, Correspondence relating to Memorials from Members of the Civil Service as to the Mamlutdars incriminated in the Crawford Case."—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added to the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, the following Fifteen Members in respect of the Bankruptcy Bill: Mr. T. H. Bolton, Mr. Caine, Mr. J. A. Campbell, Mr. Chance, Mr. Handel Cossham, Sir Robert Fowler, Mr. H. H. Fowler, Mr. Gedge, Mr. Haldane, Sir E. Harland, Colonel Hill, Mr. Kelly, Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Mr. J. Lloyd Morgan, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Report to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS.

MINUTE OF LORD DUFFERIN OF 6TH NOVEMBER, 1888.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table the whole of the Minute of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava, as Viceroy and Governor General of India, dated 6th November, 1888, portions of which Minute have been already presented to Parliament?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): No, Sir; in view of the confidential nature of the circumstances, the Secretary of State cannot lay the Minute upon the Table.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask whether the object with which this Paper has been asked for both in this and the other House, and the object with which it was granted, was not to communicate to the House the views of the Governor General and other Indian Authorities?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to follow the argument of the hon. Gentleman; but speaking upon the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, I am prepared to say that it is not in the public interests that this Paper should be given.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the whole of this Minute has been printed in India, and that the withholding of it on the part of the Government may place in an unfortunate position the discussion which is likely to arise upon the Indian Council Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is possible that by a serious breach of confidence on the part of some one in the Public Service, what purports to be the Minute may have been given; but that would not justify me, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, in laying the Paper on the Table.

THE LATE MAHARAJA SCINDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the telegram of the Governor of India, on the 19th June, 1886, to the late Maharaja Scindia, was in reply to the dying request of His Highness, that his son should not be placed for instruction under a European tutor; and whether the Secretary of State will lay upon the Table the complete text of the letter the late Maharaja referred to in the previous answer of the Under Secretary, and of any reply thereto?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I shall be much obliged to the hon. Member if he will postpone this question. I have not been able to communicate with the Secretary of State to-day.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Will Monday do?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes; I think I shall be able to answer it on Monday.

MERCANTILE SHIPPING REGULATIONS IN INDIA.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Bill, so far as they affect foreign vessels loading or discharging in British ports, will apply (should they become law) to foreign vessels loading or discharging in Indian ports; and, if not, whether the Secretary of State for India will call the attention of the Government of India to the point, so that British subjects, whether English or Indian, may not be put at a disadvantage?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this question. The Bill would not apply to foreign vessels in Indian ports. It would, however, be open to the Government of India to enact analogous provisions.

SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: Arising out of that answer, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman who is now representing the India Office here if the Secretary of State will communicate with the Government of India upon the subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think my hon. Friend had better wait and see what the provisions of the Bill are.

IRELAND—DISTRICT INSPECTOR BIGLEY.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether representations have reached him that District Inspector Bigley, of Lurgan, lodged a complaint with the superior officer of a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, named Dennis Burke, that he had been seen walking in company with a Nationalist car owner, named John Byrne, of Portadown, and that, in consequence of the report, Burke was removed to another station; and whether the Government will take any action in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that the constable named was not transferred to another station on the grounds mentioned in the question, but because of his having absented himself from his station without leave.

IRISH FISHERIES.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries dealing with the damage done by the drainage works to the spawning grounds, and to the statement of the Inspectors that the works at Lough Allen and Killaloe will have an injurious effect on salmon and trout fishing in the Shannon, as the excavations will destroy the spawning beds, and that the same result will ensue on continuation of the works at Battle Bridge; and whether any modification or alteration will be adopted in connection with the drainage works which will prevent such damage to the important fishing interests?

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) also asked whether several communications have been received from the "Limerick Board of Fishery Conservators," requesting to be furnished with the Report of the Evidence taken by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries last year in the inquiry held by them along the Shannon as to the alleged injuries to the fisheries by the "Shannon drainage works," and the wholesale destruction of the salmon fry by the too sudden lowering of the sluice gates at Killaloe as also alleged; what was the nature of the Report on this inquiry, and will it be laid upon the Table; and what is the objection to the Report of the Evidence being supplied to the Board of Conservators at Limerick?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries have reported that the drainage works on the Shannon will injure the fisheries. The Board of Works hold an opposite opinion. The Fishery Inspectors' Report, and the observations of the Board of Works thereon, have been communicated to the Conservators of the river, who originally moved in the matter, and whose reply is now awaited.

DR. TANNER: Will no attention be paid to this Report by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries; will the suggestion of the Board of Works be adopted; are the representations of the Inspectors to be ignored?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My answer could not possibly have conveyed such an idea.

BALLYCOTTON PIER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the Grand Jury of the County of Cork have again refused to take over Ballycotton Pier from the Irish Board of Works; whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of Mr. Kirkby, M.A., C.E., that he found all the defects previously complained of more damaging to the structure, and that the pier was in a much worse condition, there being a distinct and appreciable settlement in the pier head, and the filling of the interior of the pier was also settling down and being washed away; and to the statement of General Thackwell, that he had also visited the pier and found it to be in a most unsatisfactory condition; and whether any steps will be taken during the coming season to remedy the defects and prevent further damage to the pier in question?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have not seen the Report of the County Surveyor, or heard of any action of the Grand Jury. I am informed that the pier was examined by the Board of Works' District Engineer on the 22nd of January last. He reported that on a comparison of the levels at several well-defined points he could find no difference since they were measured in 1888, nor in the batter of the walls. With the exception of differences in a few points, which are of no structural importance, the pier and breakwater were in a complete state of preservation. No repairs whatever have either been made or required since the transfer to the county on the 31st January, 1888.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that the hon. Gentleman has not heard that the Grand Jury has refused, for the fifth time, to take this pier over?

*MR. JACKSON: I had not heard, until the hon. Member's question appeared upon the Paper, that any further action had been taken by the Grand Jury. As I have said, careful measures have been taken from time to time, and I believe that there has been no change in the condition of the pier.

DR. TANNER: If the Grand Jury persist in their refusal to take the pier over will the Treasury endeavour to get the defects complained of remedied?

*MR. JACKSON: Either last year or the year before I told the hon. Member, in answer to a question, that the pier had been handed over in consequence of the Act, and it is not in the power of the Treasury or the Board of Works to interfere.

ALLEGED SEVERE SENTENCE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the report of the sentence inflicted on a young boy named Thomas Keefe, of Youghal, by Mr. Frank Hodder, R.M., from which it appears that Keefe was convicted on the unsupported evidence of a man named Josh Desmond; whether Mr. Hodder is correctly reported in Cork papers to have stated that he would sentence Keefe to six months' imprisonment with hard labour were it not for his youth; whether he is aware that the offence complained of was Keefe telling a man who spoke to and consulted him about the purchase of some cattle at Middleton Fair that the cattle were the property of a man who had occasioned the arrest of a mutual friend of theirs ; and whether an inquiry will be made into the circumstances of the case ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that Keefe is not a young boy. He admitted in Court that he is 17 years of age, and that he was a dealer in cattle on his own account. He was represented by a solicitor at the hearing of the charge. The statement in the third paragraph does not accurately represent the offence. The man who was intimidated by Keefe from buying Desmond's cattle did not consult Keefe on the subject, nor was an attempt made at the trial to show that Keefe had any previous knowledge of the man. Desmond deposed to these facts in Court and his testimony was unshaken on cross-examination by the solicitor for the defence. No evidence was brought forward on behalf of Keefe. The magistrates, on the evidence produced, ordered Keefe to find bail for his future good behaviour, or, in default, three months' imprisonment. The Court had judicial knowledge of the prevalence of boycotting at Middleton Fair. The presiding magistrate did announce that only for the youth of the defendant, and that it was his first offence, the magistrates would have inflicted a sentence of six months' imprisonment. Keefe has given the required bail.

DR. TANNER: Was he convicted on the unsupported evidence of Desmond ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have said that Desmond was a witness against him.

DR. TANNER: The only witness ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know ; but Desmond's evidence was unshaken on cross-examination.

DR. TANNER: Was it not the simple fact that the man who wished to purchase the cattle asked the boy Keefe whose cattle they were ; that the boy told him ; and it was upon that that the charge was made ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That does not appear to have been the fact, but contrary to the absolute fact.

DR. TANNER: What evidence was there against Keefe except that of Desmond ?

[No reply.]

DR. TANNER: This is positively disgraceful.

Dr. Tanner

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN :

I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how soon will the Land Sub-Commissioners sit again at Nenagh, County Tipperary, no Sub-Commission having been held for the Unions of Nenagh, Borrisokane, and portion of the Roscrea Union connected with Tipperary, since the month of November, 1888 ; and whether, having regard to this fact, and considering the position of the tenants in these districts, in many of whose cases notices have been served for nearly three years, the tenants being still obliged to pay the old rents, and that in several hundreds of cases under the Land Act of 1887 notices have been lodged for more than two years, in which cases the tenants would be entitled to be refunded by the landlords the difference in the sums paid by them since the passing of the Act, and the amounts of the judicial rents when fixed, he will facilitate the holding of the Commission in these districts at an early date ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that a Sub-Commission sat to hear cases from the district named during the months of January and February, 1889. All originating notices received before 31st October, 1887, were disposed of at that sitting. The Commissioners have arranged for a Sub-Commission to sit for this district at an early date.

SHANNON DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN :

I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to an answer which he gave on the 1st July last, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire (Mr. Smith-Barry), relating to the Shannon Drainage Works, namely—"That the Board of Works are of opinion that no serious injuries can result to the fisheries by these works," will he state on whose authority the Board of Works was guided in that opinion ; whether the Shannon Conservators think differently ; and whether the evidence taken by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries in their inquiry tended to disprove the statement in question ; and what amount of money was sunk in the drainage works at Killaloe, which were washed away by the recent floods?

*MR. JACKSON: I think, but I am not sure, that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has promised to lay certain Papers on the Table, which will, I understand, give the information sought by the hon. Member. As regards Killaloe, I would only refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him yesterday on the same subject.

MR. P. J. O'BRIEN: Will the hon. Gentleman be good enough to answer the last part of the question?

*MR. JACKSON: I am unable to answer it. I do not know.

DR. TANNER: Has any modification or alteration been adopted in regard to the drainage works of Killaloe?

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member will put the question on the Paper I will inquire.

POSTAL ACCOMMODATION AT NENAGH.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the cause of the long delay in the erection of the postal pillar boxes decided to be placed at certain points in the town of Nenagh, County Tipperary; and whether he will be pleased to have inquiry made?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I find that the new letter box in Barrack Street, Nenagh, to which it is presumed the hon. Member refers, was erected yesterday. The box has not been placed in position quite so quickly as usual, owing, I understand, partly to delay on the part of the contractors in supplying it, and partly to a difficulty which arose in regard to the site.

THE STATUTE OF EDWARD III.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state when the Return of the Statute of Edward III., ordered on 3rd instant, will be issued?

*MR. JACKSON: It is not a matter within the control of the Treasury; but I have made inquiry, and I am informed that this Return will, it is hoped, be issued in a few days.

VOL. CCCXLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

NET RENTAL IN IRELAND.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the term "net rental," used on page 3, Return C. 5879, Session 1889, and also on page 3, Return C. 5978 Session 1890, of the Sales of Land (Ireland), has the same meaning as that given to it in his speech in introducing the Land Purchase Bill; and, if not, what is its meaning?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Net rent, as used by the Land Commission, excludes only head rent, Crown rent, tithe rent-charge, and drainage charge, but includes rates payable by landlord. Under my Bill the tenant will never have to pay head rent, Crown rent, or tithe rent-charge; and net rent, or, as it should rather be called, net value, excludes all rates hitherto paid by landlord, but henceforth to be paid by the purchasing tenant.

ALLEGED BOYCOTTING AT CORK.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the statements in the Irish newspapers of the boycotting of the Reverend Matthew Kerr, Presbyterian minister of Cork; and if he can state whether the reports are accurate; and, if so, what the nature of the boycotting is?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There has been, and is, so far as I know, no boycotting, either in the proper acceptance of that word or in the modified sense of exclusive dealing, of the reverend gentleman in question. I understand that he thought he was looked coldly on by his clerical brethren, and, further, that he was not appointed to a prison chaplaincy to which he considered he had a claim. These would seem to be the proceedings which he chooses to describe by the very inappropriate term of boycotting.

MR. SEXTON: Has the right hon. Gentleman adopted the obvious course of inquiring from the reverend gentleman himself?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

THE RIVER BARROW.

MR. LEAHY (Kildare, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is his intention to bring in a Bill for the drainage of the River Barrow this Session ; and, if so, when does he purpose introducing it, and if it will be on the same lines as the one of last Session ?

G

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I shall bring in a Bill if I see a reasonable chance of passing it.

EVICCTIONS IN DONEGAL.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the lately-contemplated evictions on the Stewart and Swiney Estates in County Donegal have been abandoned in deference to any suggestions made on the part of the Irish Executive ; whether like suggestions were made to the agent of the Olphert Estate ; and, if so, by whom, and what was his reply ; how many families have been evicted on the Olphert Estate during the past week ; how many evictions were abandoned and by whose authority, and for what cause they were abandoned ; and whether the Government will propose by their Land Purchase Bill to enable tenants evicted, and more especially tenants evicted in congested districts on the seaboard since the Land Purchase Bill was introduced, to avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I must ask the hon. Member to repeat the question on Monday.

CHARGE AGAINST AN IRISH MAGISTRATE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any complaints have reached the Lord Chancellor of the conduct of Mr. Hugh Graham, J.P., of Rahoney, Dromore, County Tyrone, accusing him of drunkenness and threatening to assault a passenger in a railway carriage on the 27th of March, 1889, of being under the influence of drink while giving evidence in a Land Court on 23rd January, 1889, when Mr. Justice Litton had him removed from court by a policeman ; and of being on another occasion drunk at the Omagh Railway Station and annoying ladies, when a policeman who was asked to arrest him refused, on the grounds that he was on railway premises ; and whether the Lord Chancellor has inquired into these allegations, and with what result ?

Mr. Leahy

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I must also ask the hon. Gentleman to repeat this question on Monday, and, in the meantime, I will obtain information.

THE EXPLOSIVES ACT.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.) : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is competent to hold a secret Court of Inquiry under the Explosives Act ; and, if so, under what conditions and restrictions ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin) : It is quite clear that a magistrate acting in Ireland under the 6th section of the Explosive Substances Act, 1883, may examine witnesses on oath and take their depositions otherwise than in open Court. Should the examination take place in the presence of any person charged with the offence his counsel or attorney are entitled to be present as of right.

MR. M'DERMOTT.

MR. GILL : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. M'Dermott, an evicted tenant of the Clanricarde Estate, has now been 11 weeks in prison ; and whether, in view of the fact that he has been brought within the past week from Galway Gaol to Ballinasloe, and remanded for the tenth time for refusing to give evidence before a secret inquiry, and that he has on this, as on each previous occasion, offered to answer any questions put to him in open Court, under these circumstances, and considering the severe punishment this gentleman has now been subjected to, and the cost to the taxpayer involved in these frequent remands, he will now direct that Mr. M'Dermott be released ?

MR. MADDEN : This is a matter entirely within the discretion of the magistrate, with whom the Executive cannot interfere.

MR. GILL : Considering the utter futility of this proceeding up to the present moment, the great expense involved, and also the fact that Mr. M'Dermott has repeatedly offered to answer any question that may be put to him in open Court, will the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary exercise the discretion vested in him and order the man's release?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see anything in the argument of the hon. Gentleman that should affect the decision of the Government either one way or the other.

RICHARD PIGOTT.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Commissioner of Police sent an officer to Mr. Soames to ask him whether he had paid to the late Richard Pigott any of the notes which he sent, just before his flight, to his housekeeper in Dublin, and could he state what was the purport and date of Mr. Soames' reply; whether the police traced two of the notes for £10 and £5 as having been paid to Mr. Soames by his bankers upon his cheque; whether a constable then saw Mr. Soames, and upon what date, and with what object; whether Mr. Soames wrote, and on what date, complaining of the language used to him by the constable; whether any reply has been sent to this letter; and whether, having regard to the fact that a witness before the Special Commission absconded while under cross-examination, the Home Office have also ascertained, or will ascertain, to whom and when Mr. Soames paid the two notes, and who paid them to Pigott, and when?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first, third, fourth, and fifth paragraphs is in the negative. The answer to the second paragraph is in the affirmative. The police did endeavour to ascertain whether any person was responsible for the absconding of the witness Pigott. The inquiries made, of which I have already given the hon. Member the result, and the evidence given in Court having satisfied the police that Mr. Soames was not so responsible, any such inquiry as suggested in the last paragraph would be immaterial.

MR. COBB: Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that it has never been suggested that Mr. Soames was responsible? But have not the Home Office attempted to trace the notes to the actual person who paid them to Pigott?

MR. MATTHEWS: The police found that the two notes ultimately came from Mr. Soames; but whether they passed through Mr. Soames's hands or through the hands of some of his clerks was not a matter for the police to inquire into.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these notes were drawn by Mr. Soames from the bank before, according to his own evidence, he knew anything about Pigott?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given as complete an answer as I can. Mr. Soames drew the notes from the bank; they were subsequently found in the possession of Pigott's housekeeper; and therefore no further inquiry was necessary.

MR. COBB: The point is, who was the individual who placed those notes in Pigott's hands?

MR. MATTHEWS: I perfectly understand what the hon. Member means, and I have given him all the information I possess.

INSPECTOR JARVIS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will cause Frederick Jarvis, now and in 1888 in the service of the Criminal Detective Department, to be asked whether he was, in November or December of 1888, at Kansas City with two persons named Pinkerton, who have a private detective agency in the United States; whether he went with the two Pinkertons to Pueblo Colorado, and whether he went himself to Del Norte, which is close to the ranche belonging to P. J. Sheridan; whether his presence in Del Norte was in any way connected with the vicinity of the ranche to that town; and whether the Pinkertons' agency is employed by Her Majesty's Government?

MR. MATTHEWS: I repeat once again that Inspector Jarvis has never at any time been at or near Kansas City, or Del Norte, Colorado. The story of this officer's mission to Colorado is an absolute fabrication. I make this statement on the information of Jarvis's superior officer, who, of course, has taken proper means to satisfy himself of the facts.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Does the right hon. Gentleman himself know that Jarvis's superior officer has satisfied himself of these facts?

Mr. MATTHEWS: I have had the information communicated to me by Inspector Jarvis's superior officer as authoritative.

THE HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPT COMMISSION.

Mr. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can explain how it is that some of the volumes issued by the Historical Manuscript Commission in 1888 were allowed to appear without the valuable and exhaustive index which usually accompanies these interesting collections of manuscripts; and if, seeing that the value and usefulness of these volumes are largely enhanced by such an index, he will request the Historical Manuscripts Commission to prepare and publish an index to the manuscripts of the Duke of Rutland, the manuscripts of Earl Cowper, and any other volume of the series that is at present without an index?

*Mr. JACKSON: A question upon this subject was answered by the Under Secretary for the Home Department yesterday. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to repeat the question to my hon. Friend.

SERIOUS CHARGE AGAINST A WARDER.

Dr. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in connection with the murder of a prisoner in Strangeways Gaol, whether, in view of the fact that the warder Mitchell had been previously charged by the Governor of the Gaol in question with assaulting another delirious prisoner, any steps were taken by the Prison Commissioners to prevent the repetition of such an offence; whether Mitchell will be re-admitted into the prison service; whether, as Mr. Justice Grantham, in his charge to the jury, said that probably the day warder, Rappley, had been the cause of Gatchiffe's death, it is the intention of the Government to proceed against Rappley; and whether an inquiry will be instituted into the circumstances of the case, and take into consideration the suggestions of Inspector Captain Wilson?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): It is not the fact that Mitchell had been previously charged with assaulting a prisoner, and he was charged at the Assizes, not with murder, but with manslaughter, and was acquitted. Mitchell has not been re-admitted into the prison service, and will not be. I do not understand the Judge to have expressed an opinion as stated in the question. There is no evidence against Rappley which would justify proceedings being taken against him. The fullest inquiry has already been made into the whole of the circumstances, and every precaution will be taken in future to prevent the possibility of such an occurrence.

THE NEW FOREST.

Mr. COMPTON (Hants, New Forest): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his attention, or that of the Commissioners of Woods, &c., has been lately directed to the enclosure of some 50 acres of the open lands of the New Forest, in the parish of Boldre, in or about the year 1832; and if he could state under what powers these enclosures were made; if under the Act of 1 and 2 Will. 4, cap. 57, under what powers the Office of Woods, &c., now claim a fee simple in such land free of commoners' rights, and charge a rack rent for the same under a lease made to private Trustees?

Mr. JACKSON: Yes, Sir. The attention of the Treasury has been directed to the subject of my hon. Friend's question. These enclosures were made under the Act of 1 and 2 Will. IV., cap. 59, not 57, as stated in the question; and I am informed that, inasmuch as this land has been enclosed for more than 20 years, the rights of the commoners have been extinguished.

In reply to a further question by Mr. COMPTON,

Mr. JACKSON said: I understand that a record is kept in the Inland Revenue Department. I am not aware whether a record is also kept in any other office; but if the hon. Member will repeat the question I will answer it upon another day.

THE LAND TAX.

Mr. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the quota of land tax for each parish is permanently fixed by law, subject to reduction only on proof of redemptions effected within the parish; if the Land Tax Commissioners for the division have power to reduce the quota on such proof being given, or if an order or certificate of the Inland Revenue Department is required; if there is any, and what, appeal in cases where the full quota is levied after proof of redemption has been offered; and, if there is a record accessible to the public kept in the Inland Revenue Department, and in the several divisional offices, of the various properties which have been from time to time exonerated from Land Tax by redemption, and of the quotas as they at present stand?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The answer to the first question is, yes. As to the second question, the quota can only be reduced upon receipt of an authority under the hand of the Registrar of Land Tax or his deputy, who are officers of the Inland Revenue Department. As to the third question, an appeal can be made to the Land Tax Commissioners of the district, and their decision is final. The answer to the fourth question is, yes. A record is kept in both cases in the Inland Revenue Department.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

MR. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the account in the Daily News of 24th March, describing the continued ill-treatment of the Christian population of Armenia; whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or propose taking, any steps to ascertain the truth of these reports; and whether, in the event of their proving substantially correct, the Government are prepared to make any representations to the Turkish Government with a view to protecting the Armenians from a continuation or recurrence of such outrages?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The account given in the Daily News of the 24th states from Vienna, on the authority of intelligence from Constantinople, that the Patriarch has received from the chief Armenian ecclesiastical authority in Van a letter giving full details of several cases of murder, pillage, and outraging of women; as Her Majesty's Government have not seen the letter referred to they are at present without the particulars which are necessary for them to consider whether any fresh instructions should be sent to Her Majesty's Ambassador. The hon. Member will find, at the last page of Turkey No. 1, 1890, the instructions sent to Sir W. White on the 24th of January, which direct his Excellency to take every fitting opportunity to impress upon the Government of the Sultan the danger of allowing the continuance of such a state of things as had been shown to exist in the districts of Van, Bitlis, and Mush. Reports have been received that the lately appointed Vali of Bitlis, Raouf Pasha, has exerted himself greatly to check disorders.

MR. LEVESON GOWER: Do the Government propose to inquire into the truth of the newspaper account to which my question refers?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We cannot undertake to make inquiry into the truth of all newspaper statements which are made in an anonymous paragraph and professedly at third hand.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Is there any reason, when statements of this character have been made, why the right hon. Gentleman should not communicate with the Ambassador and inquire from him whether they have been confirmed?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Reports of this character have been contradicted and shown to be without foundation repeatedly. If the occurrences referred to in the newspaper have taken place I feel sure that they will be brought to the notice of the Government in the ordinary course.

MR. BRYCE: I hope my hon. Friend will repeat the question.

SCOTCH SALMON FISHERIES COMMISSION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Royal Commission on Scotch Salmon Fisheries have concluded their proceedings; whether, in addition to examining those who are officially responsible for what has been done, they have given the fishermen round the coasts and fishers on the rivers full opportunity of explaining their grievances; and how many of them have been examined?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigtonshire): As I had the honour of being Chairman of this Commission, perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. The Commissioners have concluded their inquiry, and will shortly meet to consider their Report. Every opportunity was given to fishermen interested in the question to give evidence, notice having been inserted in the newspapers of the meetings and inviting the attendance of witnesses. None, however, came forward, except at Berwick-on-Tweed and Dumfries, at each of which places the Commission held a meeting. The evidence of 12 fishermen was offered and taken.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Where did the Commissioners sit? Did they visit the localities along the coast in order to give an opportunity to the fishermen to be heard?

SIR H. MAXWELL: The Commissioners held sittings in Edinburgh, and also at any other place where they were invited to go.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Were they invited to go to any place on the East Coast?

SIR H. MAXWELL: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) invited them to visit Berwick, and they went there. They were also invited to go to Dumfries, on the West Coast.

FEMALE CLERKSHIPS IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the Civil Service Commissioners can state the shortest period within which they will hold the next examination for female clerkships in the General Post Office; and if the Commissioners will consider the advisability of holding these examinations at regular stated intervals, so that candidates may not lose time and money in preparing for an examination which may not be held till after they have passed the limits of age?

*MR. JACKSON: The Civil Service Commissioners inform me that they are unable to state within what period the next examination for female clerkships in the General Post Office will be held. The date must depend on the requirements of the Service.

THE MEDICINE STAMP ACT.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the varying decisions that have been given by the Inland Revenue Department as to what medical preparations need the patent medicine stamp and what do not; and whether he can take steps to amend the Medicine Stamp Act, or to secure its more uniform administration, or otherwise endeavour to allay the dissatisfaction felt amongst chemists and druggists on the subject?

*MR. GÖSCHEN: My attention has been from time to time called to complaints of varying decisions given by the Inland Revenue Department in this matter, but there appears to be no general dissatisfaction, and the trade has manifested no general desire for the amendment of the Medicine Stamp Act. Every attempt, however, has been made to secure its uniform administration. In addition to issuing a summary of the Medicine Stamp Law with observations thereon for the guidance of chemists, the Inland Revenue Department has undertaken at the request of the trade to advise as to the liability involved by the use of labels. These labels number some thousands per annum, and it is almost unavoidable that varying decisions should occasionally be given considering the many relaxations from the comprehensive charge imposed by law.

CHARGE AGAINST PUBLICANS.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to a case at the Derby Borough Court on Thursday 20th March, when two publicans were summoned for supplying liquor to a drunken man, Alfred Hall, who died shortly after, and in whose case the verdict was "death from apoplexy, caused by excessive drinking;" whether the magistrates, having come to the unanimous decision that both of the defendants were guilty, fined one of them 40 shillings, and the other one 20 shillings, without endorsing either of their licences; and if this be correct, whether he will consider the expediency of legislating to provide more efficient measures for preventing this class of offences?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Justices that the facts are as stated. The defence of the landlords was that it was not noticeable to them or to their servants that the deceased was the worse for drink, and they gave evidence themselves and called witnesses to prove that the man was not drunk. The magistrates considered the case proved; but, having regard to the previous good character of the defendants, and to the fact that they did not know the deceased was drunk, they did not endorse their licences. I think the discretion of the Justices can be safely trusted in such cases; and I do not see any necessity for an amendment of the law.

SIR W. LAWSON: Is it not the duty of a publican to know when a man is drunk?

[No reply.]

ENFIELD SMALL ARMS FACTORY.

CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, considering that the inhabitants about, and the workmen employed in, the Government Small Arms Factory at Enfield have subscribed largely towards public baths and wash-houses for the use of the Government hands, and that Trinity College, Cambridge, has given the site, also that when completed the Local Board have signified their willingness to take them over, the Government can see their way to give a small grant towards the cost of their erection?

MR. JACKSON: This question has been most carefully considered at the Treasury with a view to meet, if possible, the wishes of the inhabitants at Enfield, and the Treasury would have been glad, had the Local Board adopted the Public Baths and Washhouse Acts, to contribute the Government quota towards the rates. The Treasury, however, in view of the number of places at which the Government employs large numbers of workpeople, were compelled to the conclusion that they ought not to contribute to the capital cost of the baths. I am glad to observe that my hon. Friend states that the baths when complete will be taken over by the Local Board, and if there is power and a rate is levied for the cost of maintenance the Government will gladly contribute its quota.

MILITIA CAPTAINS' CONTINGENT ALLOWANCE.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, in reference to Army Order No. 84, which deprives Captains of Militia of their contingent allowance, how armourers' charges for repairing and oiling arms, company stationery, and other minor charges will in future be met; and if he will state how many men in course of the training of their regiments during 1889 died or deserted; what was the total amount of their debtor balances; and what was the total amount of the contingent allowance paid to Captains of Militia for that year?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The charges for repairing and oiling arms will fall upon the allowance granted to the officer commanding the corps under Articles 774 and 775 of the Militia Regulations. Company stationery will be provided from the Regimental Contingent Fund allowance under Article 770. Other minor charges must be more clearly defined before I can say how they will be met. The records for 1889 are not yet sufficiently complete to enable me to answer the latter part of the question; but, practically, captains of companies are relieved of all liability on account of debts contracted by their men while out for training, and also of the debtor balances of men who die or desert. They are thus gainers rather than losers by the new Regulations.

SEVERE SENTENCES — CASE OF J. THORNTON AND J. HAIGH.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that Joseph Thornton and John Haigh were, on the 4th of March, at Durham, sentenced by Mr. Justice Day to six and seven years' penal servitude for assaulting a gamekeeper; and whether he is aware that, though the men in question were found poaching by the gamekeeper, it was close to the road, and in the day time; that no previous convictions were proved against them; and that no more dangerous weapon than a turnip was used in the assault; and, if so, whether he will make further inquiries with a view to considering the justice of the sentences?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen a newspaper report of this case, from which I gather that the gamekeeper was brutally ill-treated by the prisoners, who knocked him down, kicked him, tried to strangle him, and beat him about the head with a turnip until he became unconscious and received injuries from which he was still suffering after four months. The Judge, in summing up, called attention to the fact that there was no provocation whatever. Unless the hon. Baronet is in a position to place before me any new facts which were not before the Judge at the trial, I should not feel justified in interfering with the sentence.

RIGHTS OF WAY IN SCOTLAND.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, seeing that the Representatives of Scotland in this House on Tuesday week, in the proportion of nearly seven to one, voted in favour of entrusting to the County Councils the duty of maintaining and protecting rights of way in Scotland, the Government will bring in a Bill to give effect to the clearly expressed wishes of the Scottish people on this subject?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Government have given their attention to this subject, with every desire to meet the wishes of hon. Members. While in the present state of public business the Government are not prepared to propose legislation, they will be ready to give their candid consideration to any Bill which may be introduced by a private Member.

TORPEDO PRACTICE IN THE MEDWAY.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the result of the inquiries promised to be made regarding the explosions of torpedoes in the River Medway, and the consequent injury caused to the fishing industry in that river?

Sir Edward Grey

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Unfortunately torpedo practice cannot be carried on without injury to fish in the neighbourhood of the experiments; but so far as can be ascertained there is, and for many years has been, very little fishing in the Medway so far up as the mine-fields of the School of Military Engineering. No complaints appear to have been made at all recently to the Military Authorities.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. ROBERT SPENCER (Northampton, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the maximum rates which the Board of Trade may agree upon with the Railway Companies will increase the actual rates to be charged for the conveyance of agricultural and dairy produce?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member will understand that the whole question is now under consideration, and that it is not possible for me at this stage to say anything as to the relation of future maxima rates to present actual rates.

MR. COBB: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Report or the result of the Railway Rates inquiry will be laid before the House?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not surprised at the hon. Member's question. The inquiry has lasted a great deal longer than I thought it would. I will do my best to bring the result before the House in the present Session, in the manner contemplated by the Act.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): May I ask if it is not the fact that maximum rates do not affect the actual rates charged?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I thought that everybody understood that.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the following Reuter's telegram from St. John's, Newfoundland:—

"An immense demonstration and mass meeting of colonists took place here yesterday in connection with the Fisheries Question. Resolutions were unanimously passed indignantly protesting against the modus vivendi recently arrived at on the subject between France and England. The meeting authorised Memorials to be drawn up to the Queen and the Imperial Parliament, demanding the extinction of French claims in the island, and appointed delegates to urge in London the importance of the present crisis ;”

and whether, in view of the strong feeling in Newfoundland, the Government will take steps to open up fresh negotiations with France, in order that a fresh modus vivendi may be arrived at on the Fishery Question, which will meet with the sanction of Newfoundlanders?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have seen the Report telegraphed. The House will see that no modus vivendi could be arrived at which would satisfy those who desire the extinction of French claims in Newfoundland. The matter in question is the respective rights of British and French fishermen under a certain Treaty. Her Majesty's Government and the French Government are approaching a basis of settlement; and, in the meantime, have agreed that without compromising principles or rights involved, the status quo as regards lobster-fishing and factories on the so-called French shore shall be maintained, thus obviating temporarily causes of dispute and possible conflict. The modus vivendi only applies to the season now opening. I may add that three days ago the modus vivendi was violently attacked in the French Chamber, and the right of the colonial fishermen to catch lobsters on the French shore at all was energetically denied by the Minister. A modus vivendi is therefore necessary. I think I have already stated that the despatch explaining the steps which led to the modus vivendi and giving the full text of it had not reached Newfoundland when the meeting in question was held. It will, in fact, not reach the Colony till next week. The policy of the arrangement will then be better understood.

MR. W. REDMOND: In view of the extraordinarily excited state of public feeling in Newfoundland over this question will the Government take the earliest opportunity of cableing the full text of the arrangement with France?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have repeatedly expressed a wish that the Premier of Newfoundland should visit this country; and they think it very desirable that delegates from the Colony should attend here, in order that British interests may not be injured by action hastily taken by persons in the Colony without full information.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is not the excitement in Newfoundland due to the fact that the full nature of the arrangement come to is not understood; and, if so, will Her Majesty's Government send out a full account? Will the Premier of Newfoundland, who has been invited to visit this country, be consulted before any final arrangement is come to?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have stated that a despatch giving all information is on its way to Newfoundland; but I cannot venture to indicate what may be done in the future. No doubt the feeling of the Colony will be consulted.

THE REVEREND J. DOBIE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has now received information with regard to the imprisonment of the Reverend J. Dobie at Hodeidah; and what steps have been taken to obtain redress for the ill-treatment he has undergone?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No information has yet been received. Inquiry will be made of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople as to what are the circumstances of the case?

THE FISHERY BOARD BILL.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Fishery Board Bill promised by the Government, will be introduced before the Easter Recess, in order that it may receive due consideration by the classes interested therein?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I hope this Bill will be introduced shortly after Easter.

EDUCATION STATISTICS.

MR. JOHN TALBOT (University of Oxford): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the Education Statistics for the year 1889 will be laid upon the Table?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The statistics to which my

hon. Friend refers have been laid upon the Table this afternoon. It may be for the convenience of the House to know that the Revised Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors in connection with the new Code have also been presented to-day, and will be in the hands of Members as soon as possible.

CIVIL SERVICE, SECOND DIVISION.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the Order in Council of 21st March regulating the future position of the Second Division of the Civil Service, whether it is intended in future to promote into the higher grade, or otherwise specially remunerate beyond ordinary members of the Second Division, clerks whose duties involve the superintendence of other clerks, or are otherwise of a more responsible character than the duties of the generality of their colleagues?

MR. JACKSON: The Order in Council of March 21 makes promotion into the higher grade of the Second Division of the Civil Service dependent on positive merit. Apart from such promotion, the Treasury stated in their Minute of August 10 last their concurrence with the Royal Commissioners that clerks of the Second Division of proved merit should be selected for a certain number of special posts, and should be eligible also for appointment to the Upper Division in case of exceptional fitness. The condition of not less than 10 years' service laid down in Clause 18 of the Order in Council of February 12, 1876, governing such promotions, has been altered by the Order in Council of March 21, 1890, to a requirement of eight years' service. These are the provisions for specially rewarding clerks of the Second Division.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Will the hon. Gentleman lay the Order in Council upon the Table?

MR. JACKSON: Yes; I shall be glad to do so.

REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to resume the attempt on which they entered in the Session of 1888, to reform the constitution of the other House of Parliament?

Sir W. Hart Dyke

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only speak of the intentions of the Government so far as the present Session is concerned. I must remind the hon. Member that a little later in the Session than this the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in referring to a proposal which was before the House of Lords in 1888 for the reform of that Body, remarked that it was a subject which "in its natural dimensions would require the fresh, unbroken, and virgin energy of the House." I think the business already before the House for the present Session is not of a character which would permit of "fresh, unbroken, and virgin energy" being given to the consideration of the important measure to which the hon. Member refers.

MR. BRYCE: If the right hon. Gentleman considers the question still of such importance, does he desire the House to understand that he proposes to resume it in another Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am always extremely reluctant to enter upon any indefinite undertaking.

CATTLE DISEASE.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether it is true that no cattle disease has been reported to exist in the Netherlands; and, if so, whether he will instruct the authorities to relax the restriction placed upon cattle and sheep coming from those ports?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): There is no disease in the Netherlands, so far as we are informed; but it prevails extensively in Germany, and at no great distance from the Netherlands frontier. As a matter of fact, animals from the Netherlands are now admitted into the interior of this country, and are not even subject to the Order to slaughter at the port of debarkation. But, in view of the danger of disease crossing the Dutch frontier in spite of the precautions of that Government, the English Inspectors at the ports, in the exercise of the duties imposed upon them by statute, detain the animals for a certain number of days at their discretion, so as to insure their being free from contagious disease, before they are allowed to pass into the interior of the country. It would not be wise or desirable, in my opinion, to relax those precautions at present.

MR. MUNDELLA: May I ask why, if there is no disease in the Netherlands, cattle from that country should be sent to compulsory slaughter?

MR. CHAPLIN: It is quite true that just now the cattle in the Netherlands are free from disease, and, as far as I know, from the precautions which have been taken, they have been free from disease for a considerable period. But, on the other hand, there has been a good deal of smuggling of animals over the frontier from Germany.

PRIVILEGE.

SIR W. MARRIOTT AND MR. PARNELL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I desire, Sir, to ask the right hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Sir W. Marriott) a question of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether the report on the leader page of the Times of yesterday of a speech delivered by him on Wednesday evening at a meeting of a body called the United Club, held at St. James's Hall, is correct?

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): As a point of order, Sir, I wish to ask you whether a question can be put by one hon. Member to another unless such question refers to some Bill or Motion before the House?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Brighton holds an official position, and therefore the question can be put.

SIR W. MARRIOTT (Brighton): I have only a few minutes ago received notice of this question. Unlike most Members of this House, I do occasionally read the report of my speeches, and I have read the report of my speech of last Wednesday in the Times of yesterday. Though not verbatim, it was, according to my recollection, a very accurate report.

MR. SEXTON: I have, then, to call the attention of the House to a matter of privilege. In order to ground the case of breach of privilege, I hope the House will allow me to read a brief extract from the Report of the Special Commission. The Commissioners say, on page 58 of the Report—

"The third charge we have to consider is that, when on certain occasions the respondents thought it politic to denounce and did denounce certain crimes in public, they afterwards led their supporters to believe that such denunciation was not sincere. This was chiefly based on the letter known throughout the inquiry as the fac simile letter. We find that all the letters produced by Pigott and set out in the Appendix are forgeries, and we entirely acquit Mr. Parnell and the other respondents of the charge of insincerity in their denunciation of the Phoenix Park murders."

Having read that extract from the Report of the Commission, I propose to bring to your notice, and the notice of the House, three extracts from the report of the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Brighton, on Wednesday, at the United Club, which the right hon. Gentleman has just admitted in the presence of the House to be substantially correct. This, Sir, is the first extract—

"When the Report of the Commission came to be examined in all its details, he might venture to say that, on the whole, the Times had substantiated the points upon which they started."

I denounce that statement as untrue. The charges upon which the inquiry was demanded and upon which it was conceded were charges of complicity in crime on the part of Members of this House. These were the only charges in which the Irish Members and the country were interested—charges of intimacy with murderers, of payments to criminals for the commission of crime, and to secure the escape of criminals; and all those charges have been repelled by the Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman, by his votes in this House on the 10th and 11th of this month, concurred in the adoption of the Report of the Judges. What, then, are we to think of the man who, after giving his vote concurring in such Report, within a fortnight afterwards declares that these heinous charges have been proved? He further said—

"It should be recollected that the letters which had been so much spoken of were not the charge against Mr. Parnell and his friends. They were only evidence of the charge. Disproof of the letters did not disprove the charge."

And then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the charge had been "substantiated." What is the charge that he says has been substantiated?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman has asked the permission of the House to raise a matter of privilege; but he is now making a statement and entering into arguments as to the meaning and effect of a speech delivered by an hon. Member of this House outside this House. Matters of privilege are much restricted. It is usual in such cases to read the incriminated passages to the House, and then we have to see whether they constitute prima facie a case of privilege. But, so far, the hon. Gentleman is stating to the House his version of what the right hon. Gentleman said. If he will hand the passages of the report to the Clerk at the Table they can be read to the House.

MR. SEXTON: Then I move that the passages which I have marked in the speech of the hon. Member for Brighton be read by the Clerk at the Table.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member will bring the paper to the Table the Clerk will read the passages referred to.

MR. SEXTON: I have only one copy, and I desire to have it back.

Complaint made to the House by Mr. Sexton, Member for West Belfast, of certain passages in a speech delivered at the United Club by the Right Hon. Sir William Marriott, Member for Brighton, and reported in the Times newspaper of Thursday, the 27th March, reflecting on certain Members of this House, which he submitted constituted a breach of the Privileges of this House:—

The said newspaper was handed in, and the passages complained of were read, and therewith, at the request of the Right Hon. Sir William Marriott, the context also, as followeth:—

“When the Report of the Commission came to be examined in all its details he might venture to say that, on the whole, the Times had substantiated the points upon which they started, and the result of the Commission was to justify the action of the Unionist Party in the year 1886. It should be recollected that the letters which had been so much spoken of were not the charge against Mr. Parnell and his friends. They were only evidence of the charge. Disproof of the letters did not disprove the charge. The charge which was sought to be proved by the letter was that Mr. Parnell was insincere in his denunciation of the Phoenix Park murders. Of what was that letter evidence? For his part, he never thought so much of the letter as many people did, because he thought it a very natural letter under the circumstances. Mr. Parnell was in alliance with these people, he was paid from the same funds, and he had the unpleasant task of denouncing his allies. He believed that Mr. Parnell had a perfect horror of the murders, and that he might have known they did more harm than they could possibly do good to his cause; but he was bound to take off the rough edge of the denunciation he was compelled to give of the crime. If Mr. Parnell had written the letter he did not think he would be in a bit worse position than he now was placed in by the Report of the Judges. The Times had entirely established its case, namely, that Mr. Parnell was acting in alliance with others wanting separation, that he and his Parliamentary colleagues had no complicity in the illegal means taken to advance their common end by his allies, and that the letter was only one proof of the charge brought against them, which charge had been substantiated before the Commission. The Report was very satisfactory in some points, but with regard to others there was still a mystery. There was still a mystery over the letters, and there was still a mystery over the question how that £100,000 had been spent. The Report found that the letter sometimes called the fac simile letter was a forgery. What was a fac simile letter but a letter like another letter that had been written? What was a forgery? It might be a pure invention, and the person whose name was used had never signed such a letter, or it might be a copy of an original document. That subject was left in the dark by the Report of the Commission. The Parnellite Party complained that the Judges did not denounce the Times for its negligence with regard to these letters. He knew Her Majesty's Judges extremely well, and he would undertake to say that they had always good reason for either saying something or omitting to say something.”

Mr. Speaker

MR. SEXTON: I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that the extracts read by your direction by the Clerk at the Table from the report of a speech the accuracy of which has been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman constitute a gross breach of the privileges of the House. I first call attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman says that the Times has, on the whole, substantiated its charges before the Commission. I denounce that statement as unfounded, and I say that with regard to all these heinous charges the Irish Members, as is universally admitted, have been absolutely acquitted. Now, I come to the passage with regard to the forged letters. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“It should be recollected that the letters which had been so much spoken of were not the charge against Mr. Parnell. They were only evidence of the charge. Disproof of the letters did not disprove the charge. The charge which was sought to be proved by the letters was that Mr. Parnell was insincere in his denunciation of the Phoenix Park murders. Of what was that letter evidence? . . . The letter was only one proof of the charge brought against them, which charge had been substantiated before the Commission.”

I ask the House what charge has been substantiated? I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to define it in precise terms.

*MR. SPEAKER: I have listened to the hon. Member, and I am bound to say that this is not a case of privilege. It is the first time I have heard the passage or anything connected with it; but it is not a case of privilege—that I am clear about, having listened to the whole statement. It is a matter of argument as to the conclusions drawn by an hon. Member from a certain decision of the Judges, as to which every hon. Member is at liberty to affirm his own conclusions. Whether those conclusions are just or unjust is a matter of opinion, and the right hon. Gentleman advances this statement on his own credit and on his own responsibility. As to this being a matter of privilege, the passages in question do not relate to the action or to the conduct of any hon. Member in this House, and this is the point to which privilege is restricted in cases like the present. I, therefore, do not consider this a case which I could properly submit to the House as a breach of privilege.

MR. SEXTON: Allow me to submit a few considerations. This speech arises out of a number of charges now ascertained to be false, made against a number of Members of the House. Those Members besought the Government to afford them means of investigation, and the Government appointed a Judicial Tribunal. That Judicial Body found certain charges to be false, and reported to that effect. The House is seized of the Report and of the findings of the Commission with regard to certain charges; and I humbly ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is still competent for a Member of this House to declare that the charges found by the Commission appointed by this House to be false, are proved?

*MR. SPEAKER: That does not in the least alter the case. The whole of the quotations made by the hon. Member have been comments on the decision of the Judges; and provided they are made in such a way that they do not reflect upon the action of Members of this House—[Mr. W. REDMOND: Oh!] The hon. Member does not understand what privilege is if he interrupts me in that manner. I say that privilege is restricted in this House, and comments, unjust or unfair though they may be—I say nothing of their justice or fairness —it is competent for any hon. Member to make, and to state the judgment he has formed as to the decision of the Commissioners. If every hon. Gentleman's speech commenting on the Report of the Judges is to be brought up as a question of privilege the time of the House would be entirely occupied with such questions.

MR. SEXTON: I wish first to say that I was not the Member who interrupted you.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am quite aware of that.

MR. W. REDMOND: Mr. Speaker—

*MR. SPEAKER Order, order!

MR. SEXTON: I now beg to submit to you in regard to the forged letters, as to which hon. Members of this House from their places here have declared their innocence, that the right hon. Gentleman in maintaining in a public speech that those Members were guilty has made an imputation against them as Members of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not gather from the extracts read that the right hon. Gentleman did state that there was any responsibility attaching in regard to the forged letters to those hon. Gentlemen acquitted by the Commission. There was no charge of that sort made by the right hon. Gentleman, as I understood it.

MR. SEXTON: The learned Gentleman in his speech said that my hon. Friend the Member for Cork was responsible for the forged letters, for he said—

“What was a fac simile letter but a letter like another letter that had been written? What was a forgery? It might be a pure invention: and the person whose name was used had never signed such a letter, or it might be a copy of an original document. The subject was left in the dark by the Report of the Commission.”

I humbly submit to you that although the learned Gentleman admits that the letter forged by Pigott was a forgery, he suggests that it was the reflection of a genuine letter written by the hon. Member for Cork.

*MR. SPEAKER: Perhaps the best way would be to ask the right hon. Gentleman for an explanation on that specific point.

SIR W. MARRIOTT: I admit fully the accuracy of the report; but there are some points omitted which would afford an explanation, and there are also some words in my speech, the whole of which was not read, which would give the House a full idea of what was said. A great deal was said in no very serious way, but rather as chaff and banter. What I did say, and what does not appear, was this: I said it was reported that Mr. Parnell was going to ask for a Committee, and I said I thought that would be a great waste of time, and if he would take a friendly hint he would ask, not for a Committee, but for a friendly arbitration with the Times, with Lord Herschell as arbitrator. I further suggested that if Mr. Parnell was inclined to act in a friendly manner to the Times he should let the Times have the services of Mr. George Lewis; and the Times, by way of returning the compliment, might let Mr. Parnell have the services of Mr. Soames; while the senior Member for Northampton might come in as amicus curiæ, and then no doubt they would get at the facts as to the letters and the expenditure of the £100,000. But I never made a single charge against any Irish Member or against the hon. Member for Cork. I gave my interpretation of the Report of the Commission; that interpretation I am ready to maintain, and I think I am as well entitled to my opinion as other Members of the House are to theirs.

MR. SEXTON: I will not add another word. The right hon. Member, having made grave and deadly charges against Members of the House, now shelters himself behind what he calls chaff. I leave him to what he has deserved—the contempt of the House and the country.

MR. W. REDMOND: As a matter of personal explanation, I should like to explain that the involuntary exclamation which escaped me was not intended in any degree to interrupt you, Sir, or to cause any disrespect to you. It was merely a protest against the action of the hon. Member.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am glad to hear what has fallen from the hon. Member, and I quite accept his explanation that the exclamation was involuntary, and thank him for his courtesy.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS.

Return ordered—

"Of Copies of certain Objections and Suggestions received by the Charity Commission."
Sir W. Marriott

missioners from Public Bodies and others relative to the Central Scheme published by the Charity Commissioners in pursuance of 'The City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883,' for the regulation of the Charities comprised in the Second Schedule to that Act, and of the Replies of the Charity Commissioners thereto and to certain other like Objections and Suggestions."

"And, of certain Memoranda and Reports prepared by the Charity Commissioners or their Assistant Commissioners on Technical Instruction on Institutions combining Recreation with Education, and on Free Libraries."
—(Mr. Bryce.)

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

James Somervell, esquire, for Ayr District of Burghs.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill.

Army (Annual) Bill, without Amendment:—

That they have passed a Bill, intituled "An Act to enable Incorporated Companies to act as executors, administrators, and trustees, and in other fiduciary capacities." [Trust Companies Bill [Lords.]]

Also, a Bill, intituled "An Act for the appointment of a Public Trustee." [Public Trustee Bill [Lords.]]

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (ORDERS OF THE DAY.)

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give some intimation, in the event of the Tithes Bill being read a second time this evening, what day will be fixed for the Committee stage?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope on Monday, the 21st; certainly not before that day.

MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): Will the Allotments Bill be taken on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government propose to take Supply on Monday.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I think the reply a little ambiguous. The House would prefer to know positively whether the Allotments Bill will or will not be taken on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think my answer was sufficient. Supply is likely to take the whole evening. The Bill will not be taken.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): What business will be taken on Monday, April 14?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Supply will be taken.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What Supply?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say, but ample notice will be given.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Second Reading of the Tithe Rent-charge Recovery and Redemption Bill have precedence this day of all Orders of the Day, including the Committee of Supply."—
(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.50.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have not risen to oppose the Motion, but I wish to have some sort of understanding with the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of his persistent raids on the time of private Members. Apparently this demand is made in order to get an additional day for the discussion of the Tithes Bill; but, in point of fact, it really is asked in order to secure to the Government an additional day for the Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Easter vacation will not take place unless the Tithes Bill is read before Easter. Hon. Members intend to limit their eloquence on the Second Reading in order to secure that object. The Bill is to be discussed for two days; but no sooner had this arrangement been come to than the right hon. Gentleman said—"I must take Friday, and put down the Tithes Bill on that day, in order that I may be able to take Monday for Estimates." I have been unable to discover why the right hon. Gentleman thinks it necessary to have an additional amount of money before Easter. A few weeks ago he asked for a Vote on Account, and took a private Members' day. The Vote was for two months, an excessive term, and that amount might have carried the Government over Easter. If these things occur before Easter the House knows what will take place after Easter; not a single day will be left to private Members. I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be more reasonable when he wants extra time to have Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays? What causes me to hate the House is that hon. Members never can get any definite knowledge of what they are going to do a week in advance. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to have some compassion upon hon. Members, to consider that we are very long-suffering persons, and that he is the master of many legions. He might at least make some arrangement whereby hon. Members could have time to themselves at any rate after 9 o'clock in the evening.

(4.54.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I know it is of no use protesting against the Resolution, although I have on the Paper to-day an important notice, and one the appropriateness of which will cease unless it can be brought on before the Budget Statement is made. I do, however, want to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he is hardly dealing fairly with private Members. It is said that private Members only indulge in destructive attacks on the Government, and do not help in constructive legislation. I have introduced a small Bill dealing with certain small points of interest, and as to which I was assured by the first Law Officer of the Crown that it met with the approval of the Government; but, notwithstanding that, progress with it has been stopped by a mere notice of an Amendment put on the Paper by one of the followers of the right hon. Gentleman. The Government, by their action in regard to private Members, are reducing Membership of the House almost to a farce, so far as constructive work is concerned.

*(4.56.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken will admit that he has not been unsuccessful in regard to legislation as a private Member, and that the Government have not been unwilling to render him assistance. As to the Motion which the hon. Member has on the Paper, I think that if he will wait until the Chancellor of the Exchequer explains the Budget, he will find that no opportunity has been lost by the postponement of that question. The hon. Gentleman who spoke as the representative of the humble and long-suffering Members of this House complains that he has no definite knowledge of what the House is going to do a week in advance. But may I point out that more than a week in advance I stated to the House that the Tithes Bill must be read a second time this week, and that Supply would be needed before adjournment for the Easter holidays. I have given as much notice as was possible in the circumstances. The senior Member for Northampton has recommended Morning Sitings for the conduct of public business. I will give the hon. Member an opportunity of supporting a proposal of that kind which I shall make immediately after Easter. I think it is my duty to ask the House to vote Supply as rapidly as it can, consistently with the proper discharge of its duties; and I do not think at any time the House has adjourned at Easter without having made some progress in Supply. I should like to correct one statement which I made a few moments ago. I do not wish it to be inferred that the Committee on the Tithes Bill will necessarily be taken on the 21st April, because the Second Reading of the Land Bill must precede the Committee stage of the Tithes Bill.

(5.1.) Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Second Reading of the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery and Redemption Bill have precedence, this day, of all Orders of the Day, including the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (SATURDAY SITTING).

Resolved, That this House do sit To-morrow at Ten o'clock; and that Mr. Speaker, as soon as he has reported the Royal Assent to the Bills which have been agreed on by both Houses, do adjourn the House without Question put.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

NEGOTIABLE SECURITIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Bill to amend the Law relating to Negotiable Securities, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Sir John Lubbock, Colonel Hill, and Mr. Salt.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 206.]

MARRIAGE (ACTIONS FOR BREACH OF PROMISE) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Roper Lethbridge, Bill to abolish actions for breach of promise of marriage, ordered to be brought in by Sir Roper Lethbridge, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Caine, Dr. Commins, and Colonel Makins.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 207.]

PUBLIC HOUSES (HOURS OF CLOSING) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Cameron, Bill to amend "The Public Houses (Hours of Closing) (Scotland) Act, 1887," ordered to be brought in by Mr. W. H. Smith

Dr. Cameron, Mr. McLagan, Mr. Mark Stewart, and Mr. John Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 208.]

PAROCHIAL BOARDS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Cameron, Bill to reform the constitution of Parochial Boards in Scotland, and the mode of electing the Members of such Boards, ordered to be brought in by Dr. Cameron, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. Shires Will, Dr. Farquharson, and Mr. Barclay.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 209.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY AND REDEMPTION BILL.

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [27th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and, at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Picton,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

*(5.7.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Maldon): As this question is one of considerable importance to the constituency which I represent, I hope the House will excuse me if I trespass upon its attention for a somewhat longer time than usual, inasmuch as I desire to review the history of the tithes question before I come to the criticisms I have to make—I hope in a thoroughly independent spirit—on the provisions of the Bill which is now before the House. This Bill is by no means the same Bill which was before the House last Session. The hon. Baronet the Member for Horsham (Sir W. Barttelot), said last night that I must of course support this Bill because it contains certain provisions for which I contended last Session, and I cannot but feel the force of that remark. At the same time I must say that this Bill takes entirely different ground in regard to other provisions. The hon. Member for Lanarkshire last night attacked the Bill from a religious point of view, but, as far as I am concerned, I shall deal with the measure entirely from an agricultural point of view. The hon. Member for Lanark stated that the Bill would confer no benefit on the tenant farmers. That is a statement with which I cannot agree, and as to which I shall have something further to say at a later period. In order that I may push home the points I wish to make, it will be necessary for me to remind the House of the position of the tithes question prior to the passing of the Commutation Act of 1836. At that period a great deal of irritation had grown up between tithepayers and tithe owners. As long as tithe was collected in kind, it was only natural that continual disputes should arise. It had even occurred that a farmer who was bound to contribute one-tenth of the produce of his land to the clergyman, had sent his flock of ewes on to another farm at the lambing season. That led up to a state of things somewhat similar to that observable now in some parts of England—namely, irritation between the tithe owner and the tithepayer. Every hon. Member on this side of the House agrees that the irritation is to be regretted, and that the Government in bringing the Bill before the House hope to remove every reasonable grievance and cause of irritation. Another reason for the passing of the Act in 1836 was to prevent the tithe owner from participating in the increased production of the land, owing to the increased capital and extra science the farmer brought to bear on the cultivation of the soil. The repeal of the Corn Laws after the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act seriously affected the interests of tithepayers. That was the time when the question of tithe ought to have been taken up by Parliament. I can hardly imagine how the landowners allowed such a change to take place without re-opening the tithe question. Possibly the reason might have been that the advocates of Free Trade told the people of England, and especially the farmers, that the change would not, to any great extent, interfere with the farming interest. It will be in the memory of hon. Members that Mr. Cobden and others, who fought so vigorously the battle of Free Trade, told the landlords and farmers of England over and over again that they would always have the natural protection for their corn produce, which was consequent on the cost of transit upon the corn shipped to this country by foreigners competing with us in our own markets. At that time, this doctrine was regarded as sound and reliable, and it is only of late years that we have found how mistaken was the view thus put before the country. But it may be asked how any relief from foreign competition could be expected from a Tithe Bill. It should be recollected that the scheme of the Commutation Act settled the matter on more than one base. It is true, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had said, that there was a field or farm apportionment which could not be re-opened, because the data upon which it was calculated were gone. This first base was derived from a consideration of what the tithes had been worth on the average, of seven years to the Tithe Receivers. That was the first basis of the legislation introduced by the Commutation Act. The next step was to take an imaginary hundred pounds' worth of tithe, made up of equal quantities of wheat, barley, and oats, and the price of that imaginary hundred pounds' worth was to increase and decrease, as the market prices fluctuated. Why was that barometer set up? I maintain that it was for the sole purpose of showing the capability of the land from which the crops were derived, for paying in the future larger or less sums of money as tithe. For years that barometer worked well; there was very little grumbling, and when the tithepayer and tithe owner met, it was very often over a good bottle of wine. There was no ill-feeling between the two. But then came the time when the barometer ceased to do the work for which it was set up, when it registered the tithes at from 8 to 10 and 12 per cent. above par, while the tithepayer felt that he was paying a sum of money which was not the produce of his business, but was eating into the very capital with which he carried on his business. An hon. Member last night said rather than do anything unfair to the tithe owner he would suffer ruin. I do not come here to ask the House of Commons to save me and my brother yeomen from ruin, if they can only do that by being unfair to the tithe owner; but if the barometer set up has ceased to do the work for which it was intended, I claim the right to ask the House to put something in the place of the barometer, that will act in a fair and equitable manner between the two parties. Last night we heard a great deal of the grievances of the clergy in Wales, and I sympathise with them very deeply. We have heard also that the tithepayers in Wales have a grievance. If so, I sympathise with the farmers there. When it is asked that the law should be strengthened to insist on the payment of a legal debt, I must say that I have no objection to that proposal. But if any step of that sort is taken, to my mind it is a re-opening of the settlement of 1836. If you re-open the settlement of 1836 for one purpose, then I say you must also listen to the demand to open it still wider for another. Last year the Bill brought in by the Government merely seemed to recognise that there was a grievance coming from the tithe owners, but there was no recognition of the grievance of the tithepayer. I then contended that if we re-opened the settlement of 1836 for the benefit of the tithe owners, we must also, at least, go a little further, and say that the landlord should be the person who actually handed over the cash to the tithe owner. The Government, I am glad to say, have adopted that principle, and it is, therefore, impossible for me to be very hostile to the Bill. I will pass to another provision. I contended also last Session that there must be some recognition of those cases where the tithe is greater than the rent. The proposal of the present Bill is that where the tithe is in excess of the rateable value, the landlord shall get redress. My objection to the proposal is this. Very rarely are farms of 300, 400, 500, and 600 acres assessed so low as I consider they ought to be. The reason is that there are wheels within wheels. Yeoman farmers owning land of that description consider the advisability of trying to get their assessment knocked down to the lowest point. In the first place, lowering the assessment would have the effect of raising the poundage which is levied from that assessment. And then, again, farms of this description are frequently mortgaged; and it is not to the interests of these men, farming their land under these conditions, to, using an old phrase, "cry stinking fish" of their own farms too loudly, because that would open the eyes of the mortgagees, and the probability is that, within a very short time, they would receive a letter from the solicitor to the mortgagee asking for a cheque in reduction of the mortgage. When you come to such a state of things as we have in the eastern counties it is very serious. I can say, without hesitation, speaking of the agricultural land of Essex, that the tithe is very nearly half the income derived from that land by the landlord. The barometer I have spoken of must have worked badly when such a state of things has arisen in a county close up to the very suburbs of this great Metropolis. To be a settlement for any length of time the Bill must contain provisions recognising the altered state of things I have alluded to. I am convinced that if the rateable value clause was not written with actual clerical ink, if there be such a commodity, there was a tithe owner not far away when the clause was drafted. That clause will not get the Government out of the difficulty. A good many intricate questions and complications will crop up, and if I have an opportunity in Committee I shall ask the Government whether the Assessment Committees, when making out the assessment of agricultural property for this purpose, will be directed to divide the assessment under two specific heads—one being the value they put on the land and the other being the value they put on the houses and buildings. I hope I am not making a speech that is unduly—I must not say hostile but independent. It is only right I should be frank and fair with the Government. I must acknowledge that they have behaved most handsomely to me. I have not had the slightest pressure put upon me. I am, therefore, enjoying my independence, and when the Bill gets in Committee I shall raise the point to which I have just alluded. In equity, the tithe owner has never had an atom of property in the bricks or wood of which the buildings are composed. ["Hear, hear!"] I am very glad to find I am in that opinion supported by Tory Members, for they, like Cæsar's wife, are beyond suspicion. There is no suspicion as to their idea of rights of property. If we are to be treated fairly on the point, if we are told that it will be admissible to deduct the rateable value of the buildings, I shall begin to look much more favourably upon this clause, which is an innovation from the Bill of last Session. Now, one of the Tithe Bills of the Government proposed to give 5 per cent. to the tithepayer in consideration of the strengthening of the law for the benefit of the tithe owner. There seemed something very fair about that proposition, because in a re-opening of the settlement of 1836 for the benefit of the tithe owner, there ought to be given a quid pro quo for the tithepayer. I trust that question will be raised in Committee. I now pass to the redemption clauses. In them we have taken up entirely new ground. It is to the redemption principle that I look for a fair settlement of this very difficult question, and the Bill goes so far in its scope that if it can only be hammered into a reasonable shape when it gets into Committee, it may possibly meet the case from the agricultural point of view. Last night the President of the Board of Trade said the redemption scheme provided in the present Act of Parliament was a dead letter, and I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentlemen that for all practical purposes it has been a dead letter. What do the redemption clauses in this Bill do for us? Up to 20s. there is machinery that may possibly be operative, but directly you get beyond that amount we find what, to my mind, will be a complete blank. First of all, before you can move a step the tithe owner and the tithepayer have to meet and agree that they will go in for redemption. I can imagine that, under certain circumstances, they may be able to do that, but that will not advance them much, because they have also to agree what the terms of the redemption are to be. Is there any probability that under existing circumstances any large number of tithe owners and tithepayers will be able to agree as to the number of years' purchase and so on? It must be borne in mind that the clerical tithe owner has only a life interest. I know some of them talk about being the Trustees of the Church, and I have no doubt when they say so they speak perfectly conscientiously. There are exceptions, but the great majority of English landlords have met these depressed times in a spirit of fairness that will do them credit as long as the name English landlord lasts. Knowing what has been done by the ordinary landlord, some farmers have approached their landlord No. 2, the clerical tithe owner. In a few cases landlord No. 2 has given a little remission, but I know cases in which the clerical tithe owner has said to the farmer asking for a remission, "My good fellow, I should be only too delighted to give you a remission. It is true I can afford it, for I have got other property, and I should like very much indeed to do what you want, but I cannot do it because I look on tithe as a sort of trust, and it would be unfair to those clergy who have not private property if I were to do it." If these redemption clauses are to be more than dead letters, there must be some pressure brought to bear to bring the two parties together. What the pressure is to be I leave to the Government. [An hon. MEMBER: What would you do?] I am asked by a hon. Gentleman, who is a barrister, what I would propose. I do not think it is fair to ask a yeoman farmer to explain fully on the spur of the moment what sort of a scheme should be adopted. Briefly, I should say there should be some time allowed for redemption. I think it would be well if redemption, when made upon the application of the landlord, were compulsory within a certain number of years from the passing of the Act. I believe that if redemption were made upon fair terms the tithe owner or, I would prefer to say the Church, would derive a great deal of benefit and become a far stronger and more efficient institution for good. Now, the hon. Member for Lanarkshire stated last night that the tenant will get no benefit whatever from the proposed change. I know that theoretically the landlord pays the tithe now, but the tenant has always had to bear the brunt of all disputes as to whether the tithe averages were being properly taken. He will no longer be interested as tenant farmer in anything of that sort, and in that respect he will experience certain relief. I have heard, and I think there is a great deal in it, that if the Bill passes the tenant will benefit by a possible re-arrangement with his landlord. It has been suggested that in many parts of the country land being so unpopular tenants will derive advantage from a new bargain, that is to say, he will not contract in the new arrangement or agreement to give the landlord exactly the same amount extra in rent that the landlord will take upon himself by way of tithe. I believe it is very likely that that will happen in many parts of the country. At any rate no tenant's cow or hay stack can be restrained upon, and he would have no thought as to corn averages and the like. I thank the House for having listened to me so patiently, and I have now only to express the hope that the Bill will be read a second time without a Division. My reason for expressing that hope is that I think the promise of the President of the Board of Trade that all Amendments will be considered with an open mind is one upon which we can thoroughly rely. I believe the Bill can be so amended that it would facilitate fair arrangements of the nature I am pleading for, strengthen the law where it requires strengthening, and give relief where relief can be fairly demanded.

Mr. C. W. Gray

*(5.56.) SIR H. VIVIAN (Swansea District): I think the Government will be convinced by the speech to which we have just listened that they have a very thorny path to follow: that in Committee very serious questions will arise. The hon. Gentleman has said that the reduction in respect to buildings upon farms must lead to a very large reduction in the amount payable for tithe. Once I had the buildings on certain farms of mine valued and I was perfectly amazed at the value set upon them. If buildings are not, as I believe they are not, subject to tithe, they undoubtedly enter into account in the fixing of the rent, and, if you are to assess the value of the tithe upon the rent, you must make very large reduction indeed in respect to the value of the buildings. That alone will largely diminish the income which the owners of tithe will be entitled to. Now, it is admitted that if the Bill is not aimed at Wales it is introduced in view of certain events in Wales. I always regret disturbances, like those which have occurred in some parts of Wales, but it must be borne in mind that the action which was taken by tithe-payers in Wales was intended as a protest against the injustice of the tax they were called upon to pay. They had no desire, and they have no desire, to refuse payment of any just and proper tax. Their object simply was to protest in the most stern and solemn manner against the appropriation of the tax they were required to pay. This Bill proposes that the tax shall be placed upon the shoulders of the landlords instead of upon those of the tenants. That does not relieve the tenant from the payment. He will be bound to pay more rent to his landlord; and the hon. Gentleman (Mr Gray) has just said it is quite certain that a very large addition, if not the whole amount of tithe, will be added to the rent. It may be, and I hope it will be, that, in many cases, landlords will take a more just view of the position than the owners of tithe have up to this time taken. I believe that they will do so, and that will only prove how wrong has been the position of those who have owned tithe up to this time. If, as he believes, in the future landlords will make a considerable reduction in respect to extra rent they have put upon their tenants then that must be, indeed, a condemnation of the course taken hitherto by owners of tithe. I doubt whether rents are too high now; they may be in certain cases, but, at all events, what they will have to consider is whether money paid in respect of tithe is too high, and if they admit deductions from that, that is a distinct condemnation of those who heretofore received these rents. Undoubtedly the machinery will not be so direct as it has been heretofore. I am not so sure that we may not have again the question arising as to the payment of tithe in Wales. There are, happily, many small free-holders in Wales, and few of them are members of the Church of England. They will be called upon to pay tithe in the future as in the past, and it is quite possible that even this Bill will not prevent a recurrence of those lamentable actions which have taken place in Wales on some occasions. The landowners may object to pay the tithe, and it is evident the machinery of the Bill is far more complicated than that hitherto used. Is there anything more odious than the idea of a Receiver being appointed to be the manager of any man's farm? That may mean absolute ruin to the tenant, and is more likely to be so than anything he has encountered up to the present time. The grievance will not be removed. The tenants, though not so directly subject to the payment of tithe, still will be as sensible as now that the sweat of their brows will go in payment of tithe, and to that they have a conscientious objection. That is the position of tenants in Wales. Bear in mind it is a question of conscience. I am old enough to remember when we had long and acrimonious debates in this House on the subject of Church rates, and at that time one of the most peace-loving Bodies in the community (the Quakers) refused to pay these rates, and in those long and often acrimonious debates, which few Members remember, it was said that Church rates would never be abolished, that it was a thing not to be contemplated. But after these debates there came a time when Church rates were abolished, and I ask are the fabrics of the Church of England in a worse position than before the rates were abolished? I say at no time have the fabrics of our Church been in so magnificent a condition, and why? Because we have to rely on the voluntary system. Of all others there can be no question the voluntary system is the most healthy to rely upon. The prophecies that the fabrics of our churches would fall into decay have all been falsified, and our churches now are the glory and splendour of our country. Well, but the Church has lost its hold upon Welshmen, and that owing to the grievous misuse of its high privileges for a great number of years. It is now something like 1,100 years since the old British Church passed away and was absorbed by the Romish Church. During that lengthened period it is no exaggeration to say Church matters have been in a scandalous condition in the Principality of Wales. During the Romish times, so far as I can read history, the position was a bad one, and it became worse after the Reformation. Nepotism prevailed to the largest extent, and men were sent to minister to the spiritual wants of the Welsh people who had no feeling of sympathy for the people and could not even express themselves in the language of the Welsh people, and by these men the great emoluments of the Church were absorbed. For very many years this led to a condition of things most deplorable, and out of this condition of things the present position of the Church of England in Wales has grown. Stupor prevailed, I will not say irreligion prevailed, but at any rate history shows that a scandalous condition of things prevailed in the Church. The whole revival of the strong religious feeling in Wales began with the Methodist revival at the beginning of the century, and long after that the Church remained in its terrible state of stupor, from the effects of which it has never recovered. I was very much surprised yesterday to hear the hon. Member for East Bradford (Mr. Reed), who has studied this question very deeply, take to task my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Glamorgan (Mr. Evans), whose excellent maiden speech has shown his possession of an ability, and a power in addressing the House, which, I am quite sure, will make him a brilliant Member of it. I was astonished, I say, to hear the hon. Member take my hon. Friend to task for referring to the tripartite division of tithe. I understood the hon. Member to say that no such thing ever existed, that there was no historical warrant for saying that a tripartite division of tithe existed in this country at all. Well, I admit that there is no absolute proof, and doubtless this proof has been lost in the mists of ages. But in that very excellent work, Ancient Facts and Fictions, Lord Selborne quotes from an old document of Ethelred's time, about 1014, which runs thus:—

Mr. C. W. Gray

“Respecting tithe the king and his witan (or Parliament) have chosen and agreed that one third part of the tithe which belongs to the Church shall go to the reparation of the Church, the second part to the servants of God, and the third part to God's poor and needy ones in thralldom.”

Doubts of the authenticity have, I know, been thrown upon this document, but it appears to me to bear evidence of truth on the face of it. There you have tripartite division, and what has become of that division? We hear no more of it, the whole is applied to the maintenance of the clergy, and we are accused of sacrilege, or something very much approaching that, for suggesting that it might be applied to other purposes. Lord Selborne, upon the question how it was that the whole of the tithe became appropriated to parish purposes, says—

“There was certainly no such general appropriation of tithe to parish church made by any law ever enacted in England, though the laws of Ethelred gave to certain churches on private estates a third of the whole tithe. As to how the third passed into the whole there is not, so far as I know, so much as a canon of any Council or decree of any Pope in the nature of a legislative enactment to explain."

When so great an authority as Lord Selborne cannot explain how the Church became possessed of the whole of the tithe, I think I may say the evidence is lost. Nobody can explain it, or make out a real title to it. I suppose the title is one of prescription. No law or canon gives that title. The hon. Member for East Bradford used the word "British," and, properly speaking, that should refer to Wales only. Great Britain, we know, is a term including the whole of the kingdom, but certainly the British are the Welsh. The Welsh were not conquered until 1284, but the same arrangements existed in the whole Church, for the same Authority governed all the Christian Church. In 777 the ancient British Church was absorbed into the Romish Church. The ecclesiastics at Rome thenceforth governed the whole of the Church of Great Britain although Wales had not been conquered by the Saxons Kings. This is ancient history and, perhaps, I owe an apology for referring to it. I should not have done so but that my hon. Friend (Mr. Evans) was challenged on the point by the hon. Member for East Bradford. It is quite evident that the latter had not paid sufficient attention to the historical question to animadvert on the statement of my hon. Friend. I have a very long experience of Wales. I have been in touch with Welsh feeling through my connection with one of the largest Welsh constituencies for 33 years. For 27 years I represented the largest constituency in the Principality, and for six years I have represented one of the largest. I do not look at Wales from Shropshire through a telescope. I am in constant touch with the people among whom I was bred and born, and I tell you very distinctly that the Church has lost its hold upon the people of Wales. The people of Wales have provided for their own places of religious worship. If they had not done so there would in the great County of Glamorgan have been a state of religious destitution, for the Church is so fettered that it could not meet the growing wants of an increasing population. You have a parochial system, which of all others is the worst and most restricted in regard to increased church accommodation. You have the incumbent of the parish who can come down upon any one who desires to build a church, and insist upon his right to prevent it. But Free Trade has prevailed, thank God, in providing other places of worship. It is unnecessary to quote the enormous sums of money which have been expended by Welsh Nonconformists in erecting and maintaining their own places of religious worship. There are no people in the world so deeply religious as the Welsh people. On the first growth of a village, with the first few houses, they erect a place of public worship, and this they do out of their own hard-earned savings. And yet you still call upon them to pay a further portion of those savings for the maintenance of a Church with which they have nothing in common. This is a grave and grievous wrong, and their refusal to do so is a protest against this wrong. They are a law-abiding, law-loving people, and this I say with perfect certainty. There is, I think, only one other Member of the House who can say he has addressed an assembly of 10,000 Welsh colliers on a mountain side. My hon. Friend the Member for the Rhondda Division stood with me and addressed 10,000 Welsh colliers on a Welsh mountain side more than once. On one occasion I remember addressing them on the question of reform of the House of Lords, and I remember well saying to them—"Now, you are a thoroughly loyal people; give three cheers for the Queen," and every man of them responded heartily. They were very excited about the position of the House of Lords; but I say no more loyal people exist within this realm. But do not try their patience too far; do not put too great a strain upon these law-abiding people. The unanimous cry of Welshmen is for redress of this grievance. Do not attempt to impose new fetters, and seek to rivet this Church upon the people more tightly. The existence of the Church as a Welsh institution cannot be defended, and only by meeting the just demands of the people is to disendow the Church of England in Wales. I have quoted the case of the Church rates, and I would refer to the Irish Church. Have you not been compelled to do justice to Ireland in regard to the great anomaly which existed there? Even to a greater degree the anomaly exists in Wales, and you refuse to redress this grievance, and endeavour to rivet the fetters more tightly. Do not continue such a policy. The cry of Wales is for Disestablishment; you cannot by such a Bill as this repress this cry; you will render it more bitter.

Mr. C. W. Gray

(6.23.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): The hon. Baronet has just told us that he does not look at Wales through a telescope, and I must admit I think he looks at it much more closely, and from the point of view of one who studies the suffrages of Welsh electors with a view to his next return to Parliament. I confess I am surprised at the part Welsh Members have taken in this debate, because, as has been well remarked, it is the condition of things in Wales which has brought this question to a crisis and made legislation necessary. We have been told that the refusal of Welsh people to pay tithe is due to religious motives. I should be loth to say anything against the religious convictions of the Welsh people; and I firmly believe they are a religious and godly people. But I cannot attribute the excesses that have taken place in Wales to religion and philanthropy. I have paid close attention to this anti-tithe agitation, and I have not the least doubt of the lengths the people may be induced to go by a misguided sense of religion and right. There is an instance I do not think has been quoted, of a clergyman newly appointed to an incumbency in Wales, a man of blameless character, against whom nothing could be said. He arrived in his parish suffering under a very serious domestic affliction, and no sooner had he arrived than there was a universal refusal of tithe. The poor incumbent became poorer and poorer; the members of his family suffered acutely from want of nourishment; two of his daughters died; and he was reduced to the last verge of poverty. In this condition, he one day received a hamper and thought that at last some of his parishioners had taken pity upon his unhappy condition. Upon opening the hamper, instead of sorely-needed food, he found it filled with nameless filth, and the message, "Here is food for you." These are the things that have taken place, and will continue, unless a stop is put to them. If you tell me that such excesses arise from the depth of religious convictions then all I can say is: I would not give twopence for religious feeling that prompted such an action as this. The hon. Baronet tells us, as others have told us, that the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church of England in Wales is the proper remedy for the present state of things. But there is now a Unionist Government in power, which will not think of introducing such legislation as this, and that Government will continue in power for, at any rate, another three years, and perhaps many years longer. What does the hon. Baronet propose should be done in the meanwhile? Does he propose that the tithepayers should keep the tithe in their pockets? If not, he must be a party to some legislation to force them to pay it. The non-payment of tithe must have a most demoralising effect on the Welsh people. But this Bill does not deal with Wales alone, and I desire to refer to the speech that has been delivered by the hon. Member for the Maldon Division, who represents a part of England which has suffered most acutely from the agricultural depression of recent years. The hon. Member committed himself to the assertion that the corn averages which govern the payment of tithe would establish a sort of test of the fertility of the soil.

*MR. GRAY: I must correct the noble Lord there. What I said was that the corn averages would be a test as to the capability of the land to pay a larger or a less tithe.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I apologise to my hon. Friend and adopt his correction, though I cannot assent to the statement. Corn averages were established because it was thought, at the time, that corn was more fixed in value than any other commodity. It might have been fixed on a money basis, but it was thought that the value of gold would vary more than that of corn. That having been the means by which the tithe has been fixed, let us see whether, on the whole, it has worked fairly? I find that, calculating the average of years to the present day, and taking the years altogether, as near as possible £100 is paid for what was fixed at £100 at the time of commutation. In the present year, and during the last few years, of course, it has sunk far below that value, but, taking it all round, the tithe owner has got that which he bargained for at the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act. I do not think, in the face of this fact, that there is reason to make any change in the law on the ground that the tithe owner gets too much. Let us look at the other side of the case. Does the landowner get the same or more or less than at the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act? I will not go into figures, but I will venture to say that, taking the titheable land of England as a whole—of course, Essex is an exception—the landowner has got at least two-thirds more than he had at the time of the passing of the Act, and, therefore, it is not fair to say that he has been prejudiced to the advantage of the tithe owner. The tithe owner has got what he contracted to get, and the landowner has obtained a great deal more. In those circumstances I cannot see that there is any case whatever for a revision of the tithe commutation, and I venture to say that the present Bill is not designed to effect any such revision. The settlement of 1836 is respected by the Bill. I know it is sometimes said that the Bill is a re-opening of that settlement, but I cannot see that a measure designed like this one, to make people pay that which they legally owe, and to enable the tithe owner to more easily recover his debt, is one which re-opens the Tithe Commutation Act. Will the House bear with me a moment whilst I give an illustration? I happen to know a very populous town in the North of England, which is near a great city—within five miles of it. In that town, owing to its proximity to the city, there are no County Court sittings, and I have been concerned lately in trying to persuade Her Majesty's Government—that is to say, the Lord Chancellor—to have County Court sittings in that town. The reason I did this is, because it is found that the creditors in the town in which I am interested are prejudiced by the necessity of having to go five miles away to the city where the County Court sittings are held, in order to get judgment against their debtors. I am informed that so much is this difficulty felt that it positively, in a very serious degree, prejudices the recovery of small debts.

Viscount Cranborne

Now, supposing the Lord Chancellor grants our request, and agrees that County Court sittings shall be held in this town, the immediate result will be that every small debt there will be more valuable to the creditor. Will the debtor be able to go to the creditor and say, "When I incurred this debt to you I thought I had to go to a town five miles off before it could be enforced against me? Now I find the debt can be enforced in a much easier way. It is not right that you should have all the benefit of the altered arrangements, and seeing that you can enforce the debt with much greater facility than you could before, I claim some remission." No doubt that case is a ridiculous one. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] But it happens to be so obvious that even hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House can see what I mean. That instance shows very well that the method of recovery of debt has nothing to do with the amount really due, and that if it is found—as it has been found—that it is difficult for the tithe owner, who has the first charge on the produce of the land, to recover his debt, it is a fair and legitimate thing for Parliament to alter the method of recovery without being accused of re-opening the settlement of 1836, and being called on to reduce the debt due. I said at the opening of these few remarks that I had great sympathy with the Counties of Essex and Berkshire, and those counties which have felt so deeply the agricultural distress. Well, the Government have evidently felt that too, and in the Bill they have presented to the House they have considered—as I think, very properly and in a very generous manner—some of the difficulties these distressed counties feel. For instance, there is the important provision that in cases where the rateable value is less than the tithe a remission shall be made to the tithepayer as against the tithe owner. That, under the circumstances, is a generous concession, and it should be fully recognised as such. It is a concession because on a great number of properties the landlords will pay, although they do not get a sufficient rental. It is said that in cases of that kind, the landlords will charge a rent which the tenants will refuse to pay, and the land will go out of cultivation, as the landlords will have to take the land into their own hands, and will find it impracticable to make use of it. If the tithe exceeded the rent there would be no remedy for the tithe owner. But in the great majority of cases there will be a hope that in better years it will be possible to make a profit, and the land will not be allowed to go out of cultivation. I think the landowner should receive assistance in this case, but it should be a concession from the tithe owner. In many cases where the tithe is found to be in excess of the rent the reason is that at the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act the landowners were allowed to apportion the tithe on their properties as they pleased, and they put it on as few farms as possible. Naturally, on those farms the pressure has been felt more than elsewhere; but because the landowner has chosen to put the whole of the tithe on a few farms, is that any reason why, 50 years afterwards, the tithe owner should be called on to suffer loss? That argument no doubt tends to show that the provision in the Government Bill is not fair to the tithe owner. But I think that, under present circumstances, and certainly in view of the difficulties which land is being placed in in the distressed counties, the tithe owner ought to be willing to make some concession in that direction. Let it be understood, however, that these are concessions, and substantial concessions; and many of us think that, having gone that far, we should not be called upon to go further in giving up the tithe owner's rights. Let us look at this thing from a common sense point of view. Hon. Members opposite are not so anxious to relieve the land of tithe as they are anxious to make the tithe question a running sore in order to facilitate their efforts to bring about the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the National Church. But hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House will fight to the death against that object. I say frankly that there is no question in the whole field of politics on which I would not rather make concession than on the question of the endowment of the National Church. That being so, those who strive for Disestablishment will have to look forward to many years of bitter struggle before they meet with success, even if they are ever successful. Are they prepared to allow the tithe question during these years of struggle to remain in its present state? They must consent to legislation of some kind with respect to it, and therefore I would urge them, on grounds of fairness and morality, to give a cordial support to this honest endeavour on the part of the Government to provide a machinery under which, without friction, the tithe may be fairly, honestly, and readily paid to the Church of England, as she has a right to expect, whether in England or in Wales.

*(6.45.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): In the few observations I purpose addressing to the House I would disentangle the Bill from all its verbiage and ask the House to have regard to its main principles. Under the Commutation Act the produce of the land only is liable, and the tithe is only levied in a certain manner on the occupier; but under the present Bill a great change will take place, both in regard to liability and process by the tithe owner. If the landlord does not pay the tithe a Receiver will be put in, and he, the landlord, will become a tenant to the Receiver, who becomes not only Receiver and landlord, but manager also. Then the tithe is to take priority of all other payments, except quit rent. All these are enormous advantages to give to the titheowner, and yet there is nothing on the other side to balance them. The whole Commutation Act of 53 years ago is torn to pieces in giving the tithe owner these advantages. In Clause 4 of this Bill the tithe owner is empowered to take the whole of the produce of the land, and divide it as he likes; that is to say, if there happens to be more than one tithe owner they can divide the tithe as they like amongst themselves. The tithe owner, however, is saved the odium of being the collector, and actually the landowner and occupier are bound to advance the money to the tithe owner to pay his local rates and taxes. We heard the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade express how deeply he respected contracts and former precedents, but here we have the arrangement made in the extraordinary Tithe Redemption Bill, passed only a year or two ago, upset and the contracts made between landlord and tenant broken. Over and over again we have heard how difficult it is for landlords and tenants to make bargains, and how, when they are made, they ought to be respected. The tithe owner has his taxes paid for him in advance, and yet we have nothing on the other side to set against this extraordinary advantage. I have only to-day received a letter from an eminent land agent who has been long engaged in the buying and selling of tithes, and who has been consulted by an ex-Prime Minister on the subject. He—the land agent—says the Bill is a poorly disguised attempt to increase the value of tithe at the expense of the landowner, but that the tenant farmers are too intelligent not to see that the merging of the tithe in the rent is only a device to remove the odium of collecting tithe from the shoulders of the parson. He adds that the provisions of the Bill will add 10 years' purchase to the market value of tithe rent-charge by raising it from 15 to 25 years' purchase. Then we come to the Redemption Clause. That clause only applies where the tithe is under 20s. Directly you come to a case where it is over 20s. redemption is optional, because a joint application is necessary. Suppose a young clergyman comes into an incumbency, the tithes on which amount to £500 a year, and asks his solicitor for advice. The solicitor would say, "You must be a very foolish man to have the tithe redeemed. You must take into consideration what the tithe rent-charge would be worth at 25 years' purchase. You collect it directly from the landed proprietor, and you have the best security. The landed proprietor pays your local rates and taxes in advance. You are a young man, and by the time you have lived in the parish for 30 or 40 years it will be very difficult to prove what the value of the tithe was before this Bill passed. If the redemption takes place then you will get double what you would get now." That is what the solicitor would say, and a very sensible and reasonable thing it would be to say. Personally, I am both a tithepayer and a tithe owner. My predecessors in title, who purchased the tithe rent-charge from the Crown, it having formed a portion of the estate of that unfortunate nobleman, Lord Derwentwater, never spent a farthing on the land, on which the tithe was charged, nor have I done so, as the land does not belong to me. In my view the tithe owner in England stands in the same position as a bad Irish landlord who does nothing at all to improve the land, and the tithepayer is in the same position as a tenant in Ireland who has made all the improvements. Within the last 50 years two-thirds of Great Britain has been drained, land has been manured, and waste land brought under cultivation. All has been done by the tenant and the landowner, the tithe owner never spending a farthing. This Bill may well be compared with that relating to the purchase of land in Ireland, and we may well ask: Why should we be so generous to Irish landlords who have neglected their duty, and adopt a policy of spoliation towards English landowners who have done their duty to the best of their ability? I do not see why Clause 9 should require that the redemption for the price named should be "for the permanent benefit of the benefice." It would be enough to ensure that the redemption should not be detrimental to the benefice. With regard to the Receiver, I would ask the House to consider for a moment what would be the position of a Receiver in a small country village. Could a more ingenious plan be devised for getting up hot blood and provoking riot than putting in a Receiver to manage a farm and collect the parson's tithe? Then in Clause 12 the Bill goes on to provide that "if the owner fails to perform such duty," &c., not only he, but his executors and administrators, shall be liable to pay any subsequent owner of the land, or any part thereof, all expenses incurred by such owner in respect of tithe redemption. I never heard of such a clause: it is a punishment clause of unlimited duration. Again, Clause 13 empowers the Board of Agriculture to put a mortgage on the land. All recent legislation has been in the direction of trying to free the land, and thereby to reduce the law costs in land sales; therefore I say that this proposal is a step in the wrong direction. I can only see two courses open to us. Either we must repeal the Commutation Act altogether and find out the present real commercial value of the tithe and start on a fresh basis, or if the Government are determined to get rid of the tithes let them bring in a compulsory clause, providing for redemption at 15 years' purchase, the Chancellor of the Exchequer to find the necessary money on the same terms as are offered to the Irish tenants, namely, at 4 per cent. for 49 years. As to the proceeds of the sale, one-third should go to the Church, one-third be devoted to educational purposes, and one-third should go in reduction of the rates. I think that, without doubt, the Church has improperly absorbed the whole of the tithe. As a member of the Church I blushed to hear Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite declare that clergymen of the Church of England in Wales had, with their families, been on the very verge of starvation. What were their congregations doing to allow their ministers to starve in consequence of this tithe difficulty?

Sir J. Swinburne

(7.8.) MR. T. LEWIS (Anglesey): It is now being generally acknowledged that the occasion of promoting this Bill was the tithe agitation in Wales. As I have spent my whole life among the tithepayers in that country, I have had every opportunity of knowing their opinion and feelings upon the tithe question, and I can assure the House that the passing of this Bill will not, in any degree, pacify or satisfy them. Hitherto, the relations between tenants and landlords in Wales have been most amicable, but I am afraid if this Bill is passed, necessitating in many cases the re-adjustment of rents, it will occasion much irritation and ill-feeling. Indeed, it does not seem likely to give satisfaction to any class in the Principality—neither the farmers nor the landowners. A few months ago, in consequence of the general rumour that the forthcoming Tithe Bill would throw the payment of tithes on the landlord, a number of influential landowners from the adjacent counties, met at Rhyl, in North Wales, to consider the subject; and the result of their deliberation was to pass a resolution to the effect that no such Bill was required for Wales, but that what was wanted was a Bill to expel, cheaply and effectually, all lazy and troublesome clergy from their ministerial office. And I firmly believe that that is the opinion of a large number of other landowners who were absent. As to the tithepayers, this Bill will not satisfy them, because, though the landlord in the first instance is made responsible for its payment, yet the farmers well know that it will finally fall upon them. It is well that the House should know that no Tithe Bill will give satisfaction to the very great majority of the Welsh farmers, except a Bill to devote the tithe to national purposes; as long as the tithe is used for the support of a small religious sect, the agitation and dissatisfaction will continue. It is not against the payment of tithes that the Welsh farmers object, but against its application. After all the efforts and sacrifices made by Nonconformists during the last 150 years to support religious instruction in Wales, which was almost wholly neglected by the Church, surely they deserve better treatment than to be saddled, in addition, with these proposed extra County Court expenses. Lord Aberdare declared some time ago—

“That religion would have disappeared from the country had it not been for the exertions of the Nonconformists.”

The late Dean of Bangor, speaking of the enormous numerical preponderance of Nonconformists, said—

“Statistical apologists will hint that these Nonconformists exist only on paper. Paper adherents do not give money. The Welsh Nonconformists give far more than £300,000 a year.”

Also he added—

“The Church in Wales has lost five-sixths of the Welsh-speaking people, and her strength survives among the English-speaking upper and upper middle class.”

In the County of Anglesey, which I have the honour to represent, there are several parishes where none but the clergyman, the clerk, and their families attend the church, while most of the inhabitants go to chapels. It is not, therefore, so very strange that the Nonconformist farmers object to pay tithes, seeing that they receive no benefit whatever for their money. I do, therefore, hope that this House will reject the Bill.

(7.15.) SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I desire to offer a few remarks to the House on this subject. The question of tithes has been for a long period before Parliament, and various Bills have been introduced dealing with it, but of all those Bills none have dealt so completely and fully with it as the measure before us, and certainly none of them have seemed to have anything like the general acceptance which this measure has found. I think that the Government deserve credit for taking up and dealing with the question, for it is not a popular one. They have been told that they cannot touch it without raising many difficult and anxious questions which might really lead them into trouble, but they have acted in accordance with their high sense of duty. In that action they have, no doubt, been stimulated by the state of things which existed in Wales, and which I am amazed that hon. Gentleman opposite seem to contemplate with very little concern—I refer to the non-payment of tithes legally due to an amount so great as was mentioned by the President of the Board of Trade. It is extraordinary that the non-payment of £10,000 out of £38,000 should be regarded as a light matter, particularly when the legal obligation to pay has existed for so very long a time. Another factor which has, no doubt, had its influence with the Government is to be found in the sufferings of the Welsh clergy, who undertook their duties in the belief that the law would secure to them that which they were legally entitled to, though no more. And there is also before the Government this even stronger point—the refusal to meet legal obligations, such as tithe, though it may be treated with equanimity by those who do not suffer, yet is likely to be very contagious; and when once it is found that legal obligations of one sort can be avoided, it is very probable that the same thing will be attempted with regard to other obligations, with the result that the foundations of society will be disturbed, and law and order be shaken very considerably. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has stated that the measure will not satisfy the tithe-payers of Wales. I do not suppose it will, because the Welsh tithepayers welcome the tithe agitation as helping them in their efforts to obtain the Disestablishment of the Church. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke for the Front Opposition Bench yesterday (Mr. Osborne Morgan) stated that they did not want a measure to improve the collection of tithes, but one to deal with its distribution. No doubt some hon. Gentlemen opposite and we who sit on these Benches are not likely to agree on the matter, and I do not suppose that those hon. Gentlemen can expect that a Bill likely to please them would be introduced by the present Government. But the means by which it is sought to enforce the law having been found incapable of application in a country where there is not much sympathy with the law in that particular respect, it becomes clear to the Government that something must be done to amend that law, for the sake of their reputation and to put matters straight. In England there has been very little agitation, comparatively, but still there have been grumblings, and, from time to time, pressure has been brought to bear upon the tithe owner to make a further reduction. But I think my hon. Friend the Member for the Maldon Division of Essex was rather hard on the clergy just now when he spoke of them as buttoning up their pockets and declaring that though they would be glad to make a reduction, yet for the sake of their order they could not do so. The hon. Member quite left out of sight the fact that there has already been a reduction of 22 per cent., which the clergy have had to bear, and are bearing without complaint, and it seems to me most unreasonable and unfair to ascribe their unwillingness to put in force the unpopular remedy of distraint to anything else than kindness of heart; neither is it fair to ask them to make further reductions. As I said before, the Government were pledged to deal with this matter, and have had the courage of their opinions. They have, no doubt, also avoided some of the blots which were certainly to be found in previous Bills, and especially that one which made the tithepayer personally responsible for the tithe. Now it is made quite clear that he is only liable for that which he gets from the titheable land itself, and that, I think, will remove one serious objection which has been felt to previous attempts at legislation on this subject. Then there is the question of re-valuation. Disappointment has been expressed because the Bill does not, beyond the fixing of a new rateable value, give any further power of re-valuation. No doubt, in some few counties—I am happy to say not in very many—the present settlement presses very hardly upon agriculturalists indeed; but we must remember that a bargain was made in 1836, and if we are to re-open that bargain because one party suffers, it would be necessary to re-open the question altogether, and to give benefits to the tithe owner in cases where the land has increased in value, as it no doubt has done in many parts of the country. If that is done, and tithe should be reduced in certain parts of the country, we introduce a principle which it was the boast that the settlement of 1836 had effected, namely, the abolition of growing tithes. Therefore, it seems to me very clear that there is a hardship where the value of the land has fallen more than the 22 per cent. reduction in the tithe, but such cases as that can only be met by the 2nd clause of this Bill, which is an honest attempt to deal with the difficulty. Again, if we re-open the question of tithe averages we shall be confronted with a very difficult problem, because there are other articles besides wheat, such as wool and hay, which have risen in value. We might, perhaps, have hoped that more would have been done in the way of redemption, but it is possible that some amendment in that direction may be devised in Committee. The whole question is, however, surrounded with difficulties, because each party puts the price very much higher or very much lower than the other, according to the point of view from which he looks at it. I particularly rejoice to see that compulsory redemption is enforced in the case of building land, for it has in the past been the cause of considerable trouble and annoyance. We must realise that anything we can do will be sure to meet with the opposition of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who find this tithe grievance a lever for pressing forward the Disestablishment proposals, about which they are so anxious. It has been said that the tithepayers object to pay this tithe because they disapprove of it and it goes against their consciences. I do not quite see the force of that argument, because they do not refuse to pay the tithe altogether; they only refuse to pay unless a reduction is granted. In the times of the agitation against Church rates those who objected to the rates refused to pay them on principle, but this question of a conscience which can be satisfied with a reduction of 5 per cent. I cannot understand. A further reduction of 5 per cent. for collection has been spoken of, but when we remember how very great the fall in the value of tithe has been—22 per cent.—it cannot be right to ask the clergy to submit to a further reduction of 5 per cent. on their already attenuated incomes, more especially as there are already so many cases in which the tithe is paid by the landlord. I do trust we shall be able to bring this question to a satisfactory settlement, and I think we on these Benches should be unworthy of our position of supporters of law and order, and of the National Church, if we did not persevere in the attempt, not to give that Church any fresh advantages, but to preserve those rights which have belonged to her for so many years.

Sir J. Kennaway

(7.30.) COLONEL W. CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.): This question has been argued by hon. Members sitting on this (the Opposition) side of the House as if it were purely a matter of Welsh opinion, and my hon. Colleagues from Wales have taken a somewhat provincial and narrow-minded view of the subject. I have been sojourning during the last few weeks among those who are deeply interested in the tithes question, and I have been much surprised at some of the stories I have heard. I look on this Tithes Bill not only as a measure relating to the Principality of Wales, and directed against the Disestablishment of the Church, but as one closely related to the agricultural interest all over the country. What is it we find? We find that in the County of Norfolk the tithes are greater than in the entire Principality of Wales, and I think the people of that county have quite as much interest in this Bill, if not more, than the whole population of the Principality. I think that this Bill will, as far as I can judge of it, bring about a better condition of things as regards the agricultural interest in England. I intend to support the Second Reading of the Bill, and, in doing so, I may be allowed to say that I consider the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade in introducing it was most courteous and conciliatory, especially when we remember that he told the House that any recommendations emanating from this side would, so long as they did not touch the principle of the Bill, receive the careful attention of the Government. I believe that if the Bill is read a second time this evening we shall be able in Committee to introduce such changes as will, at least, settle the question for a certain time to come. The main principle of the Bill is one of which no one will deny the importance—it is to transfer from the shoulders of the tenant farmer to those of the owner the liability for the payment of tithes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby last year said he regarded this as the proper principle to act upon, and I think so too. But we are told that if the landlords are to pay the tithes they will take care that the tenants shall repay them in the rent. Well, Sir, I for one will take the chances of this. I believe the tenant farmers of Wales are honest men, and that the greater portion of them will not attempt to shirk the responsibility they undertook when they entered into possession of their farms. It is very unfortunate that this question in Wales has got entangled with the question of religion. After all, tithes must be paid, and I think my Welsh Colleagues are inconsistent in opposing the Bill, because it will make tithes a much better property. They ought rather to support the Bill, because they may utilise the tithe in time to come for other purposes, and this Bill will give a better security to the tithe owner whenever it may be required for those national purposes of which we hear so much. I conceive also that the redemption of the tithe is the second great principle of the Bill; and it is one I have always advocated. I do hope and trust that Her Majesty's Government may see their way to put the redemption on easier terms. I cannot understand why, when Consols are as low as they are now, we should be asked to pay 4 per cent., and in my opinion the redemption scheme can be carried out on a plan much less expensive to the landowners than that which is proposed by the Bill. I have always considered that the incidence of tithes is certainly unfair; but, on the other hand, I see the difficulty there is in re-opening the settlement of 1836; at the same time I have always thought that before the Government touched this question perhaps the wisest course to have pursued would have been to appoint a Royal Commission to visit every county, and to consider the condition in which certain counties are placed by reason of the changed condition of agriculture throughout the whole country. I can hardly conceive that the English public are aware of the frightful condition of some of the farms on which the tithe at the present moment is actually more than the rental. I think that the substitution of the County Court for the present system of distress is a proposal which cannot fail to meet the views of all hon. Members, and that the carrying out of this plan would conduce to the peace and the happiness of the country. We know that there are those who wish to keep up a state of things, which we all deplore, for particular purposes of their own, and I trust that their wings will be clipped and that it will be impossible to have again such an agitation as we have had in my country. I think the more sensible and rational of the Welsh farmers will feel that the settlement of the tithe question ought to put aside all further agitation in regard to Disestablishment, and that the effect of this measure will be to preserve the tithe not only for the Church in Wales, but for any future purpose of a national character.

Colonel W. Cornwallis West

*(7.40.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I desire, Sir, to state what I believe to be the opinion of the great majority of my constituents on the subject now before the House. I am astonished at some of the observations of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, especially so as he is one of the Representatives of the Principality. He has complained that the Welsh Members have treated this matter from a provincial point of view; but if by that he meant a Welsh point of view, I could understand his argument, because this is strictly a Welsh question. The hon. Member also spoke of the Bill being of great service to the agricultural interest. If so, I would be pleased, though I doubt it; but the Bill ought to be confined to England. The Bill proposes to shift the burden of the present payment of tithe from the tithepayer to the landlord, and neither in that nor in the redemption clauses, nor in the new method of recovery in lieu of the old form of distress, will it meet with anything but the strongest objection on the part of the Welsh people. The new form of recovery is nothing but an attempt to coerce the Welsh people to pay a tithe which they object to pay so long as the impost is applied to its present purposes. The proposal to shift the payment is something thrown out with a view to the conciliation of the English farmer, but I hope the English farmer will not be deluded by proposals so fictitious. The Welsh farmer has been taught, and knows quite well, that if the landlord pays the tithe he will exact an equivalent from the tenant in the shape of increased rent. With regard to the redemption clauses the bulk of the Welsh Members are opposed to them altogether. We believe that under them tithes will be frittered away, and that by subsequent alienation they will be lost sight of altogether. We recognise tithes to be national property, and are anxious to keep them intact and apply them to national purposes, educational and otherwise. To that extent the farmer would be relieved, because what he pays in tithes he knows he will be saved in rates. As to the alleged right to the tithe for the purposes of the Established Church, I hold that what Parliament has a right to make Parliament has also a right to unmake. By shifting the burden from one shoulder to the other, you do not remove it. And if you insist upon doing this, then, I think, in all fairness, we may ask you to confer extended jurisdiction upon the County Court, so that the rents of the tenants may be judicially revised, as their rents will most assuredly be consequently increased. In recent years many large estates have been put into the market, and hundreds of tenant farmers have purchased their holdings, and are now freeholders. These men are chiefly Nonconformists, and they will as stoutly oppose the payment of tithe in the future as in the past until fairly appropriated. Then you will simply put in a number of Receivers of the County Court, and in that way practically confiscate their holdings. What is the object of the new method of recovery? I take it that it is to assist the Welsh clergy to recover their tithes. Had it not been for the case of the Welsh clergy I think the other questions that have been raised in this Bill would have been referred to a Royal Commission. Will this Bill have the effect of assisting the Welsh clergy? I think it will have the opposite effect, and that it will only accentuate the differences and further embitter the feelings which already exist. Distress is at present levied upon the goods of the farmer, while the person of the parson is removed from the scene of action. The bailiffs and emergency men do the disagreeable work of collection. But under this Bill you make the clerical tithe owner a plaintiff in the County Court, where he will be sure to attract the attention of the industrial classes, who will be amazed at the strange spectacle of a minister of religion in a Court of Law demanding his pound of flesh from needy men who object, not to the payment of tithe, but to its misapplication. This new jurisdiction which you seek to confer upon the County Court will overweight its machinery and throw it out of gear. Already, there are complaints as to the bailiffs of County Courts not being able to do their duty in the matter of executions following judgment. Besides, solicitors and counsel will be employed, and such will be the legal paraphernalia, that to recover £5 of tithes it may easily be that £10, £15, or £20 will be expended in costs. I am glad the Government do not seek to re-introduce the penal powers which appeared in their last Bill. I do not say this with a view to encourage them to insert powers of that kind. I do not suppose that any Government would venture to imprison men who refused payment of tithes on conscientious grounds; but I say that without imprisonment clauses the Bill will be a dead letter. The County Court process is a double-edged weapon, and I think that while it will wound the victim, it will also wound the hand that strikes.

*(7.50.) Mr. BEADEL (Chelmsford): Mr. Speaker, it is a mistake to suppose that any Bill would satisfy hon. Members opposite unless it abolished tithes altogether. The Bill is for the purpose of amending difficulties which have arisen under the Act of 1836—an Act which was passed for changing that which was an uncertainty into a certainty. It created a rent charge as certain as any charge which might be made on private property, subject only to septennial averages of corn. I should have been glad if the Government had not touched that measure at all, but the necessity has arisen from the terrible state of agricultural depression. If hon. Members would study the agricultural question they would realise the importance of putting it in a better position. They would take steps to cause the produce of the land to be worth more than the cost of production; would confer a great amount of good upon the whole nation, and overcome crotchets which exist in the minds of many. Unfortunately, there are thousands of acres which if absolutely tithe free the cost of production would exceed the value of the produce. That proceeds from only one cause; and, I think if the President of the Board of Trade were to take the Minister of Agriculture into his confidence, a remedy could be found. The President of the Board of Trade is taking a very wise and prudent step in trying to minimise the evils of the tithe system and in endeavouring to prevent the question cropping up again within short periods. I have always acted upon the principle that the tithe should be paid directly by the landlord, and that the clerical tithe owner should not be placed in the position of having to dun his parishioners for his daily bread. Therefore, I welcome the proposal which changes the payment from the tenant to payment by the landlord. With regard to redemption, I think it is better to get rid of small sums. I remember the time when tithe was 12 per cent. above par, and when it was paid with the greatest pleasure in the world; but now that it is 22 per cent. below par nobody likes to pay it at all. There is clearly something wrong in our system. I realise the true cause, and if hon. Members would take care not to allow articles to be sent into this country to compete with our produce, they would confer an enormous benefit on the community; you would hear no more of the tithe rent-charge difficulty, and you would find the National Church of this country in a very happy and contented state. (7.55.)

(8.32.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.35.) MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I was very much struck and amused by the remark of the hon. Member for Denbigh (Colonel West) that the introduction of this Bill would bring peace to Wales. It seems strange to me that anyone should entertain the idea that the introduction of the process of the County Court into tithe collection will bring peace to any part of the country, much less to Wales. I was also very much amused by the statement of the noble Lord the Member for the Darwen Division (Viscount Cranborne) that he and his Party were fighting this question of tithe on this ground—that they mean to fight to the death the question of Church and State. He and his Party have fought to the death a good many questions, and they have always been worsted. They fought to the death against reform, against the abolition of slavery, against Free Trade, against Nonconformists having any social or political position, and they have been worsted in all the fights; and they will be worsted in the fight in which they are now engaged. Then I was amused at the noble Lord saying he depended upon the Unionist majority to defend the Church Establishment, because the present Unionist majority numbers amongst its ranks those who have said the most bitter things against the State Church, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) for instance. I listened with attention to the speech of my right hon. Colleague (Sir M. Hicks Beach) in which he introduced the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman admitted in his earlier sentences that the subject was difficult and complicated. I entirely agree with him, but I cannot see that the Bill grapples with the difficulties or unravels the complications. There are three Parties to be considered in this matter; and my complaint is that the Bill, as Tory legislation generally does, only takes one Party into view. I contend that tithe property is national property devoted for the time being to the interests of a sect, but the time will assuredly come when the nation will appropriate it to something more national than a sect. Last night the noble Lord the Member for the Petersfield Division (Viscount Wolmer) spoke very pathetically against meddling with the tithe question in any tinkering way, and he reminded us that in the settlement of 1836 the nation lost two millions sterling at least. His argument was that we must do what we can to strengthen the position of the property, but I maintain that this interference with the tithe question to-day is going to lead to a good deal of frittering away of this national property. Hon. Gentlemen opposite profess to love the clergy. It is quite evident that they love themselves, because the burthen of all their speeches on this measure has been, a considerable reduction of the sum to be paid. Let me remind hon. Gentlemen that in the settlement of the tithe question at the Reformation, more than 25 per cent. of the tithe got lost by being appropriated not to the clergy, but to the landed interest of the country. The whole of this discussion goes to show that the great object the landed sections of the House have in view is to lessen the burden which presses upon them. I am a large tithepayer, but I do not want a Bill that will lessen the amount I have to pay. What I desire is that the payment should be diverted to some great national purposes; and I will not join hon. Gentlemen opposite in the endeavour to lessen the value of tithe in order to suit their own selfish purposes. Now, one of the Government's great boasts is that they are the farmers' friends. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge) was exceedingly candid last night when he asked why should the farmers have any relief. I say because the Government and the Conservative Party have always assured the farmer that they are the men who are looking after his interest. Here is a Tithe Bill, and I can find nothing in the Bill that will to any appreciable extent benefit the farmer. I find that the collection of tithe is to be brought under the same operation of law as rent, and the new process of collection will cost him four or five times as much as the old process. If the farmer does not get any more practical relief than this Bill gives him he will get very little. The next party in the question are the clergy, and I admit the Bill does something for them. An hon. Gentleman has said the Bill will increase the value of tithe from 15 to 25 per cent. I can hardly agree with that; but if that is so the measure will benefit the clergy at the expense of the nation, and therefore ought to be fought tooth-and-nail. Then I have been struck with another thing. The Government and the Party opposite are always pleading the sacredness of contracts. Contracts are always sacred when they want to get something out of the bargain. There was a sacred contract made in 1836. Part of that contract was that you should not collect tithe except upon the crops that grow on the particular land that is titheable. But this Bill alters the whole thing. Where is the sacredness of contract? Where are your religious ideas of contract? I am aware that the Welsh clergy are labouring under considerable difficulty, but the difficulty arises from the fact that they depend upon what is not voluntary, but exacted. The President of the Board of Trade, when he was introducing the Bill, seemed to regard the Church and Christianity as synonymous terms. The greatest triumphs of Christianity were made in the early centuries, when tithes, if paid at all, were paid as voluntary offerings. Nowadays the clergy are always telling us that we are to have more in Heaven than on earth; but I find that when we come to anything like tithe, they think quite as much about earth as anything else. The President of the Board of Trade referred pathetically to the poverty of the clergy in Wales. Is it not a disgrace to a Church so wealthy, to a landed aristocracy so rich—and generally the aristocracy are members of the Church—that the clergy are so poor? Did it not strike the right hon. Gentleman that, when he was speaking of the poverty of the Welsh clergy, he was condemning his own Church and Party, in a way I should be ashamed to do? Then it is said we are trying to evade a just debt. It strikes me that comes with bad grace, considering that it is hurled at people who are supporting their own system of religion, and ask for nothing. We do not want to get rid of the payment of tithe at all, but we want to put tithe into a path where it will promote the best interests of the country. The farmers ought to know that no relief to any appreciable extent will come to them by the lessening of tithe. We want to get them relief by appropriating tithe in such a way as will save their pockets in other directions. I contend there is no confiscation in that, because, of the original tithe, as much belonged to the poor as to the clergy. How the clergy have got hold of it is rather singular to me. Some of us maintain that tithe ought to be appropriated to the relief of the poor. That would relieve the poor rate, and would be a practical way of helping the farmers. This is about the only country in the world in which there is tithe. There are two things you have never been able to transplant to any of our Colonies—a State Church and the present landed system of this country—and depend upon it, when a system cannot be transplanted, it is doomed. As you could not transplant a State Church to America and the Colonies, you will not be able to keep it here very long. And there is quite as much Christianity in the Colonies and America, where there is no State Church, as there is in this country. Then get rid of the idea that tithe has anything to do with the religion of the country. Let us clear our minds of cant and humbug. Let us recognise the fact that this is simply an attempt to keep the property of the nation in the hands of a few people. I am told that our arguments are based upon opposition to the Church. I have no opposition to the Church as a religious institution. I hope I have a solemn belief that the future of our country, as indeed the future of the world, depends upon the promotion of Christianity; but, on the other hand, I believe nothing has kept Christianity back so much as tithes and Church rates, which you have endeavoured to prop up. I venture to warn the Government that in endeavouring to tinker with great questions like this they are endangering the very object they have at heart. The noble Lord the Member for the Darwen Division said you have three years to live. The country is beginning to find you out, and only want an opportunity to put you to rout. [Mr. ADDISON: Hear, hear.] I think that, much as we value the presence of the hon. Gentleman who sits by the vote of the Mayor, we shall be without it after the next election. In conclusion, I have only to say that if the Government deal with the question at all, I wish they would deal with it in a generous spirit to the farmer, in a just spirit to the nation, and in a statesmanlike spirit to us all. They have only had regard for the clergy, and by that they will, I hope, deprive themselves of a good deal of support from the farmers. We certainly shall let the farmers know who their friends are, and who it is who come here under the pretence of being their friends, and then support a Tithe Bill which carries them into the County Court and heaps far more costs upon them in the collection of tithe than ever before.

Colonel W. Cornwallis West

Mr. Handel Cossham

*(8.55.) MR. H. B. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): There is a notice of Motion on the Paper in my name, but I am not anxious to move it on account of the very conciliatory speech we listened to last night from the President of the Board of Trade. The debate seems to have taken a triangular form. There are those who are anxious to do away with tithe in connection with the Church. There are those who are anxious to give to the full, and, in my opinion, more than the full, to the tithe owner; and, lastly, there are those who think, as I do, that some compromise ought to be made in the matter. I am very well satisfied with the Bill in many respects. I am very pleased that the landlords are to pay the tithe in future, because I am quite certain from my experience of tenant farmers, and it is considerable, that it is the wish of the tenant-farmers of the country that they should be relieved from the payment of tithe. Again, I welcome the arrangement for the recovery of tithe, because I think it will save a great deal of unpleasantness. I do not believe for a moment that the Government intend that the Receiver or the manager is to become a farm bailiff, and take the management of the farm out of the hands of the farmer. The Receiver will simply receive the rents which otherwise would go to the landlord. That is a very fair proposal, and one which I think will save a great deal of trouble. But when I come to the question as between tithe owner and tithepayer, I am very much opposed to the Bill, because whatever hon. Members may say, this is a re-opening of the settlement under the Tithe Commutation Act, 1836, and it is a re-opening of it in two ways. In the first place, you are making what was permissive under that Bill compulsory as regards payment of tithe by landlords, and you are substituting recovery by seizing the rents from recovery by distraint. The noble Lord the Member for the Darwen Division (Viscount Cranborne) told us that we have no right to complain, and he gave us instances of certain debtors in a town where there is no County Court. He said those debtors would have no right to complain if a County Court was set in motion in that town. But that is not the question at all. As I view the matter, there was a special contract arrived at in 1836 between the tithe owner and the tithepayer. On the one hand, it was settled how the payment should be made, and on what that payment should be based. On the other hand, it was settled that there should be certain specified modes of recovery. That seems to be a widely different thing to the instance given by the noble Lord. I object to this re-opening of the settlement of the Tithe Commutation Act, 1836, on behalf of one party only to the bargain. I think if the settlement is re-opened at all, it should be re-opened in the interest of both parties. I may say the Government have re-opened it on a remarkably tender point in regard to tithepayers. We do not object to pay tithe. English yeomen and landlords have never objected to it, but what we do say is that the amount of it we are asked to pay is unduly, improperly high; and we think that before the Government give tithe owners greater power for collecting their debt, it is their bounden duty to take care that the amount recoverable is not more than can justly be claimed. It is quite useless for the Government to think that by merely shifting the burden from the tenant to the landlord they can escape all further difficulty. In Wales, we are told, the payment of tithe is objected to from religious motives, but I am not at all disposed to credit that statement. I do not think it is entirely the case, and I should not have sympathy with the Welsh people if it was the case. That a man should decline to pay from religious motives is a strange motive to put forward; it is about on a par with a Liberal politician declining to pay taxes when a Tory Government is in office. I do not think it is the case. I have read the evidence as to the origin of the tithe riots in Wales, and the reason almost universally given was that farmers objected to the tithe because, instead of being a tenth, it was in many cases a quarter or even a half. We have had tithe troubles in Hampshire, and and there I believe the troubles arose with the landowners. The Bill itself, I think, points to the fact that too much tithe is demanded, because we find in the Bill a clause making provision for a re-adjustment in those cases where the tithe exceeds the amount, the whole of the profit derived from the cultivation of the land. I cannot understand how anybody can suppose a man can come, and asking for a so-called tenth, have a right to claim more than the whole. Tithe is a misnomer in many cases. It is certain that tithepayers are suffering from an injustice, and the Bill proposes to stereotype and perpetuate this injustice, and, therefore, I think that tithepayers have a right to ask the House for some concession before they pass this Bill. It is all very well for hon. Members to twit the landlords upon the wish to pay less, but would not any man object to pay more than he would be properly required to pay? We do not ask to pay less for any other reason than that we think an unjust demand is made upon us. Then, I should like to call the attention of the Government to the effect upon agriculture of the present system of tithe collection and tithe paying. You have in Hampshire, in Essex, in Berkshire, and in many parts of the country, tithes exceeding in amount the value of the profits derived from the cultivation of the lands upon which the tithe is levied. And what does this mean? It means that the landlords are unable or unwilling to lay out a single farthing in repairs on buildings, or in keeping the property in proper order; that you have tenants discouraged from cultivation, and the land grows worse instead of better; and it necessarily follows that labourers lose employment, and so the Church grows more and more unpopular, being considered the primary cause of the trouble. This in itself should be a reason to induce the Government to make considerable concessions, especially in cases where we have the tithe equalling or exceeding the whole of the profits derived from cultivation. We are asked to suppose that the clause, providing that tithe owners shall have no greater claim than the amount of the profits is a concession to tithepayers; but it is impossible under this Bill that it should be arranged otherwise, for the Bill proposes that the new way of recovery of tithe shall be seizing on the rent or profits, and it is perfectly clear that the tithe owner could not recover more than the rent, so it is a necessary consequence of the method of recovery proposed, and I do not consider it is a concession to tithepayers; and if it is so considered, it is not sufficient. I think that where the tithe exceeds the whole of the profit, a much more considerable concession may justly be asked. The point I wish to make is this: it is perfectly clear that if the tithe has become more than the whole, that the machinery for ascertaining the amount of tithe due must be out of order. I will not go into the whole question of corn averages; but I should like to point out that, under the present system, the lower corn falls the more faulty becomes the machinery. In the Tithe Commutation Act it is provided that the amount of tithe payable shall be calculated on the average price of British-grown corn sold in certain markets. When wheat is at 50s. a quarter, then farmers send two or three qualities of corn to market, and the average is taken over the whole; but when wheat falls to 28s., the farmer only sends his best sample, not offering the second and third qualities; so that when the tithepayer can least afford to pay it, the tithe is high, being calculated not on the value of the whole crop, but on the value of the picked samples which alone are sent to market. Here, I think, we have a grievance that deserves inquiry. I dare say we shall be told it is impossible to re-open the whole question of tithe and corn averages, but that is not the point. The tithe owners say, "alter our method of recovery," and while we acquiesce in that, we say alter also the Act in another detail on our behalf. We do not ask to have the whole basis of corn averages altered; we ask merely for an alteration of the present system of ascertaining the value of British-grown corn. If that is done, I am certain the tithe will be lowered considerably, and we shall escape from the difficulty of having land where the tithe exceeds the profit. We shall be reminded of the difficulties, and that a Committee have reported on the almost impossibility of interfering with the corn averages. It may be so; and if it is so, and the Government wish to shirk the difficult and almost impossible task, then we ask them to extend to tithepayers some advantage in the Redemption Clauses of the Bill. As I understand these clauses, they are at present absolutely unworkable and impracticable. I do not think you will find a single instance of a tithe owner or payer of tithe exceeding £1 redeeming under the terms offered in the Bill. We know that the clergy especially are very hard hit. They have a very small income, and I believe they might honestly say they could not afford any further reduction in that income. This means, according to the Government proposals, that the tithepayer would have to offer them such a sum for their tithe as at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. would equal their present income. This would amount to 28½ years' purchase, and the tithepayers are offered this at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If you work this out it amounts to this—that the tithepayer for 50 years will be called upon to pay 23 per cent. in excess of the sum now paid to the tithe owner. It is quite clear that no tithepayer in his senses would ask the tithe owner to agree to redemption on these terms. I cannot help thinking that under these Redemption Clauses the Government have an opportunity of making a considerable concession to tithepayers, and I trust from what the President of the Board of Trade has said that they will take advantage of the opportunity. If they do so, they will have the gratitude of the whole tithepaying community and of the whole agricultural interest, and, what I believe they will value more, the support of an united party, in which my vote will be included.

Mr. H. R. Farquharson

*(9.12.) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): As a Welsh Member, I am deeply interested in this matter, and what I have to say will be from a Welsh point of view. There is a total distinction between the Welsh and the English view. With English Members in the main this has been a question of property, and this has been exemplified in the interesting speech to which we have just listened; but in Wales we regard the question from a wholly different standpoint, and it is well the House should understand that the vast majority of the Welsh people regard this as matter of conscience and religious principle. I quite admit that, mingled with this, there are other motives; agricultural depression and other elements have played a part, but undoubtedly the principal element is the religious principle, and those who fail to acknowledge this will fail to understand the strong feeling of the Welsh people. There is no doubt that the main object of the Bill is to rivet the tithe permanently upon the people in the interest of the Church of England. The greater part of the Bill is to render tithe safer than before, to make it more secure, and, so far as may be, to perpetuate it as the property of the Church of England as by law established. This is why the Bill is so unpopular in Wales, and why Welsh Liberal Members find it impossible to acquiesce in it. It is altogether too late for any legislative changes to reconcile the Welsh people to that Church. English Members may not be aware of the scandals attached to tithe appropriation in Wales in the past, and if I refer for a few moments to past history it is to explain the deeply-rooted aversion of the Welsh people to the present system by law established. A large proportion of the Welsh tithe was literally stolen from the country by Henry VIII. and his descendants, and given to Court favourites, sold again by them, and as lay property has been handed down to the present day to owners who have no residential or any other connection with the Principality. These facts have been burned into the memories of the Welsh people. Another large portion of the tithe was alienated by the Bishops, sold or set apart for the endowment of their families, and so it has come to pass that a great portion of the tithe has ceased to perform any ecclesiastical function or to be of any use whatever to the Principality. I am sure the Postmaster General will bear me out in this. To show the truth of my observation, I would remind the House that in 1836, when the Tithe Commutation Act was passed, the amount of Welsh tithe was £280,000, and of this amount £67,000 a year belonged to clerical improPRIATORS non-resident in Wales; £61,000 to lay improPRIATORS scattered over the country; £8,000 to schools and colleges; and only £137,000 belonged to the parochial clergy. But let it be remembered that a large number of the parochial clergy were absentees, their posts were sinecures, and the duties were discharged by miserably paid curates. So, of the whole of the tithe collected in Wales at the time of the Tithe Commutation Act, only a third went to the working clergy of Wales. Can the House conceive a greater abuse? There is only one comparison I can make, and that is the way in which the revenues of the Irish Church were formerly distributed. The Welsh and the Irish Churches were conspicuous examples of ecclesiastical corruption, and each succeeded in alienating the feelings of the people. One illustration of the extent of the abuse of ecclesiastical management is furnished in the fact that in 1830 it was computed that in the See of St. Asaph, a poor diocese, no less than £27,000 a year was absorbed by the Bishop and his immediate relations, sons mostly, who had been preferred to all the rich livings in the diocese, and the entire working clergy of the diocese only received £18,000 a year. There was a state of things in which the parochial clergy were aliens in blood and language from the great bulk of the people; the ceremonies of the Church—such as baptism, confirmation and marriage—being performed in English and translated into Welsh by an interpreter at the Bishop's or clergyman's elbow. Need we wonder that the great bulk of the people became Nonconformists and that the Church of England stank in the nostrils of the people. Wales became absolutely alienated from the Church of England, and it is wholly impossible now to alter this condition of feeling. I do not say these abuses exist now. A great many Acts of Parliament have been passed to improve this state of things, and the most flagrant abuses have been removed; but even in the present year of the total tithe collected in Wales—£300,000—still, 37 per cent. is appropriated to lay purposes and only 63 per cent. to the local clergy. Contrast the action of the Ecclesiastical Authorities in Wales with that of the Nonconformists who, out of small earnings, have built 3,000 chapels, and maintain their religion at a cost of £300,000 or £400,000 a year, and it will be seen that the religious life of the people has flowed through channels outside the Church of England. No doubt there has been a considerable revival of the Church in late years, and the Establishment is in a much healthier condition than it has been in for the last century; yet, still, it cannot be denied that Nonconformity has made the Welsh people the most religious in Europe. This I assert without fear of contradiction. How can a people with such a history acquiesce in the payment of tithe to the Church of England? It is wholly impossible. It never can be held that the tithe has any sacredness in the minds of the Welsh people. The Welsh people do not regard tithe as enjoined by the teachings of the Christian religion; their interpretation of the New Testament leads them to believe the tithe is no part of the Christian dispensation. To them it is a Jewish institution, and derives its existence in our time from the darkest ages in the history of the Church. They do not regard it as in any sense a divine institution, and it is impossible that it should have in their minds that sacred or semi-sacred character it has in the minds of many English members. We must bear these facts in mind in forming our judgment. It is impossible that we can legislate for Wales in this matter as we can for England, where apparently the majority of the people acquiesce in the payment of tithe and its application to the Church of England. The Welsh nation never can be satisfied until tithe is made national property. We must treat Wales as a nationality, and that is the foundation of the whole question. Wales has a separate nationality in history, language, blood, and ideas; and if you wish to have a peaceable and settled Wales, a source of strength to the whole Kingdom, you must satisfy this deep national longing. You do not understand how deep the feeling is; the great mass of the people are possessed by it; and, until you recognise this and grant religious equality, you will have ever recurring troubles in Wales. Pass what Bill you like now, you will come no nearer to a settlement of the question. Agitation will follow agitation, and trouble succeed trouble, and the demand for Home Rule will increase. Now, I put it to this Unionist Government, who wish to discourage Home Rule agitation, if they wish to weaken the desire for Home Rule in Wales, let them grant Disestablishment and the nationalisation of the tithe. Do this, and you will take the heart out of the Home Rule movement; refuse this, and you stimulate a movement against what you conceive to be the best interests of the kingdom. I believe the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Raikes) knows the truth of this. He lives in Flintshire, and knows the feeling there. He knows that if you refuse this the agitation will increase and Members will be returned for Wales of more and more advanced opinions. I hold comparatively moderate views. I do not wish to see a needless multiplication of Legislatures; but to bind our peoples together there is only one way, and that is to recognise the national desire and deal with each part of the country in a manner suited to its national traditions and deeply-seated convictions. Then in Wales you will have the most contented and peaceable part of the United Kingdom. If you refuse this you prepare for yourselves and for the Legislature of the future greater difficulties to deal with. We do not wish to see things carried to extremes; we do not wish to see a very radical solution; we would rather see things solved in a moderate and reasonable way, and therefore we ask and hope for some expression of sympathy for the reasonable representations of the Welsh people.

Mr. Samuel Smith

*(9.30.) SIR JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury): It is very much to be regretted that the hon. Member, like others, should have entered the region of Disestablishment and other questions altogether foreign to the objects of the Bill. There have been statements made on the Church Question and arguments based on these statements which should not be allowed to pass unanswered. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Hussey Vivian) alluded to the origin of tithe, and quoted Lord Selborne as apparently in favour of the idea of a tripartite division of tithe. The hon. Member for Bristol seemed also to say there was this tripartite division, and that there was a special allocation for the poor. But I know something of the matter, having made a special investigation of it some years ago, and I will ask the House, not to take my opinion, but to hear what Lord Selborne has said on the subject. He quotes a tract published by the Liberation Society, called The Case for Disestablishment. The author of the tract says of the tripartite division:—

"(1) In all early laws about tithes it is clearly laid down that the poor were to have a share. (2) That at first the division into four parts, and after a while into three parts, prevailed here. (3) That later on when tithes were not so freely given away, and a law was passed to compel them, the same plan was insisted on, and the poor still had their share. (4) That this was before the time of Parliaments, but when Parliaments made laws upon the subject their rights were preserved. (5) That nobody seems to know how or when the poor lost their legal claim to a share of the tithes."

"Of these statements," Lord Selborne says, "there is but one to which that degree of respect is due, which may be accorded to all opinions which have been the subject of honest controversy among learned men, namely, that which relates to the division of tithes, in a remote age, into parts, of which one was for the poor; but it is necessary for those who maintain that opinion to show by historical evidence that at some time or other in England any such practice did in fact prevail, and this has never been, and never can be, done. It is absolutely unfounded."

The idea arises simply from the practice of foreign Churches, which was never introduced into England. In some dioceses of French, Spanish, and some other Churches the division was into three only of those parts, the Bishop taking no share. The hon. Baronet the Member for Swansea (Sir H. Vivian) has spoken of the mysterious origin of tithes; but there is no mystery about it if the historic documents are investigated. The original gifts of tithes exist by hundreds in our public libraries, especially gifts by the owners of manors and parishes in this country. Thus you have the origin of tithes, and this explanation is probably quite sufficient for the purposes of this discussion. I think the Government deserve great credit for the way in which they have brought in the Bill, and the provisions which they have included for the collection and possible redemption of tithe. It is assumed that whilst the tenants have been in the habit of paying the tithes, it was not the intention of the Act of 1836 that they should pay them. But if that were not the intention it was the necessary consequence of the provisions in that Act for the recovery of tithe. The remedy is against the tenant and not against the landlord, so that it is much more to the interest of the tenant to pay than to leave the payment to the landlord. Where the tenants are willing to trust the landlords it is more convenient that the landlord should pay, and my own practice has been to take all the tithes into my own hands. But there is a drawback. What is the effect of the landlord taking this course? During bad years the tenants, paying a fixed rent, while the tithe is regularly descending, give a constantly increasing rental to the landlord, because he pays a less tithe; but when the years are prosperous the tithes go up, and the landlord loses by that, and has no advantage from the increased prosperity of the land. So that in order to make things fair we should have to return to the exploded practice of corn rents. I think it desirable to make the change proposed by the Bill, namely, that the landlord should pay the tithe. Reference has been made to the provision of the 2nd clause with regard to the special rate. I look on that as the happiest provision of the Bill. It provides a means of discerning whether the tithe and the value of the land are in accordance with one another; and the valuation is placed in the hands of those who are sure, in their own interests, to see that the value is as high as it ought to be. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade alluded to grievances which undoubtedly prevail, and which, I think, demand a larger recognition from the Government than they seem inclined at the present moment to afford. With reference to what fell from the hon. Member for Bristol with regard to the landlords putting the money into their own pockets, I repudiate that insinuation altogether; but I would ask for a remedy, because it is an injury to the Church that these cases of hardship should occur. They are numerous in some counties, but rare in others, and form no large proportion of the total amount of tithe raised in England; but so long as they exist they are a scandal, and some way of dealing with them is needed. This opinion has not been formed without due consideration of the subject, nor without other opinions backing up my own. The question was discussed by a Diocesan Conference in my county two years ago, and a Special Committee was constituted, containing nearly all the dignitaries of the diocese—archdeacons, canons, and parochial clergy, as well as squires and landlords. The Committee came to the conclusion that, as a whole, the tithe system had worked well since 1836, and did not require any alteration except in regard to the hard cases, and that, with regard to the hard cases where the tithe is out of all proportion to the rental value of the land, some remedy was demanded, which should be applied subject to revision—that is, that you should not apply a final settlement to any reduction you might make. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade has said it is impossible to have any re-valuation, and I quite agree in that; but where the tithe exceeds one-half of the whole valuation of the land, or amounts even to the full value, that is certainly not what was intended when the Act of 1836 was passed. That was intended to be a final Act, on the supposition that the conditions of life then prevailing would continue, and that the produce of the soil of England would remain the same as it was then. One object was to stop any further increase of the tithe consequent upon agricultural improvements, so that the door should be closed against a rise, and equally closed against a fall. But owing to the fall which has taken place in the prices of produce, it has become impossible to realise the rates in respect of which the land was valued. Tillage has largely disappeared, and the land has gone back from a considerable rental to the poor and inferior prices of pasturage, in many cases amounting only to 3s., 4s., and 5s. per acre. In such cases the tithe becomes an absurdity; certainly it is an offence against public sentiment. It is a transfer of the estate from the landowner to the tithe owner. Well, under the provisions of the 2nd sub-section of the 1st clause, I think it quite practicable to apply a remedy under equitable conditions to all concerned. Perhaps I may point out that, as I read the 2nd sub-section, there can be no question, whatever a Superior Court might say, the Inferior Court having before it such a case might remit not only the excess beyond the whole value of the land, but the whole tithe itself. This was not probably the intention of the draftsman, nor is it desirable to go as far as that. I would propose that instead, as the 2nd sub-section provides, of persons whose tithe was in excess of the whole special rateable value being alone allowed to go into Court for redress, a much lower figure should be taken—say, even one-half of the special rateable value—and redress should be granted for one year. Thus, in the present circumstances, a just and fair arrangement would be arrived at which would not prejudice a revision in the years when farming would again become a profitable industry in England.

Sir John Dorington

*(9.45.) MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I will preface the remarks I have to make on this Bill by saying that, not being a labourer or farmer, I do not pretend to understand the details of this measure, but being desirous of ascertaining what the farmers or the labourers have to say upon this subject, I have endeavoured to read what has appeared in relation to it in the Press, and that portion of the Press which is not at all times favourable to this side of the House. I also attended a few days ago a meeting at the Westminster Palace Hotel, a meeting of farmers from different counties in England. I will quote what I then heard in reference to this measure—

“A Bill conceived entirely in the interest of the tithe owner, which will not redress any of the grievances of the tithe payers are suffering under a Coercion Bill to screw tithe out of unwilling payers, a sop to the Establishment at the expense of the land, and in Wales of something more than the land; a Bill which, failing to provide a proper means of revision and readjustment, added insult to injury, and perpetuated a state of things which it was impossible to bear.”

That is the judgment of the farmers of the Eastern Counties of England on this Bill; my own opinion is that it is a Bill to give perpetual security to the increased incomes derived by the clergy under the Tithes Commutation Act. That meeting was composed of men who have been strict adherents to the policy of the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. One of them said—

“They had not burnt parsons' homesteads, nor boycotted the Conservatives, but had followed them like sheep, and this was their reward.”

An hon. Gentleman opposite has said there is to be no distraint, and no imprisonment. I do not know how he arrives at that conclusion; but, according to my reading of the Bill, it provides both for distraint and imprisonment. [Cries of “No.”] An hon. Member says “No.” True, under this Bill a man cannot be sent to prison, and his land cannot be sold, but he will incur the same consequences by non-payment of the tithes and costs. With a Receiver in possession the landlord cannot distrain for rent, and the farmer will be in this happy position, he will be able to punish the landlord and parson while asserting his own independence at the same time. But what else can be done? If it is proved that a man is able to pay, and refuses to do so, and a process is issued against him for contempt of the judgment of the Court, he may be sent to prison at once. If that is not imprisonment I do not know what else it is. When this sort of thing comes about we shall have friction between landlord and tenant, instead of friction which at present exists between the tenant and the parson. This is what appears to me to be the real outcome of Lord Salisbury's Bill. If I am not greatly mistaken you will find, especially in Wales, that the result will be to alienate from the Church not only the tenant, but probably the landlord as well. I see it stated in a paper called Land and Water (and I am of the same opinion) that—

“When the people recognise that the land of the country is to be farmed by County Court officials for the benefit of the clergy, and that the landlord is to be turned out of his inheritance for the sake of the parson a very formidable state of things will arise.”

Another statement was made at that meeting by one of the farmers opposed to the Bill, namely, as to the necessity of providing for re-assessment of the basis of the tithe rent-charge. It was said that at the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 the average price of wheat was 7s. per bushel; an acre, of land producing 28 bushels. This would amount to £9 16s. per acre, which, after deducting £6 as the cost of production, left the farmer a net profit of £3 16s. 0d. as the average for the seven years preceding the Act of 1836. That was the basis on which the tithe rent-charge was then fixed, but through the abolition of protective duties the extension of railways in foreign countries, and the multiplication of the means of quick and cheap transit of corn from other parts of the world, the market prices in this country were greatly reduced. Now, supposing the home farmers were able, by the use of artificial manures and a system of high farming, to maintain a yield of 28 bushels per acre, how would the balance stand. Taking the average prices of the last six years he would only receive 4s.

per bushel, instead of 7s. as formerly; that would allow him £5 12. 0d. per acre, so with the cost of production being £6, there would be a loss per acre of 8s. Where, I ask, is the justice of compelling the farmer to pay the same amount on an article on which he is losing 8s. per acre as compared with his former profit of £3 16s. 0d.? The injustice of the case is at once demonstrated. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite may say that this is the case of the farmer and labourer only, but, with due submission, I beg to think otherwise. Why, the farmer has been compelled in a large measure to give up the profitless task of wheat-growing; indeed, we are told that no less than three million acres of land which formerly produced wheat are now turned into pasture. What does this mean? It means keeping the ploughman, the labourer, and the harvest-men deprived of their healthy employment on the farms, and sending them to the large towns to swell the already large number of the unemployed. It means the driving of these men by hundreds into our mines, where they will be surrounded by dangers of which they have had no previous experience, and whereby they will be not only in jeopardy of their own lives, but the means of jeopardising the lives of other people. To pass this Bill without some provision for revision and re-adjustment on the basis upon which the tithe rent-charge is made would be, as was stated at the Westminster meeting, adding injury to insult, which has already been heaped upon the agriculturists of this country as a remedy. It is proposed to remove the direct payment of the tithes from the tenant to the landlord, but is that any real remedy for the grievance? I am afraid not, for the transfer will benefit no one but the parson and the tithe owner, whose interests are entirely opposed to those of the other parties. It is idle, therefore, to attempt to create the belief that this question will be satisfactorily settled by merely shifting the immediate payment of the tithe from the tenant to the landlord. The tithe is an impost which impedes the cultivation of the land, and affects all the interests connected with the land—landlord, farmer, and labourer. It discourages the landlord from investing capital for any purpose connected with the land. Hence, the mere shifting of the burden of tithe will not afford the remedy which is demanded, for tithe has grown to an amount which is quite out of proportion to the amount that the land can bear. It is admitted that this debate is a Welsh debate, and the hon. member for East Bradford went so far as to say that it is the agitation in Wales which has created the necessity for this Bill. I know that the President of the Board of Trade smiled his acquiescence at the assertion that it was a Welsh debate. But I cannot see, Sir, why it was necessary for him to sing to us again the plaintive cadence of the poor starving clergy of Wales. Sir, if there is any disgrace at all in this matter it is that the richest Church in the world should allow its ministers to come before the world as applicants for the charity of mankind. I think all these allusions to the sufferings of the Welsh clergy is the greatest possible disgrace to the Church and the Churchmen themselves—especially in Wales. For there you have on the one side almost all the rich and landed people who have, in addition, about £300,000 a year of religious endowments. Yet with the sufferings of the clergy of this favoured Church all the world is ringing. On the other hand, you have in that little country the great mass of the poor and the labouring classes. You have the miners and the farmers the puddlers and the shepherds, and the small shopkeepers in the villages, and all of them that are freeholders have actually to pay out of their small revenues tithes for the maintenance of a rival Church. These people have to build their own chapels, and maintain their own ministers. And you never hear of their minister being starved. The hon. Member for Oswestry said that this is not the spontaneous action of the Welsh, but is a case got up by the minority and a few agitators. If that is true, what a wonderful illustration of what minorities and agitators can effect. But I deny the contention, Sir. Previous to the tithe agitation, the Welsh people sent to this House 34 Members, 28 of whom were pledged to the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the English Church. The tithe agitation is pressing forward with incredible rapidity, and that the course taken by the clergy has given it a greater impetus nobody will deny. The Welsh poet says—

Mr. W. Abraham

"Ergyd morthwyl yr arwerthwr, Werthodd geffyl ffarmio John,
Drawodd gŵal hen gloch angladdol,
Eglwys traia y deyrnas hon.

Gwerthi yd a gwair y bobl,
Ceidwaid hedd yn rhoddi sen,
Gwel'd y ffeirad yn yr hobl, Llyn ddaw a hi i ben."

Yes, we have had very valuable assistance given by the minority and by the agitators. I do not pretend to know the origin of tithes, but this the Welsh people know, that it is used for purposes with which they have no sympathy. When in the reign of Henry IV. an Act was passed providing that the Vicar should not be removable at the caprice of the proprietor, but was to be canonically instituted and inducted, he was to be sufficiently endowed for three purposes, "to do divine service, to inform the people, and to keep hospitality." That means divine service for the nation, not a few of the nation; and it means giving information to the nation in full and not in part; and it means hospitality, to whom if not for the poor? I contend that the tripartite arrangement is found in this Statute, although it is denied. For a very long time the vicar, Bishops, and parsons have disregarded the keeping of hospitality, as they consider it sufficiently maintained by keeping themselves, and giving such charity, if any, as they think fit to dispense among the poor of their own congregations. Tithes are the property of the nation, and are devoted to the National Church, maintained by law professedly for the advantage of the nation at large. The tithe, in our opinion, thus became national property. And when the nation was of one faith, their arrangement with respect to tithes was an intelligent one, and might have had the sanction of the national will, yet since that time a change has come over the spirit of the people. For years past the Church has not only failed but has neglected to do its duty in Wales. An article in a Bangor paper says the English services in the Welsh Cathedral bears the inobliterated stamp of the iron arm. It gives interesting details regarding the services in the Bangor Cathedral. In the diocese of Bangor the Bishop receives an income of £4,200 per annum, and having sat upon his throne for 31 years he has drawn the enormous sum of £130,200. The second dignitary is the Dean; he holds a comfortable office for which he receives a handsome remuneration of £700 per annum, whilst the two Archdeacons, who are also well paid, conduct their services and deliver their charges in a language which is foreign to that spoken by the people. The Precentor, a person from Yorkshire, is also in receipt of good emolument; while the four Canons, who come to the city which affords them a pleasant change for three months every year, each receive £350 per annum for the amount of work they are called upon to do. To those may be added the ordinary and the minor Canons who are in receipt of £170 a year each, the total cost of upholding English services within Welsh Cathedrals reaches the enormous amount of £4,000 exclusive of the Diocesan. The condition of the cathedral churches in Wales is unique. The population of four Welsh cities is as follows:—Bangor, 10,000; St. Asaph's, 2,000; Llandaff, 800; and St. David's, including the island of Ramsey and several hamlets, a little over 2,000. This gives the total population of 14,800, or, say in round figures, 15,000; but it is to be remembered that not 1 per cent. of these people can avail themselves of the daily services conducted in these cathedrals. This being so, I would ask right hon. Gentlemen opposite of what good can these daily services in the cathedral of Bangor be to the Welshmen of Bethesda and the Welsh speaking population of the surrounding neighbourhood? Nevertheless the people have to pay this enormous sum of money for keeping up the services for the rich, while the poor are practically forgotten. I ask the House to contrast the position of Llandaff with its 800 people and Cardiff with its population of 80,000. Of what good are the services of Llandaff to the toiling people around? What good are they to the miners of Rhondda, or to the toilers among the hills and vales of Glamorganshire? So far as the adaptation of the Church system to the necessities of the people is concerned all this money is entirely wasted. Not only has the Church failed in its ministrations, but it has neglected to do its duty to the people. There was a time when Wales stood in need of religious services and education. There was a time when one of our poets said that Wales was in "heathen darkness," and at that time the Church of England had a good opportunity of supplying the religious want that was then experienced. But it failed to do this. What does the Rev. W. Williams, of Pantycelyn, say?—

"Pan oedd Cymru gynt yn gorwedd Mewn annwyl farwol hun,
Hef na Phrespelter na feirad
Nac un Esgob ar ddihun;
Yn y gorwel tywyll du-dew,
Pryd nad oedd y ffydd ond gwan,
Pryd yr olent fyn'd i'r meusydd,
Ac i'r lleoedd nad oedd Llan.

Howel Harriar'o Drefecca
Fel yr Udgorn seiniai ma'n, Weithiau o Sinai, weithiau o Seion, Addewidion nefol ras."

This describes the time when Wales needed religious instruction, and the Church neglected the opportunity of imparting it. The Welsh nation in those days was similarly situated to the man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves, and the Levite coming along, looked at him and passed by on the other side, and left him there to die. The priest, like the Levite priest of old, came, and saw, and passed along on the other side, and had it not been for Nonconformity in the character of the Good Samaritan journeying that way, and, taking compassion upon the people, bound up their wounds, poured oil and wine upon them, set them on their beasts of burden and took care of them, the Welsh would have remained in the same position still. There the Welsh people would have been left until to-day for anything the English Church would have done for them had not the Church been moved by the fear of losing its emoluments. There is one point more to which I would refer. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade admitted last night that the tithes, like all other Church property, were paid for services rendered to the nation at large. I would remind the hon. Gentleman that the Dean of Manchester, in a paper he read some time ago, said—

"We must be fundamental, we believe in the Holy Catholic Church, we accept history in England as fairly interpreting its claims. What can be accepted from the civil power, and undertaken by the civil power without damage to the Sovereign, we are still ready to accept and to undertake for the sake of the nation and not otherwise. We must make it clear to the nation that the duty of bringing the people of this kingdom to the kingdom of God and of Christ we have at heart, and neither position nor possession."

The clergy of the English Church say that they do not receive the tithes for doing other work than that of promoting the Kingdom of God. But in Wales the Church represents less than one-sixth of the people, while there are many parishes in the Principality that receive no service at all from the Church clergy. This is the case in Cardiganshire, Carmarthenshire, and Pembroke-shire. In a parish in Cardiganshire Mr. Griffiths Jones Penlan has been farming land for upwards of 20 years, on which he has paid £10 per annum for tithes, making a total of £200. During the whole of that period he has only been inside the church on one solitary occasion, namely, that of the funeral of his brother, which service is all he has ever received for his payment of £200. [A VOICE: More shame for him.] An hon. Member says "shame" because that person does not go to church, but what use would it be for him to go there, inasmuch as the service of the church is in a foreign tongue, which he, as a Welshman, is unable to understand. In this matter we are dealing with the Welsh-speaking people, and we are forcing upon them services in a foreign language, which they are incapable of understanding, and because they do not like to go to church to hear a service in a foreign tongue you cry "shame." This man is a deacon of a Calvinistic Methodist Chapel and pays every week his fair share towards the support of that chapel. He does not want your services, but still, though you have nothing to give him, you compel him to pay £200. In another case, in Carmarthenshire, the tithe payable in the parish is £78 per annum. There is a tiny church there, about the size of two wheelbarrows, and through the portal of that church there goes not a man, woman, or child from the beginning of January to the end of December, and yet you compel the people of that parish to pay £78 a year in tithes. In another place, in Pembrokeshire, we find a small parish and a large farm, and of them you can say that the two are one. Mr. Gibbs, the occupier of that farm, pays somewhere about £50 a year in tithes, and there is not a church in the parish. How, under these circumstances, can you expect the Welsh people to continue loyal? Can you wonder for a moment that the Welsh people are opposing your Bill? It perpetuates a payment to the clergy for which they do nothing. Do you think this Bill is going to bring peace to Wales? I am afraid it will not. The Welsh people have been loyal to a degree. They are a peaceful nation, but I am afraid that if you force this measure upon them instead of bringing peace and goodwill to us you will bring something very different. You will create dissension. If you want us to be peaceful give us justice. It is impossible that lasting peace can exist unless it is based on justice; then, let me appeal to you to give us justice. Allow us to keep our money or give us something in return; we are poor and need the money for national purposes, and we protest against being asked to pay you these tithes without receiving value for them. *(10.37.) Mr. TALBOT (Oxford University): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that from the tone of the hon. Member's remarks I should not have been surprised at his incurring your rebuke for a complaint that this debate has been exclusively carried on in the English language. If it is wrong to have religious services in English it is, surely, equally wrong to have debates in this House in that language. But the hon. Member, despite what he says in regard to the Welsh language, is willing to come here and take part in our deliberations in the language which is common to all Her Majesty's subjects. The lecturing the hon. Gentleman has given is only one illustration, as I venture to think, of the extraordinary manner in which this debate has wandered. It does not seem to me that this debate has really approached the kernel of the question, nor, from what I have heard from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, does it seem to me that they take a very serious view of the situation. It is a very curious thing that when one of the most important measures of the Session, which has been introduced by Her Majesty's Government, is under debate the leader of the Opposition is not present in his place. If I were to draw any conclusion from the appearance of the House, and especially of the Bench opposite, it would be that the leaders of the Opposition have some difficulty in making up their minds. After all, this is a Bill which in its substance the right hon. Member for Derby said last year he would cordially support. The right hon. Gentleman no doubt will follow, and will tell the House what line he is going to take on this occasion. I shall not be surprised if the right hon. Gentleman says that, although he cannot approve the Bill in every particular, he will not advise his hon. Friends to oppose the Second Reading. Whether he says that or not, that seems to be the tone, indicated by their general demeanour, which the leaders of the Opposition have adopted. That is a reasonable view to take. I am bound to say, however, that on my own side of the House little animation has been displayed on the subject. [Ironical cheers]. Well, perhaps we cannot be animated on all subjects. We look on this from a business point of view. No doubt the hon. Member who has just spoken stirred his friends up to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, I might almost say romance. We have had the subject treated from every point of view—from that of the Welsh bard to that of the politician. But I look at this as a matter of justice. The tithe is the first charge on the land, but it has been, in many cases, more difficult to collect it than the rent. Those who support the Bill do not ask for any exceptional privileges for the tithe owners. All we ask is that until a change is made in the fundamental institutions of the country and the Church is disestablished and disendowed the rights of the tithe owners shall be secured. Surely that is not an unreasonable ground to take. It is the ground on which for some years past I have endeavoured to advocate a settlement of this question. This is the fourth year in which Her Majesty's present Government have brought in a Tithe Bill. Introduced under happier auspices than any other measure of the same kind, this Bill bids fair to settle the question, and I should have thought, therefore, that the House of Commons would approach it in a business-like spirit, with the intention of seeing justice done between man and man—which intention and desire has always been the distinguishing characteristic of the British House of Commons. But this debate has degenerated into a Disestablishment debate. Why is that so? Simply, I suppose, because hon. Gentlemen cannot find an opportunity for bringing forward the question of Disestablishment legitimately, and seize upon this Bill as an excuse. And they are utterly irresponsible on this occasion, for they know that an adverse Vote will not injure their cause. When we come to look at the details of this Bill, surely they are such as will commend themselves to the common sense of this House. There is one concession made by the tithe owner which ought not to be lost sight of. At present if land is out of cultivation, two years of tithe arrears can be claimed when it again comes into cultivation. But if this Bill becomes law that claim will fall to the ground. Hon. Members who represent county constituencies will find it rather difficult to persuade their constituents that this Bill is not conceived in their interests, for no one can controvert the statement that it will remove a pressure from the tenant which has long weighed upon him in connection with the tithe rent-charge. It will remove a great deal of friction, and that must be a boon which the tenant farmers of this country will appreciate. Again, it should be remembered that the tithe rent-charge owner is the only person who pays rates upon his income. Living, as the clergy do, upon very narrow incomes, sometimes, I fear, on the very verge of privation, they find themselves called upon to pay rates upon their tithe rent-charge. This surely should be borne in mind when we are considering the re-adjustment of this question. One word as to the redemption clauses. I am glad that the Government have taken up that subject, though in what form they will carry it out may not yet be certain. If the President of the Board of Trade, however, can induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to grant money on easier terms so as to facilitate redemption he will be doing a great good; and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will, in any case, take care of the interests of the tithe rent-charge owners, from whom great concessions are demanded. I sincerely congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the care and attention which he has given to the subject, and I can promise from this side of the House, if not an absolutely unqualified, at any rate a very general support. The impression left by the debate is that the House has come to the conclusion that the subject ought to be taken out of the category of unsettled questions.

Mr W. Abraham

(10.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): The hon. Member who has just sat down has found fault with us for not being sufficiently impressed with the magnitude and importance of this Bill, and he complained that I was absent when the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill made his statement. I am very proud that the hon. Gentleman thought it worth while to notice my absence; but there was also absent, apparently, a far more important person when this great measure affecting the tithe was opened to the House, and that was the representative of the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot). Therefore, if he will permit me to return the compliment, I will express my extreme surprise that the hon. Gentleman should have chosen that particular moment to absent himself. He has talked of the unanimous tone which has characterised the whole of the debate on the opposite side of the House. The hon. Member must have singular conceptions of what constitutes unanimity. I have listened to every speech made to-night; but if the hon. Gentleman is of opinion that the speeches made by the Members for Ma'don (Mr. Gray), West Dorset (Mr. Farquharson), and the Tewkesbury Division of Gloucester (Sir J. Darington), were speeches unanimously in favour of the proposals of the Government, I entirely differ from him. There was not one single provision of the Bill which the hon. Member for Maldon did not condemn in a very strong manner.

*MR. GRAY: I am very sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I must say I certainly did not express any condemnation of that particular clause which transfers the onus of paying the tithe on to the landlord.
Mr. Talbot

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, there is one clause which the hon. Member did not altogether condemn. I will do justice to that clause presently. I have to apologise for not having been present yesterday. The fact is I was usefully employed elsewhere. My absence from the opening of the debate was due to no desire to shirk this discussion, or to escape from whatever responsibility might belong to me in respect of this measure. The hon. Member for Oswestry (Mr. Stanley Leighton) has said quite truly that I have expressed approbation of any Bill which proposed to do the following things: First, to put the payment of the tithe upon the landlord; secondly, to bring about an abolition of distress; and thirdly, to obtain a reduction of the tithe if the land required it. I entirely agree, and if this Bill contained those provisions, or anything like them, I should be perfectly prepared, however much I might differ on the details, to support it. But, in my opinion, it contains none of them. This Bill does not put the payment upon the landowner and discharge the tenant. Of course you are not speaking of the case where the landowner now pays the tithe, but of the case where the occupier bears the burden. I venture to affirm that where the tenant now pays the tithe under contract with the landlord, this Bill does not discharge him from that payment. He will have to pay it exactly the same, though you may call it by another name. And with regard to the owner who is likewise the occupier there is naturally no pretence that he receives any discharge. Now, I want this to be examined most carefully, because I want the occupiers of this country to see to what extent they get any relief at all under this Bill. You say the Bill abolishes distress. I absolutely deny that it abolishes distress on any occupier whatever against whom it now operates. Not only this, but it introduces distress under circumstances which will make it a much greater burden. It leaves distress in every case where it now exists and makes it far more burdensome and costly than at present. I ask any hon. Gentleman to look at Clause 6,

Sub-section 2, of the Bill. On the whole, in England I should say, it is the more ordinary case for the tenant to contract to pay the tithe, and that is the case dealt with under this sub-section. In that case the tenant of the land—

"Shall owe in addition to and as part of his rent, such sum in each year as the owner has paid in respect of the tithe rent-charge."

He is not relieved of the tithe rent-charge in any way. The landlord has paid the tithe, and he comes down on the tenant and levies upon him in place of the parson. The tithe under the name of rent will be exactly the same thing as the man paid before this Bill was introduced. How then is that man relieved? Take a case in which a tenant pays £100 rent for his farm and the tithe rent-charge is £50. At present the tenant pays £100 rent to his landlord and £50 to the parson. Under this Bill the landlord will pay the £50 to the parson, and he will come down upon the tenant and demand that £50. Calling it rent does not make it different; it is tithe just as it was before. What is the relief then? The only difference is that the landlord levies instead of the parson, and as the agent of the parson. Now, I have said that distress is not done away with. Supposing that tenant says to his landlord, "No, I will pay you the £100, but I will not pay the £50 of tithe which you have paid on my behalf," just as he might have said to the parson, "I will not pay the £50." The only remedy the parson would have would be distress upon the land. But what is the situation of the tenant-farmer now? He is liable, not only for that which can only be levied by distress out of the land, but as you have by this Bill constituted it rent due to the landlord, the remedies against the tenant are the same remedies as those which the landlord has for rent. But that is not all. It becomes a debt which can be sued for; it becomes a personal obligation which affects the whole property and person of the occupier; you can have executions not only against the land, but against the whole property of the tenant; ay, and in the last resource you can have ejectment for non-payment of this sum of money, which really is tithe. I say that so far from relieving the occupying farmer you place upon him a threefold burden; you create against him two remedies for levying this sum of money to which he was not liable before. He is liable to tithe as a debt for which, after judgment, he may be sent to prison, and you have made him liable to ejectment. A nice position this, in which to place the Nonconformists of Wales. You create against the tenant remedies of a most oppressive character to which he is not now subjected. That is the case of the tenant under contract to pay tithe at present; it will be screwed out of him as before. Now, let me ask the attention of the House to a matter of the gravest importance, and one which ought to be thoroughly understood in the country. Look at the condition of the small holder who is owner and occupier of his own land. In my mind, that is a class of the community that requires the greatest protection at the hands of this House. He is dealt with in Clause 3, Sub-section 2, which says—

"Where the owner of the lands is also the occupier, he shall, on the appointment of the Receiver become tenant to the Receiver in like manner as if he had attorned tenant to him as owner, and the sum ordered to be paid were the rent payable to the Receiver as such owner."

I ask the House to listen to this and to consider the case of a man of this class, so numerous in Wales, who refuses to pay tithe. In what position does this Bill place him? He is made tenant to the Receiver. Who is the Receiver? He is the agent of the parson, he is the tithe collector—what used to be called in Ireland the tithe proctor—and you positively take this freeholder and, in order to collect the tithe, make him tenant to the tithe collector. Is this going to bring peace to Wales? A more monstrous outrage I never heard of. [Ministerial laughter.] Yes, you may laugh at these small freeholders, but you will soon laugh at the wrong side of your mouth, I think. If you make the small freeholders in England and Wales tenants to the tithe collector, you will find that your tithe, and the objects for which it is collected, will disappear very rapidly. Under this clause the tithe collector will have all the rights of the landlord, and amongst them, of course, the power of distress. What becomes, then, of the pretence that you do away with distress? The very first remedy that will be applied under this clause is distress. The freeholder, being tenant to the Receiver, is subject also to an action and to judgment and consequences of judgment. This clause says—

“Where the owner of the lands is also the occupier he shall, on the appointment of the Receiver, become tenant to the Receiver in like manner as if he had attorned tenant to him.”

There is no attempt to define the conditions of this tenancy, and whether they are to contain a provision for re-entry is not stated, but whether there is to be a provision for re-entry or not, if the man is made tenant to the tithe-collector he can be turned out of his tenancy at any time. It comes to this, that you make the small freeholder the tenant of the parson in order that the latter may recover the tithe. To suppose that you are going to bring peace to Wales by legislation of this character, to my mind, passes beyond the limits of absurdity. In Clause 3 you deal with the non-occupying landowner, and whilst you have created a personal liability in the case of the occupier, you take very good care that the landowner shall have no personal liability whatever. Throughout this Bill your extreme regard for the interests of the landowner and your extreme disregard of the interests of the occupier are conspicuous. In the first section of Clause 3 a landowner not being an occupier is protected in this way:—

“An order under this Act shall not be executed personally against the owner.”

But there is no provision that an order shall not be executed personally against the occupier; in fact, it is to be executed personally against the occupier. Therefore, whilst you have provided that the owner shall not be personally liable,

“Nor by sale of the lands, nor by any process of law other than that provided by this Act,” you give no such protection to the occupier. Why then does the hon. Member for the Oswestry Division (Mr. Stanley Leighton) claim my vote for this Bill? It violates every principle which he asks me to support. He may, perhaps, say that some of the Amendments which were inserted by the Attorney General at the eleventh hour last Session were open to the same objection. That is perfectly true. I must confess that when those clauses were flashed upon us all of a sudden by the Attorney General, I did not realise that this was the case. [Ministerial cries of “Oh!”] No, and I venture to say that at the time nobody realised it. It is rather remarkable that even in this debate no one has yet drawn attention to the consequence of making a man liable for rent in this manner, and to how entirely it changes the aspect of the question when you do that which is the key-stone of this Bill, convert tithe rent-charge into a rent liability. If it be a reproach to me that I did not realise that these consequences would have followed from the proposals made last year, I accept the censure that may be passed upon me. I do not believe the Government realised what they were doing. I believe they thought they were giving relief to the tenant, whereas they were really imposing upon him a great burden. I also approved, as the hon. Member for Oswestry says, of the reduction of the tithe rent-charge. When the hon. and learned Attorney General produced his new clauses to the House last year, there was one which I fixed upon at the time as most valuable. That was the clause for the constitution of the County Court as a Land Court to revise the tithes, and now that clause has disappeared altogether. It is remarkable that the President of the Board of Trade denounced that clause and its principle in his speech yesterday. The Government are not fortunate with their Tithe Bills. They have introduced four, and they have all miscarried. Last Session they introduced a measure which was so knocked to pieces that they were obliged to change its whole scope, and now one of the very Amendments which they then proposed is condemned by the President of the Board of Trade. That Amendment said—

Sir W. Harcourt

“The Court, on being satisfied by evidence that it is just, shall make such order for the remission of part of the sum claimed as will prevent the total sum of the tithe rent-charge from exceeding the annual sum which, under all the circumstances of the case, may reasonably be taken to have been the net profit of the land.”

That is something like a remission of tithe. Net profit was the principle of that measure. If there was no net profit the whole sum could be remitted and the amount so remitted could not be recovered. But all that has gone, and the Amendment proposed by the Attorney General, I suppose with the sanction of the Cabinet, carrying that principle into effect has altogether disappeared. And what have we in its place? We have this extraordinary affair called the special rateable value. I should have thought the farmers of England had been bothered enough with rateable value already without being introduced to a new rateable value. This is an entirely new departure from the proposal of the Attorney General last year, and I am not pledged to support anything entirely different from that. This is not the Bill I am pledged to support. In my belief this is nothing but a re-opening of the settlement of 1836. In my opinion, the claim of hon. Gentlemen opposite and on this side of the House for a fair and equitable revision of the position of the tithepayers is one that cannot and ought not to be resisted. I am glad that hon. Members behind me will take the opinion of the House about going into Committee upon the question whether there ought not to be a revision of the tithe. I think Her Majesty's Government must perceive from the speeches which have been made from their own Benches the largeness of the undertaking they have entered upon. The alterations demanded by the hon. Member for the Maldon Division (Mr. Gray) and the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Farquharson) are alterations of the whole fabric of the Bill. As to the Redemption Clauses, they have been condemned past all redemption by the speakers who sit behind me. There was no epithet of contempt which the hon. Member for West Dorset did not heap upon them. He said that under the terms fixed by this Bill no man in his senses would redeem, except it was in the case of small building property. Unless the Government intend to keep us sitting till September I should advise them to withdraw the redemption clauses. They are of no use to anybody; they are utterly unworkable, and I do not think they could ever be hammered into a workable measure. In dealing with property of this character, where the value is to be determined by bargain between the tithe owner and the tithepayer, I can conceive no worse Body to preside over that bargain than the Board of Agriculture—it is the most unfit body that could be chosen. As the hon. Member for West Dorset said, the person who would negotiate on behalf of Church property would be merely the life tenant. The life tenant is not the proper person to deal in bargains with respect to that description of property, and if the redemptions are carried out the very worst Body to remain Trustees of that description of national property is the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In their whole framework the redemption clauses are to be condemned. I confess I see but one merit in this Bill, and that is, that it professes to transfer the burden of tithes from the tenant to the landowner. But in its present shape it does not do so at all. As long as you leave the tithe upon the land you cannot help interfering with the tenant, because the occupier is the person from whom the tithe is to be collected. You have no hesitation in making the occupier personally responsible, and you have done so, but you have not made the landowner personally responsible. In all these respects it appears to me that the Bill entirely fails to accomplish the objects you professed in our discussion last August. It does not relieve the tenant by transferring the burden of liability to the landlord, and it does not abolish distress. It keeps up distress in every case where it at present exists, and it does not provide anything adequate to meet the other evils of an action against the tenant and dismissal from his holding. Nor does it provide anything adequate for the revision of the tithe. Under these circumstances I confess I see extremely little in this Bill that should make it worth adopting, and certainly nothing that promises a settlement of the tithe question. Throughout this discussion I have endeavoured to conform to the invitation of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Talbot), and to discuss the matter quite apart from the question of the appropriation of tithe. I have said nothing with regard to disestablishment, although I have my own opinion on it. I have looked at the question only from the point of view of the effect the Bill will have on the occupier of land in England, which, I think, will be most prejudicial. With reference to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Pictou), and the speeches we have heard from representatives of Wales, if I may offer a word of advice to them, it is that they should sever the question of Welsh Disestablishment from the question of English Disestablishment. I think it is unfortunate that in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester the two questions are involved the one with the other; and it would be far better if the question of Welsh Disestablishment were made the subject of a separate Motion. When it is thus raised I shall heartily support it, for I believe the case for Welsh Disestablishment and the appropriation of Welsh tithes to education or other national purposes has been abundantly established and ought to be supported. No doubt we shall have to go into Committee on this Bill; but unless the Government alter the Bill as materially and as fundamentally as they altered the Bill of last year, I do not think there is the smallest chance of its passing into law. If they want to save the time of the House I strongly advise them to throw a great deal of their cargo overboard. If they confine their Bill to one or two clauses, one clause throwing the liability for tithe upon the landowner, and another clause giving the County Court power to equitably revise the rent-charge, then they might pass their Bill. But in the form in which it is now framed the Bill does neither of these two things. The occupier is left with all the grievances complained of, his burden is practically as before. A Bill which leaves the remedy of distraint and other remedies extant against the occupier, and which gives no equitable revision of the tithe, is a Bill so useless and so injurious that if a Division is taken I shall certainly vote against the Second Reading.

*(11.35.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The right hon. Gentleman always interests the House, and never more so than when he is replying to himself. He has devoted the body of his speech to explaining away, as far as he can, that cordial approval which he bestowed on these self-same propositions when they were before the House last Session. The right hon. Gentleman is frank; he says it is only recently he has found salvation on this subject; possibly what happened yesterday may have contributed to it; and I still cherish the belief that if he had spoken early yesterday we might have found him in the same mind he was in last August, when he assured the Government of his cordial support in passing these very propositions which he assures us now are impossible and untenable. The Amendments proposed last August by the Attorney General are not merely substantially but they are verbally identical with two of the clauses of the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman objects to-night—Clauses 3 and 6. And what said the right hon. Gentleman then? He said—

Sir W. Harcourt

"What I desire is that the Government should introduce a clean Bill, if I may be allowed to call it so, such a Bill as that circulated in the form of the Amendments of the Attorney General. We will then consider that Bill, and deal with it as containing a principle we on this side of the House approve of, namely, that the tithe shall be put on the owner, and not on the occupier. It further contains the principle that the tithe shall be reduced when rents and profits are not adequate to meet it. We approve of that, and also of the principle that in future the power of distraint should be abolished."

Well, Sir, that is the Bill of this Session. We have adopted the very words which at that time met with the warm approval of the right hon. Gentleman, although I am bound to say they were not viewed with equal approval by the right hon. Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan); for I believe he was almost a martyr, or at least a confessor, for the principles he then expressed, and to which he has now converted his right hon. Friend. I am unable to follow the particular circumstances which have led the right hon. Member for Derby this year to sit at the feet of the right hon. Member for Denbighshire; but the fact is evident. There is only one respect in which the Bill of this year departs from the Amendments of the Attorney General; that is in the clause by which the Assessment Committee are substituted for the County Court for valuation purposes. Those who are familiar with county business will see how considerably the Bill of this year benefits the occupier of the land as compared with the Bill of last year; because this Bill makes it possible to bring down tithe to the level of the rateable value, which is formed on the basis of the land having paid a certain profit over the rental value instead of bringing it down to the net profit, which does not allow any margin of the sort. If the right hon. Gentleman has at heart the interest of the tenant-farmers, with whom he occasionally endeavours to coquet, though I think not very successfully, he should find in this clause an additional reason for supporting proposals on which he bestowed such encomiums last year. I do not know that I need occupy more time with the objections of the right hon. Gentleman; we may leave the speech of the one year to reply to that of the other. I think I have shown that the controversy is not so much between us and the right hon. Gentleman as between himself and one of his many former selves. For a moment or two I will refer to a few other speeches, though I am most unwilling at this hour to follow my hon. Friends and neighbours of Wales, who have made this discussion a sort of happy hunting ground for airing their views on Welsh disestablishment. I was glad to hear the words of counsel the right hon. Gentleman gave as to keeping separate questions distinct from each other; but I fear his example may, before long, be in the opposite direction. The Mover of the Amendment and others appeared to me to labour under a strange confusion and conflict of purposes, which made their speeches more interesting as psychological exercises than as contributions to serious debate. We have had hon. Gentlemen objecting to the Bill because it is a tithe owners' Bill, and we have had others objecting because they say it whittles away the property of the tithe. Not unfrequently we have heard hon. Gentlemen make use of both of these mutually destructive lines of argument as reasons for opposing the Bill. Most of the speeches which we have heard have answered each other; and it has been characteristic of more than one speech delivered below the Gangway opposite that it has answered itself. It is said that this Bill ought to be opposed because it will diminish what is called the national property in tithe, and we are told that this is national property because it belongs to the National Church, and then we are also told that the Church is no longer to be regarded as the National Church. We are told that the State ought to take possession of the tithe because it belongs to a National Institution, and in the same breath we are told that the Church is not a National Institution. Such are the mutually destructive arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and constitute the stock-in-trade of the usual disestablishment speeches we have listened to. But the hon. Member for the Eye Division (Mr. Stevenson) has discovered another pretext which excites our interest and curiosity more than the others with which we are more familiar. He told us we were to regard the tithe as not paid by the tenant—and there, I think, he was right—as not paid by the owner—and there, in a certain sense, he was also right—and then he proceeded to deduce from these established propositions the theory that the tithe is paid by the community, and therefore it was possible the community might become the recipients of the tithe. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is a landed proprietor; if he is, I trust he is not a mortgagor. If he is the proprietor of property subject to mortgage, he might as well declare that he does not pay the interest on the mortgage; it is paid by the community amongst whom he would otherwise spend his money. I remember he introduced this argument last year, and it struck me as one of the most interesting curiosities produced from the brain of hon. Gentlemen carrying on the search for novelties in politics. The speeches delivered by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House have been very valuable contributions to the discussion. The hon. Member for the Maldon Division (Mr. Gray) has spoken with a vigour and independence which Her Majesty's Government are ready to honour and value; but though he made several suggestions as to the direction in which this Bill might be improved, he spoke generally in favour of it. The point he urged in regard to the separate assessment of buildings and land, and the deduction of the rateable value of buildings, is one the Government regard as well deserving consideration. There was another point he urged in the course of his speech with regard to the Board of Agriculture being allowed to appoint an arbitrator in the fixing the value of the tithe rent-charge which also appears to the Government to demand very careful examination. In the same way some of the suggestions of the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Farquharson), although perhaps not so practical because a little more ambitious, are yet suggestions the Government are glad to have heard, and which will receive the attention of the House in Committee. There have been two speeches made in the course of the debate in regard to the Welsh part of this question which I should like to notice. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire said Wales was unanimous against the Bill, and that if this Bill were forced through it would justify a Separatist movement for Wales.

MR. STUART RENDEL: What I said was a Separatist movement in this House.

*MR. RAIKES: A Separatist movement in this House, I suppose by Welsh Members. But having fired off his minor pieces of artillery, the hon. Gentleman proceeded to tell us this is a punitive measure. Looking at the Times I do not find that word in the report of his speech; but he used the expression. Well, I shall have an opportunity next week of addressing a Welsh constituency, and I may tell the hon. Member that the first and foremost measure to which I will call attention, as a claim of the Government on the confidence of the Welsh people, will be this very measure he so describes. I feel sure that any audience in Wales before whom the effect of the measure is fairly stated and not misrepresented and garbled by those who make it their business to misrepresent, and who live by misrepresentation.—[“Oh, oh!”]—I am making no reference to any Member of this House—I have never known any Member to be guilty of that—I am sure that any audience in Wales would regard this measure as a boon, and by no means as punitive. Unfortunately there are those in Wales who in the vernacular Press make it their business to misrepresent; indeed, one of the qualifications for a Radical candidate in a Welsh constituency at the present time appears to be that he should not understand the arguments by which he is recommended to the electors. Although I am not master of the vernacular tongue, I, for my part, am prepared to tell the Welsh people the truth about this Bill; and I am sure that fair-minded men, of whom there are hundreds of thousands in Wales, so far from considering this as a punitive measure will regard it as a measure relieving the tenant-farmers from a grievance of which they have long complained. No doubt it will be punitive to the agitator, for it will deprive him of part of his stock-in-trade. I do not however, think that pity is likely to be excited for those who, having fostered and aggravated that grievance, are now doing all in their power to prevent its removal. I have only one word more to say, and that is with reference to the speech delivered two days ago by my right hon. Friend the Member for Denbighshire. He went down in hot haste and, addressing his constituents, he declared the tenant would under this Bill be put in a worse position, an infinitely worse position, than before; that he was liable to be put into the County Court, to be mulcted in heavy costs, to be turned out of his holding by an officer of the Court in whose clutches he would remain until he paid the uttermost farthing. I wish my right hon. Friend had read the Bill before he made such an astounding statement. My right hon. Friend enjoyed some reputation at the Bar. He must know that a more outrageous distortion of the whole provisions of the Bill was never attempted.

Mr. Raikes

*MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: The right hon. Gentleman is quoting from an abbreviated report of my remarks. I was referring particularly to the 6th clause and to the occupying owner.

*MR. RAIKES: I am glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman will not accept the responsibility of the report. I have no doubt the most friendly reporter is sometimes obliged to abbreviate the reports of my right hon. Friend's speeches. But I am not able to give way altogether, for whether the right hon. Gentleman refers to the 6th clause or any other clause of the Bill, I should like to know how he can possibly justify the assertion that the tenant is liable to be put into the County Court and mulcted heavily in costs, because it is the owner who is to be put into the County Court, it is the owner who will have to pay costs, not the tenant. I know my right hon. Friend had no wish to misrepresent the Bill; but if he had he could not have done it more thoroughly. It is only right to expose such misstatements in this House when they are made by a man of light and leading in Wales like my right hon. Friend. The system adopted in the Bill, the system of collecting from the owner not the occupier, has been the immemorial custom in Scotland. It has been in existence, I believe, almost ever since the Reformation. We have the experience of the most practical people in the world to guide us, and we see the Church of Scotland existing under these conditions, and retaining the affection and sympathy of the people. Certainly it cannot be denied that the Church of Scotland exercises a powerful influence in the social life of Scotland. This is the system we are putting into operation, and I believe our proposal will meet the approval of the House of Commons as a body, and that we shall be followed by some of the Members of the right hon. Gentleman's own Party. Where is the Leader of the Liberal Party? He is, I presume, where the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was last year. He has not yet found salvation by listening to the eloquence of the Member for Denbighshire. The Bill, I believe, will be appreciated by the great majority of the people of the country, not as an attempt to aggrandise the Church, not to improve the position of landowners, but a serious effort to place the burden on the right shoulders, and relieve those who plead scruples of conscience against the payment of a just debt. We shall have the satisfaction of knowing that we have placed in a position of security this property, which I believe to be the property of the Church, but which equally requires to be guarded and defended if, as others say, it is property belonging to the nation.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I desire, Sir, to be allowed to make a personal explanation. In the heat of debate last night I made use of an expression in reference to the hon. Member for East Bradford which, as reported in the Times, is not correct; but which in any case, because of its personal nature, I regret having used.

(11.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 289; Noes 164.—(Div. List, No. 39.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 24th April.

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (PREVENTION)

BILL.—(No. 80.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 19.

*(12.19.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I regret I was not in the House when this Bill came on last night. I understand that objection was raised to its being proceeded with in consequence of a fear on the part of some hon. Members that power would be given to the Local Government Board to approve the inclusion of certain diseases which are contagious in their character in the operation of this Bill. A similar question was raised last year, and I was then successful in assuring hon. Members that the word infectious distinctly excluded such diseases. I may say that my opinion is fortified by that of the Law Officers of the Crown. If, after consultation, hon. Gentlemen still think it necessary to expressly provide against this contingency, I will undertake to introduce the necessary words in the Interpretation Clause on the Report stage.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 20.

(12.21.) DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): I desire to bring an important point arising out of this clause under the attention of the Committee. This clause provides that where the Act is put in force in any district in which a Local Act containing a similar provision is in force, such last-mentioned provision shall cease to be in operation. Now, I consider that to be altogether superfluous, and I propose to move that this clause be expunged, and that the Act shall not be put in force in any district in which similar provisions are enforced under a Local Act.

Amendment proposed, "That Clause 20 be omitted."

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

*(12.22.) MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to scan Clause 20 carefully he will find that if the provisions of this Act are by a Local Act enforced in any particular district this Act shall not apply.

(12.23.) DR TANNER: My point is that this clause is superfluous. Surely every district is the best authority to decide what are its own requirements. I will appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast to say if he thinks it judicious the clause should pass in its present form.

(12.24.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the assurances we have received from the hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill are satisfactory.

DR. TANNER: Very well. In deference to my hon. Friend's superior judgment I withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Monday 14th April, and to be printed. [Bill 210.]

TREES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 70.)
Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, after the word "shall," to insert the words "subject as hereinafter mentioned."—(Mr. Mucartney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Objection being taken to Further Proceedings, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday 23rd April.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to consolidate certain enactments relating to the regulation of the Inland Revenue, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson, Mr. William Henry Smith, and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 211.]

HOP INDUSTRY.

Ordered, That Sir Roper Lethbridge be discharged from further attendance on the Select Committee on Hop Industry.

Ordered, That Mr. Herbert Knatchbull-Hugessen be added to the Committee.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Saturday, 29th March, 1890.

COMMISSION.

The following Bills received the Royal Assent:—

1. Consolidated Fund (No. 1.)
2. Crown Office.
3. County Councils Association Expenses.
4. Lunacy (Consolidation).
5. Army (Annual).

House adjourned at half past Ten o'clock to Thursday the 17th of April next, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 29th March, 1890.

The House met at Ten of the clock in the morning.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners.

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. Speaker reported the Royal Assent to,—

1. Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Act, 1890.
2. Crown Office Act, 1890.
3. County Councils Association Expenses Act, 1890.
4. Lunacy Act, 1890.
5. Army (Annual) Act, 1890.

Whereupon, in pursuance of the Order of the House, of Friday 28th March, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at a quarter after Ten o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 31st March, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

EXPORT DUTIES IN THE SCILLY ISLANDS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that an Export Duty of 6d. per cwt. has been for some time charged by Mr. Smith, the proprietor of the Scilly Islands, on all flowers exported from the islands; with what object has this Export Duty been imposed, and is such duty legal; whether he is aware that Mr. Smith imposes a duty of 5s. a year on every boat-owner, and in addition 1s. extra duty for every boat actually employed, and a duty of 1d. each for all shell-fish exported from the islands, including lobsters, crayfish, and crabs; and whether Mr. Smith has carried out any works for the improvement of landing-places in the off islands out of the proceeds of those duties; whether he has been informed that in the past the captains of vessels anchored in the roads have in some instances refused to pay the charge levied upon such vessels, on the ground that no legal right existed to impose such charges; whether, in the Provisional Order constituting a Local Council for the islands, it is proposed to confirm the rights, if any, of Mr. Smith to levy these several duties; and whether he will take into consideration the advisability of withdrawing from the proprietor the right to impose some or all of these duties, especially those levied on the export of flowers and shell fish?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Provisional Order which the Local Government Board propose to issue for the constitution of a Local Council for the Scilly Islands will not touch the question of any rights of Mr. Dorrien Smith to levy the duties or charges which are mentioned in the question. The Board are not empowered by the Act under which the Order is issued either to confirm any rights of Mr. Dorrien Smith to levy these charges or to withdraw from him any such rights. As regards these duties or charges they are matters with regard to which the Board have no jurisdiction whatever.

IRELAND—THE RIVER SLANEY.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that there are 36 preserves or several fisheries on the River Slaney between the town of Enniscorthy and the source of the river in which the respective owners have neglected to pay to the Board of Conservators the amount laid down by Act of Parliament, namely, 10 per cent. on the Poor Law valuation of such fisheries; why has this money not been collected from the owners in the same way as the Licence Duty required by rod and net fishermen; and with whom does the fault lie that this rate has not been collected up to the present?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that at the present time there are only two fisheries in the River Slaney valued under the Poor Law, and that on each of these Licence Duty covering the 10 per cent. rate fixed by Statute has been paid. The point as to whether any other fisheries in this river should be rated is under the consideration of the Valuation Department. The 10 per cent. rate is recoverable by Boards of Conservators in the same manner as Licence Duty.

UNMUZZLED DOGS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it has come to the knowledge of the Police of Dunfanaghy that considerable alarm and annoyance has been caused to the inhabitants of that town by a ferocious dog, the property of Captain Brunker, of the Royal North Lancashire Regiment, stationed at Dunfanaghy; and whether this dog has frequently worried and maimed other dogs in the streets, unchecked by Captain Brunker; and, if so, whether he can say why this animal is allowed to go unmuzzled, and why its owner has not been prosecuted by the police?

L

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am given to understand that no complaint has been made to the local police, nor has any circumstance come to their knowledge suggesting that there is any ground for such a complaint.

THE BELFAST SORTING OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General how long the Controllorship in the Belfast sorting office has been vacant; and when it is to be filled up?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): There is no such appointment as that of Controller in the Belfast Post Office. The appointment in question is that of clerk, and this appointment has been filled by the promotion of Mr. Grant, who has for some time been performing the duties of Controlling officer.

THE FASTNET ROCK LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why tenders were not invited for the contract for boat attendance on the Fastnet Rock Lighthouse, which lapsed on the 6th of January last; when will tenders be invited, and what reason is there for the delay; when the late boat Halcyon was suspended from attendance, were any steps taken to ascertain the truth or otherwise of the allegations made by the crew of this boat that their lives and the lives of the light-keepers of the Fastnet Lighthouse were seriously endangered on more than one occasion through the boat's unseaworthy state; whether the Board of Trade were warned a few years ago that the boat was in a dangerous state; whether there is any intention to re-instate this alleged unseaworthy boat in attendance on the lighthouse; at what weekly cost has the steamship Alert been for weeks doing the work, and would he inquire whether the attendance could be carried on more cheaply and as efficiently by a local boat; how long is it intended to continue the Alert at this work; and is it a fact that a seaworthy boat has been offered to attend on the lighthouse at the old contract price?

Mr. Patrick O'Brien

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have communicated with the Commissioners of Irish Lights, who inform me that tenders were not advertised for as usual on the expiration of the late contract, inasmuch as the question of revision has been for some time past under consideration, but that tenders will be immediately invited by public advertisement, for temporarily carrying on the attendance on Fastnet. In January last, the contractor reported that some of his crew complained that the Halcyon was not seaworthy; but on a subsequent examination made by order of the Commissioners by the commander of their steamship Alert, assisted by his ship's carpenter, the vessel was reported to be "perfectly sound" and well found in gear, &c. Should the former contractor tender again, and his tender be accepted, the Commissioners will not object to the employment of the Halcyon. No additional expense has been incurred through the steamship Alert being sent to Crookhaven to carry out the service, beyond the cost of the coal and stores expended, and she will continue the work until such time as a new contract for the temporary service has been arranged. The former crew of the Halcyon stated they had a boat, and would attend the Fastnet at the old contract rate per trip; but the Commissioners know nothing of the boat in question. With regard to the fourth paragraph of the question, I have to say that three years ago, when tenders were being invited, the Board of Trade were told by an intending tenderer that the boat of the existing contractor was unseaworthy and the complaint was forwarded to the Commissioners of Irish Lights, who are the Executive Authority in the matter.

SALES OF INCUMBERED ESTATES.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the area and value of the land which has changed hands under "The Sale of Incumbered Estates Act, 1848," up to 31st December, 1889?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Registrar to the Land Judges reports that there are no means of ascertaining the area of the land disposed of by sale during the period mentioned. The total receipts for land sold, which, however, includes house property, amounted from 1850 to December 31, 1889, to £54,565,205.

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. PETER M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, inasmuch as originating notices served in 1887 by tenants in the County Sligo are still undisposed of, why the Land Commissioners departed from their practice hitherto of holding sittings in December as well as in July; and when the next sittings will be held? May I further ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as he now proposes to proceed with the Land Purchase Bill, it is not desirable to expedite these proceedings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; I think it is desirable that the proceedings of the Court should be carried on as rapidly as possible; but I do not know that that is a matter which is directly affected by the Land Purchase Bill. In regard to the particular question on the Paper, the Land Commissioners report that no fixed rule has ever existed for holding sittings of Sub-Commissions at regular intervals or at specified periods of the year. The Commissioners are using every exertion to have the remaining applications received in the closing months of 1887 cleared off with every possible expedition.

CHARGE AGAINST AN IRISH MAGISTRATE.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recent statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that Mr. Percy Morgan, J.P., had obtained money under the Arrears Act, in consequence of an affidavit joined in by him in which he swore that a sum of £30 rent was due to him by Bernard Clogher, his tenant, up to 1st November, 1880; whether he has been furnished with a receipt showing that on the 30th April, 1881 (one year and seven months prior to the swearing of the affidavit) Mr. Clogher had cleared up all rent due by him to the 1st November, 1880; and whether he will make inquiries into the matter, and consider whether the penalties specified in Section 7 of the Arrears Act should be enforced in the case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I have not yet had time to obtain the facts necessary to enable me to form an opinion as to the character of the transactions. I will, however, do so without delay.

MR. SEXTON: Assuming the receipt to be genuine, does it not show that a swindle has been committed?

MR. MADDEN: I am unable to give a complete answer to the question until I know what the facts of the case are.

THE ENNISKILLEN POST OFFICE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will now grant the sum of money offered as compensation to David McGaw, of Enniskillen, in 1884, in settlement of the dispute in reference to the Enniskillen Post Office?

*MR. RAIKES: A sum of £200 was offered to Mr. McGaw in 1884, on condition of his releasing the Postmaster of Enniskillen from an agreement to take a lease of the old Post Office premises. Mr. McGaw refused those terms, and the Postmaster was compelled to execute the lease. Under these circumstances, I am not now prepared to recommend that any sum of money should be granted to Mr. McGaw.

THE QUINN BEQUEST.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland why there is so great delay in the matter of the "Quinn Bequest" for Newry?

MR. MADDEN: I gather from information received from my hon. Friend the Attorney General for England that this is a bequest which is being administered in the English Courts. If the hon. Gentleman will postpone the question I will cause full inquiry to be made.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to give notice that I will repeat the question on an early day after Easter.

BOYCOTTING.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the trial of James Daly, a large merchant in the town of Carrickmacross, and three others from the same place, before Judge O'Brien, at Londonderry, on Thursday, for having boycotted the Great Northern Railway (Ireland), three of them getting six months each hard labour, the other three months; whether he is aware that they were taken from the County Monaghan to the City of Derry; that all Catholics were asked to stand aside, some of the Catholics being Justices of the Peace, and that the greater number of the jury who tried the prisoners were Orangemen; whether the report is correct that a local solicitor, not employed in the case, advised the Solicitor General as to the Protestants who should not be allowed on the jury, and that a gentleman connected with the Derry Sentinel newspaper also advised Mr. Ross as to keeping off a Protestant named Hatrick; and whether care will be taken in the future that Catholics shall not be excluded from juries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My attention has been called to the conviction referred to in the question. It is the fact that the venue was changed from the County of Monaghan to the City of Derry in order to obtain a fair and impartial trial; but I have no information as to the religion of the persons who composed the jury, or of those who were directed to stand aside. The report mentioned in the third paragraph, that a local solicitor advised the Solicitor General as to the Protestants who should not be allowed on the jury, does not appear to be correct.

MR. SEXTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman throw any light on the fact that three of the prisoners, who were not members of the National League, only got three months' imprisonment; while three others, who were members of the League, got six months' imprisonment, although the Lord Lieutenant has never exercised his full powers in that county?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I cannot throw any light upon it.

THE POSTMASTER OF MEARN'S CROSS.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether Thomas Kelly, of Esnacillager, or Mearns Cross, who was appointed postmaster some two years ago by an official from Dublin, was ever remunerated for his trouble and expense; and whether, inasmuch as Kelly set the boxes apart for stamps, letters, and papers, and kept them exclusively for that purpose since, and that his place is eight miles from Clunes, County Monaghan, and three miles from the nearest post office, some remuneration will be paid to him for his expenses?

*MR. RAIKES: I cannot find that any appointment was conferred on Thomas Kelly, as supposed by the hon. Member; but about the time stated the official delivery of letters was extended in the neighbourhood of Mearns Cross. I will, however, have further inquiry made on the subject.

THE CASE OF CAPTAIN RYE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. C. J. Harold, one of the Justices who were trying the case against Captain Rye at Crookstown, County Cork, has been and still is employed by Captain Rye as bailiff or agent; and, if so, whether an intimation will be conveyed to him not to take any further part in the case in which there are four other magistrates adjudicating?

MR. MADDEN: I have called for a Report upon this matter, but have not yet received it. I must, therefore, ask the hon. Member to defer the question.

DR. TANNER: As the matter is one of great interest, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman deign to afford me information to-morrow?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly, if I have received it.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as President of the Irish Local Government Board, whether his attention has been directed to the action of Mr. John Rye at the Bandon Board of Guardians, and if it is correctly reported that Mr. Rye endeavoured to prevent the poor labourer, Jeremiah Corcoran, from obtaining out-door relief; whether he is aware that it was proved that Mr. Rye's object was to oblige Corcoran to take the bribe of 7s. weekly made by Captain Rye, now on his trial for shooting Corcoran; and that medical evidence was given the Board in support of Corcoran's claim; and whether the Local Government Board intend to take any action in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is the case that at the meeting of the Board of Guardians Mr. John Rye did state that if Corcoran required more than the 7s. a week offered by Captain Rye it would be given, as the latter did not wish that the man should be a charge upon the rates. The assertion in the second paragraph was made by a member of the Board, but was repudiated by Mr. John Rye. Medical evidence was given in the case. The Board decided to continue the allowance of 5s. a week sanctioned at their previous meeting. The Local Government Board are not aware of anything in the matter calling for action on their part.

Mr. O'Hanlon

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that the reports which appear in all the Cork newspapers, to the effect that Mr. John Rye said that Captain Rye had offered this man 7s. a week, and that there was, therefore, no necessity for granting him out-door relief, are not correct?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the reports in the Cork papers.

DR. TANNER: Was not this money deliberately offered to Corcoran on behalf of Captain Rye, as a bribe, after having fired at him twice, not to give evidence against him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have given the hon. Member all the information that has reached me. I understand there was no question of a bribe, nor am I aware that Captain Rye fired twice. That is the very question at issue.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Was it not stated before Mr. Cecil Roche that the man had been tampered with; and did not Mr. Cecil Roche adjourn the Court so that he might have the man brought before him in order to ascertain whether he had been tampered with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Member to defer that question.

DR. TANNER: I will take the opportunity of raising the question of this discreditable transaction on the Vote for the administration of law and justice.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MAGISTRATES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that the Dromore, County Tyrone, Bench of Magistrates is composed of nine Orangemen and one Roman Catholic, although an overwhelming majority of the people in the district are Roman Catholics; and whether he will draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the matter with a view to having some Catholic Magistrates appointed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Lord Chancellor's Secretary informs me that the Dromore Bench appears to have been attended during the last three years by nine Local Justices. There is no information as to whether any of these Magistrates are Orangemen, nor as to the relative proportion of the religious denominations of the people in the district. I am also informed that the Vice Lieutenant of the county is always glad to consider the names of any properly-qualified Roman Catholics that may be submitted to him and the Lord Chancellor to give effect to such recommendations when made.

IRISH TRAMWAYS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the unappropriated residue of the £40,000 a year mentioned in "The Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1883"; and whether any, and, if so, how much, approximately of this residue will be applied, in addition to the £600,000 mentioned in "The Light Railways Act, 1889," towards carrying out the railways passed by Grand Juries under that Act?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Of the £40,000 mentioned in the Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1883, the amount unappropriated is, I am informed, £16,691, which will be available for appropriation in addition to the £600,000 provided under the Light Railways Act of last Session.

THE ERASMUS SMITH ENDOWMENT.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when will the Educational Endowments Commissioners publish their scheme dealing with the Erasmus Smith Endowment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that some delay has occurred in considering the scheme, owing to the retirement of Mr. Justice Naish, one of the Judicial Educational Endowments Commissioners, from the Commission owing to ill-health. But that the matter now only awaits the return from Circuit of his successor on the Commission.

THE CLONGOREY ESTATE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mrs. Kelly, the tenant of the Clongorey holding referred to in the order of committal issued by the County Court Judge of Kildare, has been released from prison by the Executive; whether Mrs. Morrissey, a person not the tenant of holding, is still in prison, with her infant, one month old; and whether the Executive have resolved that this imprisonment shall continue?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As already stated in reply to a former question, Mrs. O'Kelly was discharged from custody on medical grounds. Mrs. Morrissey is still confined in prison with her infant. The Executive Government have no control in the matter. The woman is in custody by order of the County Court Judge, and can obtain her release at any moment by purging her contempt.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the husband of Mrs. Morrissey is in prison also; and does he contend that this woman and her infant had any control over the farm?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not sufficiently acquainted with the case to answer the question. Mrs. Kelly was released from custody on medical grounds on the approval of the committing Judge. If medical grounds can be urged in the case of Mrs. Morrissey, I have no doubt that she will be discharged also.

MR. SEXTON: As the husband, who is the only person to control her, is in prison, is it not the imperative duty of the right hon. Gentleman to ascertain whether there has not been an abuse of authority?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already said that the Government cannot interfere.

MR. SEXTON: Then I will endeavour to press the question upon the attention of the House before the adjournment for Easter.

EVICTIONS IN DONEGAL.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the late-contemplated evictions on the Stewart and Swiney Estates in County Donegal have been abandoned in deference to any suggestions made on the part of the Irish Executive; whether like suggestions were made to the agent of the Olphert Estate; and, if so, by whom, and what was his reply; how many families have been evicted on the Olphert Estate during the past week; and how many evictions were abandoned and by whose authority, and for what cause they were abandoned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No suggestions as to the abandonment of evictions on any of the estates mentioned have been made by the Government, nor have I any reason to believe that the evictions on the Stewart and Swiney Estates have been abandoned, although it would seem that they have been for the most part deferred. I understand that one decree was executed on the Swiney Estate last week; 67 families were evicted on the Olphert Estate, all of whom, except those who were sub-tenants, had joined the Plan of Campaign and paid money into the war chest instead of to the landlord. Four evictions were abandoned at the instance of the agent to the property, owing in one case to the tenant having died the previous day, and in the other cases to the opinion of the military doctor present, that the inmates of the houses concerned were unfit for removal through illness.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a telegram was sent by the agent of the Olphert Estate to the District Inspector, threatening that he would carry out evictions himself next week if protection was not afforded, and why did he threaten to do this?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing whatever about the telegram. It appears as if it has been stolen.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Without discussing that question, I may say that, whether stolen or not, it is not forged. I beg to give notice that after the Easter Recess I will call attention more specifically to the evictions on this estate.

MR. HUGH GRAHAM, J.P.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any complaints have reached the Lord Chancellor of the conduct of Mr. Hugh Graham, J.P.,

of Rahoney, Dromore, County Tyrone, accusing him of drunkenness and threatening to assault a passenger in a railway carriage on the 27th of March, 1889, of being under the influence of drink while giving evidence in a Land Court on 23rd January, 1889, when Mr. Justice Litton had him removed from court by a policeman; and of being on another occasion drunk at the Omagh Railway Station and annoying ladies, when a policeman who was asked to arrest him refused, on the grounds that he was on railway premises; and whether the Lord Chancellor has inquired into these allegations, and with what result?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the case of this gentleman is being inquired into by the Lord Chancellor.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the professional valuer appointed by the Land Commissioners, as reported in Cork Herald, to inquire into the security offered by the holdings on the estate of Mr. H. B. O'Sullivan at Rahoon and Kilnamartyra, County Cork, for the repayment of the advance, from which it appears that the purchase money offered by the tenants was excessive, and that the combined interests of the tenants and landlord were not deemed by the valuer security for the money; whether it is a fact that the terms of purchase agreed upon by the tenants would have brought down the yearly payments to nearly 50 per cent. under the present rents; whether it is true that the rental in question was determined and enforced by the Receiver Department of the Chancery Court, and that many tenants were evicted by the court in default of payment of rack rents; and whether it is his intention to take any notice of the Report of the professional valuer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Inquiry is being made into this matter.

DR. TANNER: May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the matter has been brought under the notice of this House again and again? How long will it take the right hon. Gentleman to give me some sort of a reply, or will he give me any reply at all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a reply until I receive the information that will enable me to answer his question.

DR. TANNER: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will observe the usual courtesy towards hon. Members who feel it their duty to put questions in this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can explain how it is that some of the volumes issued by the Historical Manuscripts Commission in 1888 were allowed to appear without the valuable and exhaustive index which usually accompanies these interesting collections of manuscripts; and if, seeing that the value and usefulness of these volumes are largely enhanced by such an index, he will request the Historical Manuscripts Commission to prepare and publish an index to the manuscripts of the Duke of Rutland, the manuscripts of Earl Cowper, and any other volume of the series that is at present without an index?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham E.): It is distinctly stated in the first volume of the Report on the Duke of Rutland's manuscripts that the index to the first two volumes will be given at the end of the second. The second volume is now in the press. The index to the three volumes of the calendar of Lord Cowper's manuscripts (two of which have been issued) will be at the end of the third and concluding volume, which is practically complete and in the press. I am not aware that any other volume in the series is at present without an index.

THE CAMBRIDGE MISSION TO DELHI.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to a letter of the Bishop Designate of Durham, published in the Times of 26th March, respecting the Cambridge Mission to Delhi, in which it is stated that "This work was undertaken at the suggestion of the Indian Government, who have given the site ;" and whether this statement is accurate ; and, if so, whether this is a departure from the traditional British policy in India of strict neutrality in religious matters ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham) :

In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that the "work" referred to by the Bishop Designate of Durham is St. Stephen's College, Delhi—an educational establishment of the Cambridge Mission. It has always been the practice of the Government of India to make grants in aid to all institutions calculated to promote the education of the people, and this practice has not been found to interfere with the religious freedom which the British Government guarantees.

THE MAHARAJA SCINDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the telegram of the Governor of India, of the 19th June, 1886, to the late Maharaja Scindia, was in reply to the dying request of His Highness, that his son should not be placed for instruction under a European tutor ; and whether the Secretary of State will lay upon the Table the complete text of the letter of the late Maharaja referred to in the previous answer of the Under Secretary, and of any reply thereto ?

*SIR J. GORST : The character of the request of the late Maharaja Scindia is not correctly described in the question ; but it was undoubtedly his wish in June, 1886, that his son, then under 10 years of age, should be under native and not European tutors. This wish was for three years complied with, and the young Maharaja was left during that time under the charge of native tutors only. He is now 13½ years of age ; and in the judgment of the Government of India his own interests and those of his people require that, while neither his religion nor caste will be in any way interfered with, he shall be under the charge of a British officer. The Secretary of State does not think it in the interest of the Public Service to lay on the Table either the letter or the reply.

Mr. Bradlaugh

THE 19TH MIDDLESEX RIFLES.

MR. BRADLAUGH : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state the date or dates or tenor of any charges of insubordination preferred against the bandsmen of the 19th Middlesex (Bloomsbury) Rifles ; when such charges were investigated ; and whether the accused were then severally present and heard in their defence, or whether he will cause inquiry to be made in the matter ?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horn-castle) : The commanding officer reports that the insubordination of the bandsmen consisted of persistent and long-continued defiance of, and opposition to, the bandmaster's authority. Apart from this general course of insubordination, they were insubordinate on December 11 and January 25, on which latter day some of them were very insolent to the adjutant. I have no doubt that the commanding officer satisfied himself that these men could not be retained as bandsmen consistently with discipline ; and I do not contemplate any further inquiry.

MR. BRADLAUGH : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that with reference to Bandsmen Andrews, C. Butler, W. Butler, and Norman, the colonel heard the charge against them, and acquitted them ; while with reference to five others there has been no charge and no hearing against any of them ? If the right hon. Gentleman can be satisfied that such was the case, will he direct inquiry into the matter ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : In the interests of discipline, I shall not go behind the decision of the commanding officer.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the new Extradition Treaty between Her Majesty and the United States has been duly ratified and is now in force ; and whether, having regard to the long-standing interchange of criminal refugees between Anglo-Saxon States which may now be effectually stopped, the provisions of the new Treaty can be brought to the knowledge of the Chief Officers of Police throughout the country ?

*THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The new Extradition Treaty between Her Majesty and the United States has been duly ratified, and will come into force on the 4th of April. I am informed that the Secretary of State for the Home Department will call the attention of Chief Officers of Police to the Treaty.

RETURNS OF ACCIDENTS.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any objection to include in the Return of Accidents (Factories, Railways, and Mines), notice of which appears in to-day's Orders, the localities, and the names of the factories, workshops, and mines in which accidents have occurred during the year ending 31st October, 1889?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I cannot comply with the hon. Member's request. It would add enormously to the labour and cost of the Return; and it would be wholly unprecedented, and not a little invidious, and would lead to conclusions possibly altogether erroneous as to the persons really responsible for the accidents, unless the cause of the accident were in each case explained.

VOLUNTEER CORPS.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what regulations, if any, exist requiring that the Finance Committees of Volunteer Corps shall sanction the incurring of debt for their corps by Commanding Officers, as well as the paying of debt after being incurred by such officers?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There are no specific regulations on the subject; but it is considered that paragraphs 704 and 705 of the Volunteer Regulations are sufficient security against improper administration of the funds of a Volunteer corps, either by the Commanding Officer or the Finance Committee.

FEES IN BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the case that the fees payable to the Accountant of the Court of Session in respect of the Audit and Supervision of Bankruptcy proceedings are payable in stamps; whether these stamps are procurable only in Edinburgh; and whether, considering the large number of bankruptcy estates in Glasgow and the West of Scotland, he would arrange for the stamps being procurable in the Stamp Office, Glasgow?

*MR. JACKSON: Instructions have been given for a supply of the necessary stamps for denoting these fees to be sent at once to the Stamp Office in Glasgow.

THE CONTRACT FOR STATIONERY AND STAMPS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the new contract with Messrs. De la Rue and Company for the supply of stationery and stamps has been signed; and whether he has any objection to lay the contract upon the Table?

MR. JACKSON: The contract was signed and has full effect. No public advantage would be derived from laying it on the Table.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that officers of Customs on water-guard duty on the River Thames are employed continuously for periods of 24 hours without rest, and whether there is any bedding supplied to the Harpy cutter, where these officers are stationed; whether officers, when employed in the landing and examination of free goods fully entered, are obliged to give continuous attendance, when necessary, for 12 hours per day without any extra remuneration, during the eight months from March to October; and whether officers of the Outdoor Department are employed on clerical work at present for eight hours per day, whilst seven hours per day is the maximum for officials employed on clerical work in the Indoor Department, and what is the reason for this distinction?

*MR. JACKSON: It is true that officers of Customs employed upon water-guard duty on the River Thames are in attendance for duty contingent upon ships' arrivals for 24 hours continuously, being relieved from attendance for the succeeding 24 hours. In all such cases of employment officers do, as a matter of fact, receive some rest in addition to the time allowed for meals, which necessarily varies according to the exigencies of the work. Beds are furnished upon request to all stations where officers of Customs are liable to give attendance on water-guard duty for 24 hours continuously. Up to the present no request, however, has been received from the Harpy cutter. Customs regulations permit of the landing and examination of free goods fully entered between the hours of 6 a.m. and 6 p.m. during the eight months from March to October. This privilege is, however, not often availed of to the full extent, and only in very exceptional cases does it happen that Customs officers are required to give 12 hours' continuous attendance upon this work. Officers of the Outdoor Department who are required to be employed on warehousing accounts are necessarily held available for such service throughout the hours during which the bonded warehouses are open, which at this season of the year are eight a day; in the winter months only seven hours a day. Officers so employed are inter-changeable with those who are actually working in the warehouses or upon landing stations for the like number of hours in each day. The hours of service for the Indoor Department are based on different requirements, and are rendered, not by outdoor officers, but by clerks appointed solely for clerical work.

MR. BRADLAUGH: If it is true that the officers of the Harpy are employed continuously for 24 hours, will the hon. Gentleman see that beds are supplied?

MR. JACKSON: Beds are supplied whenever a request is made for them. No request has been made in this case. If the men think it more for their comfort that beds should be supplied, I am sure that any wish on their part to that effect will be complied with.

RAILWAY RATES—THE CARRIAGE OF MILK.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the Report made by Dr. Fox to the Rural Sanitary Authorities of Mid-Cheshire districts on the importance to the public health of cheap rates of carriage for milk; and whether the Railway Commissioners in deciding upon the matter are empowered to take into their consideration this most important question of the public health?

Mr. Jackson

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have seen the Report referred to, and agree as to the importance of cheap rates of carriage for milk. The Act of Parliament contains no special provision with regard to milk; but in fixing maximum rates for that as well as other articles, the Board of Trade must take into consideration all the circumstances affecting the case.

THE FOREST OF DEAN.

MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that some grievance is felt by persons who own sheep which feed on common or unenclosed land in the Forest of Dean, who have hitherto obtained exemption from taking out licences for dogs kept by them solely for use in tending sheep, because they have this year been compelled by the Inland Revenue officers to take out such licences; whether this change has been ordered by the Department; and whether he will consider the propriety of removing the grievance by reverting to the former custom?

*MR. JACKSON: The statutory exemption is in favour only of "farmers" in respect of a dog used solely in tending sheep or cattle on a farm. The Board of Inland Revenue have already considered the case of persons who own sheep which feed on the unenclosed land in the Forest of Dean, and have decided not to insist too stringently on the term "farmer," though it is rather doubtful whether colliers or small tradesmen become "farmers" by feeding sheep on common lands. But the Board do insist that any dog for whom exemption is granted shall be used solely for tending sheep or cattle, and any other use of such a dog forfeits the exemption and renders the owner liable to the penalty for keeping a dog without licence.

TRINITY COLLEGE, TORONTO.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (University of London): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Royal Charter granted to the University of Trinity College, Toronto, gives it authority to examine candidates, and to issue degrees in the Faculties of Arts, Medicine, Divinity, Law, and Music outside the diocese of Toronto; whether the examinations in music, conducted on behalf of the University of Trinity College, Toronto, notified to be held in London at Easter, are still to be proceeded with; and whether he has considered the protest of the English Universities, the Royal Academy, and Royal College of Music?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): This question is under reference to the Law Officers, and I therefore cannot, at present, make any statement as to the powers of this University. The Secretary of State has no control over the examinations, and has no information which would enable me to reply to the second paragraph of the question. The protests referred to in the concluding part of the question are under consideration.

INSANITARY CONDITION OF ASSIZE COURTS.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the statement of Mr. Justice Denman, at Chelmsford on Friday 21st March, that the Assize Court was in such an insanitary state as to be a perfect disgrace, and dangerous to Judges, counsel, and prisoners, and, further, to the similar comments made by Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Wills, on Thursday 27th March at Cardiff, as to the sickening smells in the Assize Court at Cardiff; whether attention was drawn by the Departmental Committee two years ago to the insanitary condition of these Courts; and whether he will take immediate steps, by representations to the Local Authority or otherwise, to have these and other Courts which may have been similarly complained of put into a proper sanitary condition?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir. The learned Judge has called my attention to the state of the Court at Chelmsford; but I have not seen the comments referred to as to the Cardiff Court. The duty of providing a proper Court-house and accommodation for prisoners awaiting trial rests with the Local Authorities. In consequence of the Report of the Committee of 1886, I made strong representations to all the Local Authorities throughout the country, including those of Chelmsford and Cardiff. At Cardiff many improvements have been made. With regard to Chelmsford, I again in July last asked the Justices to take the earliest opportunity of giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee. I am now making further inquiry with regard to both places.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the number of officials in the Inland Revenue Department who have 40 years of service; whether it is true, as stated in the Civilian of 22nd March, 1890, that eight expectant Inspectorships and one Inspectorship are vacant; and when the vacancies may be filled up?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I do not think any public object would be served by inquiring into the number of officials in the Inland Revenue Department who have 40 years of service. The statement in the newspaper referred to by the hon. Member is inaccurate. There is no Inspectorship vacant. The expectant Inspectorships are new appointments, and there has been some delay in filling them up (owing to the examination of the books, &c., of the candidates) which will not occur again. But there are five, not eight, of these posts vacant, and they will be filled up in a few days.

THE CHELSEA SAVINGS BANK.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that, although two months have elapsed since the Chelsea Savings Bank was closed, and although large assets were available for immediate distribution, no dividend has yet been declared; and whether any steps can be taken to expedite the action of the Official Liquidator?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member is aware, of course, that the assets in such a case as that of the Chelsea Savings Bank are not available until all the claims have been got in by the Official Liquidator. Reasonable notice has to be given for this purpose, and the date fixed for claims to be sent in with regard to the Chelsea Savings Bank was the 18th of this month. An order was made four days later for payment in full to depositors under £5, including interest up to January 20 last, and of 15s. in the £1 to depositors of over £5, who were also offered facilities by the Liquidator for the transference of their moneys to the Post Office Savings Bank. The money for the actual payment of the dividend ordered will be placed to the credit of the Official Liquidator, and payment will be made after April 8. I trust that the hon. Member will recognise that all possible diligence has been shown in the matter.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Will the Treasury call the attention of the Trustees and Managers of this bank to the recent decision in the case of the Cardiff Savings Bank?

*MR. GOSCHEN: As it is a matter of great interest to all Trustees, I think it is probable that the case has been brought to the attention of these gentlemen in the same way in which the hon. Member's attention has been drawn to it. I do not know whether the Liquidators are aware of the judicial view taken by the Judge.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): May I ask when the Bill on this subject will be introduced?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Judgments in the case referred to, which were only delivered a few days ago, and were of a very complicated character, will have to be considered in connection with the Bill.

CHINESE EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the negotiations with the Government of China on the question of Chinese emigration to Australia have been completed; and, if so, what settlement of the matter has been come to?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No settlement in regard to this question has yet been arrived at. Some of the Colonial Governments, whom it was necessary to consult, have not yet expressed their views. Answers have now been requested of them by telegraph.

MR. W. REDMOND: How long have the negotiations been going on? Early last Session, when I put a question upon the subject, I was told that the negotiations were nearly complete.

Mr. Goschen

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is so; but the hopes which were then entertained were disappointed. I am not able to say when the negotiations will be finally concluded.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is the matter now awaiting the consent of the Australian Colonies?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir; or rather of some of them.

PILOTS.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea Town): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been drawn to the pecuniary disadvantages the pilots of most of the ports of Great Britain and Ireland labour under by their inability to provide funds for the payment of Parliamentary and legal charges incurred in obtaining the necessary Provisional Order to enable them to obtain the unanimous recommendation of the Select Committee on Pilotage (1888), and the benefits of the Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Act of 1889, which granted to the pilots a seat on every Pilotage Board; and whether the Board of Trade has any funds at their disposal which could be used in assisting the pilots to obtain the Provisional Order for direct representation, or whether he will introduce a clause in the Merchant Shipping Bill to facilitate the pilots in obtaining the requisite Provisional Order?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Pilots who apply for Pilotage Provisional Orders are in no worse position than applicants for other Provisional Orders, such as those for Oysters and Mussels, Piers, Tramways, Gas and Water, &c. Applicants in all cases have to pay, towards the expenses of settling the Order, a fee the amount of which has been fixed by the Treasury; but they have no Parliamentary or House fees to pay, as Bills to confirm Provisional Orders are introduced by the Department. Legal charges in defending an application against opposition would, of course, fall on the applicants. There are no funds at my disposal which could be applied to the relief of one particular class of applicants; but if special circumstances should arise which would justify a representation to the Treasury to forego the fee, or a portion of it, I will direct such a representation to be made.

THE MAILS TO THE HEBRIDES.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the steamer Lochiel, which carries the mails between Strome Ferry and Stornoway, is so small that when the weather is rough she is unable to make the trip, and that she has several times during the past winter not made the voyage; whether he is aware that Mr. MacBrayne, the contractor, frequently sends the Lochiel round by Portree, thus delaying her arrival in Stornoway till 1 or 2 in the morning, while the Portree steamer is sent to out-of-the-way places to pick up sheep, cattle, and other traffic; and whether he will take some steps to provide a good and regular mail service between Strome Ferry and Stornoway?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; I am aware that the steamer Lochiel has failed on certain occasions to perform the voyage between Strome Ferry and Stornoway on account of rough weather, when a larger and more powerful vessel might have succeeded. The deviations of route round by Portree, and the consequent deviations of the Portree steamer to which the hon. Member refers, have also, I am informed, been due to stress of weather. I regret that I am not in a position to incur the large additional expense which the employment of a more powerful steamer would involve, having regard to the fact that existing arrangements already entail a very heavy loss to the revenue.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE COLONIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is a fact that the United Kingdom is precluded by some Convention with Foreign States from entering into preferential postal arrangements with the Colonies of the British Empire; and, if so, what is the date of the Foreign Treaty which so limits the power of Her Majesty within Her own dominions; what are the terms of the restrictive clause; and for how much longer will it remain in force?

*MR. RAIKES: I may, perhaps, usefully refer my hon. Friend to a reply which I gave in this House to the hon. Member for Glasgow on the 11th of March last as bearing upon the present question.

In that reply I said there was great reason to doubt if it would be competent to this country to reduce the ocean postal charge to its colonies to 1d. without withdrawing from the Postal Union; but I am not aware of any Convention which generally precludes the United Kingdom from entering into any preferential postal arrangements with the colonies of the British Empire.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Arising out of the answer, may I ask whether it is competent to enter into preferential arrangements without the consent of the parties to the Convention?

*MR. RAIKES: I imagine that certain preferential arrangements would be possible without the consent of the parties to the Convention.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Do the Government contemplate taking any immediate steps to obtain freedom from these embarrassing obligations?

*MR. RAIKES: That is a question which I cannot answer.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I will ask a question on the subject at a later date.

SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Isabella Pickup, who, in February, 1889, at the Manchester City Sessions, was sentenced to five years' penal servitude for stealing a pair of boots; and whether he will make inquiry, with a view to consider the justice of this sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; my attention has not been called to this case otherwise than by the question of the hon. Member. I gather from the calendar that there were numerous previous convictions for drunkenness, abusive behaviour, and felony against the prisoner. If the hon. Member has any facts in his possession which can be urged in the woman's favour I shall be happy to give them full consideration; otherwise I do not see any reason to interfere with the sentence.

THE DEATH OF W. H. GATCLIFFE.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why, in the private examination recently conducted by one of Her Majesty's Inspectors, Captain Wilson, inside Strangeways Gaol, Manchester, relative to the death of W. H. Gatliff, owing to the breaking of six of his ribs and his breast bone, two persons who could have given important evidence were not examined, namely, Dr. Kitchen, who made a post-mortem examination of the prisoner's body, and Henry Mac-Birnie, a prisoner who occupied the next bed to that of the deceased?

MR. MATTHEWS: The persons named had already given evidence on three different occasions before the coroner, the stipendiary, and the Judge, and there was no reason for their further examination by the Inspector, who had their evidence before him, and exercised his discretion in a manner with which I am quite satisfied as to what witnesses could be most usefully examined by him.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Is it not the fact that on the occasion referred to the evidence was confined to an investigation as to whether a certain person was guilty or not; whereas the investigation of Captain Wilson would occupy a much larger field?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think that the post-mortem examination was calculated to throw any light upon the matter.

MAJOR H. B. WOODS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the eminent services of Major H. B. Woods during 22 years as an officer of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, the strong recommendation to mercy which accompanied the finding of the court martial on him last October, the fact that the language, in regard to which he was found guilty, having been due to a brother officer calling him a liar, and the numerous signed Petition in his behalf from the inhabitants of Plymouth where he was quartered, the Lords of the Admiralty could see their way to reconsider their confirmation of the sentence of the court martial, so that the country may not entirely lose the services of this gallant officer?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The statements in the question of the hon. Member give an inadequate and incorrect idea of the gravity of the offences and acts for which Major Woods was tried. The sentence of the Court and all the circumstances connected with this most painful affair have been fully and carefully considered by myself and the naval members of the Board, and it is our unanimous opinion that the sentence should not be interfered with.
Mr. Pickersgill

CAMBRIDGE TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the Trustee Savings Bank at Cambridge is closed for the receipt of deposits; whether it is a fact that the Trustees and Managers have refused to afford through the Post Office Savings Bank Authorities the usual facilities to depositors to transfer their accounts on the spot; whether they have refused to allow the exhibition of the usual Post Office notices on the premises of the bank; whether Messrs. J. Mutlock and Co., bankers, of Cambridge, treasurers of the aforesaid Trustee Savings Bank, are making arrangements for the transfer to their own bank of a large number of the deposit accounts of the said Trustee Bank; and whether the National Debt Commissioners can take any steps to bring to the notice of depositors, who are generally ill-informed as to these matters, the usual facilities and information afforded by the Post Office Savings Bank to depositors, with the view of attracting the deposits of a closed Trustee Savings Bank to the Post Office Savings Bank?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The answer to the first three questions is, yes. As regards the fourth question, I am informed that statements have appeared in the local papers attributing this action to Messrs. Mutlock and Co. The action of the Trustees has been entirely new and unprecedented; but the National Debt Commissioners have no means of communication with the depositors of a savings bank. They have, however, given the Trustees full information as to the steps to be taken for closing the bank, adding that—that is, Trustee Savings Banks. It is a question whether a provision should not be made in the new Bill compelling the Trustees of banks which are closed to inform their depositors of the facilities afforded by the Post Office Savings Banks.

"The Trustees will, no doubt, in the interests of the depositors themselves, induce as many of them as possible to accept transfers to one or other class of savings banks."

MR. HOWELL: To whom do the deposits belong? Do they not belong to the Trustees and not to the Commissioners of the National Debt?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Commissioners can only communicate with the managers and Trustees. They have no direct communication with the depositors. I believe that the Trustees are as anxious to increase the legitimate business of these banks as the hon. Member himself.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): Will the right hon. Gentleman make a formal request to the Trustees to put up the usual announcement in the building?

*MR. GOSCHEN: That has already been done by the direction of the Commissioners.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether three Lower Division vacancies in the Accountant General's Department of the Admiralty have recently been filled up by persons who have passed no examination, except in the case of one who was for some time a boy copyist; whether about a dozen Civil Service writers in this Department were recommended for promotion under the Treasury Minute of 21st December, 1886, to the Lower Division, and that of this number three only have been so promoted; and whether, in the event of the appointments to the above-named vacancies in the Accountant General's Department being only of a temporary character, it is intended that steps should at once be taken to fill up the vacancies from the writers in the Department so recommended, and who have for several years discharged the work?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood, Lancashire, S. W. Ormskirk): The Civil Service Commissioners having exhausted their list of qualified candidates for Second Division clerks, three vacancies in the Accountant General's Department of the Admiralty had to be temporarily filled by copyists. It is not intended to promote any of the present copyists to the Second Division clerkships now vacant.

THE EASTERN SOUDAN.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government can now see their way to advise the Egyptian Government to expend a considerably larger sum than £500 on the relief of the inhabitants of the Eastern Soudan now perishing of famine, having regard to the terrible sufferings reported from that district, and to the desirability of establishing influences and connections which may make for the re-establishment of peace in the Soudan, and prevent the recurrence of like calamities?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Egyptian Government, besides placing £500 at the disposal of the Governor of Suakin for the relief of the distress, has directed him to provide work for the able-bodied men. It is obviously undesirable to give gratuitous relief except to those who are physically unable to work. In answer to inquiries how a London Committee could best assist, Sir E. Baring has advised that £500 should be sent to the Local Committee, and it is hoped that the arrangements made by the Governor, with the aid of private charity, may prove sufficient to relieve the starving people without any serious demand on the taxpayers of Egypt. Her Majesty's Government are unwilling by any tender of their advice to the Egyptian Government to allow the impression to exist that that Government is insensible to the dictates of humanity.

SHIPPING GOODS TO THE UNITED STATES.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware of the great trouble, inconvenience, and loss caused to partners in firms shipping goods to the United States of America, through their being compelled personally to attend the American Consulate to make declarations on all consignments of the value of £10 and upwards; and whether it is not possible to come to an arrangement with the United States Government whereby this inconvenience may be avoided?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Minister has addressed the United States Government with reference to the memorials received on this subject from Chambers of Commerce, and has asked for modifications of the regulations in the sense desired. He has been informed that the regulations are undergoing revision, but has not been able as yet to ascertain whether the grievance complained of has been remedied.

RATING AND VALUATION (SCOTLAND).

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Government propose during this Session to re-appoint the Select Committee on Rating and Valuation (Scotland) which in 1888 took evidence but made no Report?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Buteshire): It was on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson) that this Committee was appointed in 1888. If a Motion is made for the re-appointment of the Committee, the Government will not oppose it.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Then I beg to give notice that directly after the Easter Recess I will move for the re-appointment of the Committee.

ASCENSION ISLAND.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state what is the value of the victualling stores supplied from Ascension to the vessels of the West African Squadron during the last two years, or either of them?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The value of the victualling stores supplied from Ascension to the ships on the West Coast of Africa station amounted during the two years ended September 30, 1889, to about £10,500, or an annual average sum of £5,250. This is exclusive of the value of the stores issued to the residents on the island, amounting to about £3,000 per annum.

THE OATHS ACT.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Solicitor General whether he is aware that at Lynn County Court, on March 19th, Robert Green claimed to affirm under "The Oaths Act, 1888;" whether the County Court Judge is correctly reported as having asked: "Are you a Quaker?" and on being answered in the negative, refused to allow Green to explain how he was entitled to affirm under "The Oaths Act, 1888," saying, "You must go to argue that somewhere else;" and whether any steps can be taken to bring "The Oaths Act, 1888," to the official knowledge of the Judge?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): In reply to the hon. Member, the Attorney General is informed that the statement in the question does not fully represent what passed. The learned Judge states that he understood the defendant was claiming a right to make a speech and not asking to be allowed to affirm, and on his telling him he must be sworn, or if he had conscientious objections to taking the oath he might affirm, the defendant at once consented to be sworn and gave evidence. The learned Judge seems to be acquainted with the provisions of "The Oaths Act, 1888."

NAVAL AND MILITARY COUNCIL OF DEFENCE.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government, when considering the suggestion of the Royal Commission respecting the formation of a Naval and Military Council of Defence, will further take into consideration the opportunity afforded by the establishment of any such Council for providing in some form for the representation upon it of outlying portions of the Empire contributing to the maintenance of the regular Naval and Military Forces of the Crown?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The subject to which my hon. and gallant Friend refers will undoubtedly receive the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, but he will, I am sure, realise that it is surrounded with very great and serious difficulties.

POSTAL ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that large numbers of cheques are drawn for one guinea or two guineas in payment of subscriptions to charitable and other institutions, and greatly to the inconvenience of the bankers; whether he will supply the public with postal orders for one guinea and two guineas respectively; and whether he will extend the time so as to make postal orders payable within 12 months of issue, without fine or increased charge?

*MR. RAIKES: I have no information as to the number of cheques drawn for sums of a guinea or two guineas respectively, though I have no doubt that they are numerous, but I know that the idea of introducing a postal order for a guinea had to be abandoned owing to the opposition of bankers. As regards the last part of the question, the hon. Member does not seem to be aware that the limit of time during which postal orders are payable without fine was reduced in deference to the wishes of this House from 12 months to three, when the Act of Parliament was under the consideration of the House.

RAILWAY MESSAGES BY TELEGRAPH.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the evidence of the late Mr. C. H. B. Patey, C.B., Third Secretary of the Post Office, given before the Select Committee on the Revenue Estimates, that, under the terms of the Telegraph Act, the Post Office had, as part of the bargain for its way leave, to transmit messages sent on the business of railway companies free of cost; that in 1871 there were transmitted 97,000 such messages, and in the year 1888 961,000 messages; that these railway messages would represent something like 1s. a message at the least, the loss of revenue on them being nearly £50,000 a year; and that the railway companies had found it more convenient to do their business by means of the Telegraph Office for nothing than to do it in other ways; and whether he will at once take steps to introduce a Bill into Parliament to put an end to this arrangement?

*MR. RAIKES: I am well acquainted with the evidence in question which, the hon. Member may recollect, was given in my hearing. He may also recollect that he was present in this House on the 28th March last year, when attention was called to the evidence by the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for Bradford, and the hon. Members for Bethnal Green and South West Notts; and I would refer him to the remarks which I made on that occasion. I may add, for the information of the House, that legal action on the right of the railway companies to send certain classes of messages is now pending, and, until the result is known, I shall not be in a position to consider the question of the further relation of the Post Office to the companies in this matter.

INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Commission on Industrial Education, made to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, 1889, of which 10,000 copies were ordered to be printed; and whether he will consider the propriety of directing the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, to issue, as a handbook for the use of such technical schools as may require it, a series of plates of the nature of those engraved in the Annual Report of the Pennsylvania State College, which are stated at page 304 of the Report of the Commission above referred to, to be "the best available illustration of a progressive series of exercises for a course of the mechanic arts?"

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HAET DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I have seen the Report to which my hon. Friend refers, but valuable and instructive as the plates are, it is not proposed to issue a handbook because it has not been found expedient for a Government Department in this country to publish text-books. No doubt, as manual instruction is henceforth to be included in the curriculum, many books on the subject will be produced by private enterprise and may to a large extent be based on the Report in question.

IRELAND—CASE OF MR. McDERMOTT.

MR. THOMAS GILL (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what have been the costs incurred by the Crown in the various remands of Mr. McDermott, of Clanricarde, including the cost of transporting and escorting him on each occasion from the gaol to the locality in which the secret Court before which he has been summoned has been held?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already answered this question in reply to a query of the hon. Member for Cork.

MR. GILL: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. McDermott has already been for 10 weeks in gaol, and is he not of opinion that the time has now arrived to grant his release?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am aware that Mr. McDermott is in prison because he has refused to answer the questions which have been put to him.

MR. GILL: Has he refused to answer any question that may be put to him in open Court, and has he not been brought 10 times from Galway Gaol to Ballenasloe, a distance of 40 miles?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I only know that he is detained in custody because he refuses to give evidence in regard to the commission of an outrage.

MR. GILL: Has he not offered again and again to give evidence in open Court?

[No answer.]

THE EDUCATION CODE.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I beg to give notice that on Monday, April 14, I will move for leave to bring in a Bill for the purpose of making operative certain articles in the new Education Code with reference to instruction in evening schools and the proposed new Grant to small schools in rural districts.

MR. MUNDELLA: Will the Bill be confined to those official subjects?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes; to those special subjects.

PUBLIC TRUSTEES AND TRUST COMPANIES' BILL.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question, of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether the Government will consent to the Public Trustee Bill and the Trust Companies' Bill, which have now come down to this House, being referred to a Select Committee to inquire and report upon their provisions?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, we should certainly propose that those two Bills should be referred to a Committee, but I am not quite certain whether it should be a Select Committee specially appointed for the purpose or whether it should be one of the Standing Committees.

Mr. Thomas Gill

CRETE AND TURKISH WAR VESSELS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I also desire to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question, of which I have given private notice, namely, whether there is any foundation for the statement in the Times of this day telegraphed from Athens that several Turkish war vessels cruising around Crete have endeavoured to disguise their character by flying the British flag; and whether, if the statement is found to be true, the Government will take prompt notice of such unwarrantable conduct?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have heard that there was a rumour at Athens that one or more Turkish men-of-war had been seen in the direction named, under Italian colours. No mention was then made of such use of British colours, nor have the Admiralty heard anything concerning these allegations.

MR. BRYCE: May I ask whether, considering the positive way in which the statement is made in the Times, the right hon. Gentleman will take steps to inquire whether the statement is true?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Foreign Office are hardly bound to make inquiry on every statement that appears in the newspapers. I would remind the hon. Gentleman that this country has ships in those waters, and that if any improper use is made of the British flag it is quite certain to be reported to the Admiralty.

THE CONVICT DALY.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask if the Home Secretary has any statement to make in reference to the prisoner Daly?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have made it clear on former occasions that the visitors have written in answer to an application made to them stating that they expect their Report to be ready in the course of the Easter Recess.

EPIDEMICS IN IRELAND.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I wish to ask whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland is aware of the fact that influenza or some other epidemic has seriously interfered with the attendance of school children in Ireland; and whether he will give any instructions on the subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will communicate with the authorities on the subject.

CHARITY COMMISSION SCHEMES.

SIR R. PAGET: I wish to ask the hon. Member for Penrith whether the Charity Commissioners will be prepared to send to the clerks of County Councils a copy of every draft scheme to be published by the direction of the Commissioners, for the regulation of a charity administered for the benefit of any parish or place within the jurisdiction of the County Councils respectively?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Charity Commissioners will comply with the request of any County Council which passes a resolution requesting to be supplied with a copy of every draft scheme for a charity in that county published after the date of such resolution.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I wish to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether the attention of the Government has been called to the cablegram received by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland with reference to the Newfoundland Fishery Question, in which it is alleged that the Government of Newfoundland deny having consented to the modus vivendi between Her Majesty's Government and France, alleging that it had been only partially submitted to Newfoundland? Is it true that the Government of Newfoundland did not consent to the modus vivendi at present existing, and is it true that the despatches were only partially submitted to Newfoundland?

*(441.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: With regard to the questions now put by the hon. Member, I answered similar questions last week. I may state that the modus vivendi was submitted with a view to meeting, as far as possible, the views of the Government of Newfoundland. In its original form it was not consented to by the Government of Newfoundland, but a full explanation of the whole case has been sent to the Government of Newfoundland, and the objection which has been expressed to it is, I think, founded on a misapprehension. I think it would be much better to wait until the Government of Newfoundland is in full possession of the facts of the case.

MR. W. REDMOND: Considering the extremely excited condition of public opinion in Newfoundland over this matter, do not Her Majesty's Government consider it vital to cable out the full text of the arrangement come to with France; and do the Government intend to invite representatives of Newfoundland to this country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have expressed their desire that representatives from Newfoundland should come over to this country for the purpose of consultation, but I am not authorised to make any further communication.

MR. W. REDMOND: In consequence of the reply I have received I beg to give notice that I shall call attention to this subject on the Vote for the Foreign Office.

THE NEW EDUCATION CODE.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman when his Bill will be introduced?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Monday, 14th April.

MR. MUNDELLA: Will it be confined to the subjects which have been mentioned?

SIR W. HART DYKE: It will; that was my object in making the statement.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Fifth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) (NAMES OF LANDOWNERS).

Return ordered—

"Giving the names of the landowners the purchase of whose properties under 'The Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1885,' has been sanctioned by the Irish Land Commission since the 1st day of January, 1889, with the following particulars against each name:—(a) area of the property; (b) county in which situated; (c) total rental; (d) valuation; (e) amount of purchase money; (f) total number of holdings on the estate (in continuation of Return, No. 31, of Session 1889.)"—(Mr. J. Morley.)

feeling for the clerical branch of the Customs. As regards hours of work, those of the clerical branch are much the same, I understand, as those of the other clerical Departments of the State, but the hours of duty of the practical outdoor staff are longer—so far as my information goes—than those of any other Department of the Civil Service. I find that officers at the larger ports are often on duty and, perhaps, without rest, for alternative, continuous, periods of 24 hours, and that Sundays and Bank Holidays are included. I find that the Chairman of the Customs, commenting on that statement before the Ridley Commission, observes that—

“When on duty for 24 hours, the officers are allowed time for meals and for such rest and sleep as the Service will permit.”

Well, I think that is a very mild qualification, and one that supports my argument for inquiry. I find that the information was laid before the Civil Service Commission by Mr. Hinks, the head of the Water-guard, that in each 21 days a man is in attendance 224 hours, or 10½ hours in every 24, and is on duty, at most, every other Sunday. That was also a qualifying remark on the broad statement of long hours that was laid before the Ridley Commission by the outdoor Department. I think it will be seen by every one who peruses the Report of that Commission, or reads the Appendix, that it is officially acknowledged that the hours are longer than in the clerical Departments of the Services. Then the outdoor staff have less chances of promotion than the indoor. They receive, on an average, less pay, and they are longer on duty, and yet they do all the practical work of the Customs Department. The origin of this state of things, so far as I am able to ascertain, began in 1882. In that year there was a great re-organisation of the Customs Department, and, as far as I can make out, it resulted in the rapid promotion and increased payments of the clerical heads of the Customs, and an increase of work and reduced chances of promotion to the outdoor practical staff. Previous to June, 1882, the clerical work of the warehousing branch of the Port of London was performed by an indoor special clerical staff of 269 officials with average salaries of £250 a year; but in

Sir John Colomb

1882 the work was transferred as an additional duty to the outdoor services, performed by the practical officers, whose average salaries at that time were about £128 a year. In order to compensate the outdoor staff for the unpleasant effect of this amalgamation a new classification of the staff was not only promised, but actually approved of by the Treasury. In effect, that classification was to provide superior appointments and improvements in the status of the officials in the higher Department of the outdoor branch of the Customs. But the promise has not been kept. The classification was altered, and the benefits promised by it were withheld. In the revised classification the number of higher posts was cut down and a new lower and cheaper grade of outdoor officers—called “assistants”—was added at the bottom of the classification. The increase at the bottom was to compensate for the cutting off at the top of those good appointments and better prospects afforded by the original classification. I find that since 1882 the general Customs staff has been materially reduced, and I find also that there are now only 112 persons employed overlooking and superintending the outdoor Customs work for the whole of the ports of the United Kingdom. Since 1883 the practical staff of the Port of London has been reduced by something like 22 surveyors and 8 first-class examining officers; and I find on comparing the Board of Trade Shipping Returns of 1882 and 1888 that while, on the one hand, the clerical Department has been cutting down the superintendents and practical officers of the Port of London, the aggregate number of tons of shipping entering the port has been 1,500,000 tons greater in 1888 than in 1882. Now, the result of all this, however satisfactory it may have been to the clerical Department, has been that the work of the practical Department has been increased, whilst the promotion has been retarded. I find that, taking the last decade and dividing it into two portions of five years each, in the five years ending 1888 there were 43 less promotions from second-class examining officers to first-class examining officers than there were in 1883; and I find that in the five years ending 1883 the promotions of inferior grade will go to the root of the matter. The Customs Department performs two great functions. First, the overhauling and minute examination of all ships, of all cargoes, of all passengers, and of all the effects of passengers coming into the Kingdom, and various other complex duties connected with bonded warehouses, the export trade, transshipments, and the gauging duties. This work is done by the practical or out-door staff of the Customs. The second function is the recording of the results of such overhauling and minute personal examination by the practical staff. This recording is done by the clerical or indoor staff. Now, the central superintending establishment over this duplex Organisation consists of a Board of three Commissioners, a Secretary's Office, a Surveyor General's Office, an Accountant General and Controller's Office, a Statistical Branch, and a Bill of Entry Branch. The superintending establishment is composed of 207 officials in the proportion of about 3 of the practical staff to 204 of the clerical. Two out of the three Commissioners were Treasury clerks; the third was a War Office clerk, while the Secretary was also a Treasury clerk. Thus, the general administration is almost exclusively in the hands of gentlemen without previous practical experience of Customs work. The rest of the Customs Department is organised in establishments at the various ports, such as London, Liverpool, and elsewhere, and each of these Departments at each port is divided into indoor and outdoor branches—or, as I prefer to call them, the clerical and practical staffs. The duties of the clerical staff of a port establishment do not materially differ from clerical work in other Departments of the State. But the duties of the practical staff at the port are heavy, complicated, peculiar, and various. The practical or outdoor staff are on duty by night as well as by day; they are exposed to all the vicissitudes of the weather. Rain or shine, fog or storm, in rough or smooth water, their work must be done. Upon the activity, vigilance, and accuracy of these officers, the Customs Revenue depends. Upon their tact, temper, and judgment also depends the smooth working of the gigantic foreign trade of the country. In 1888, the aggregate tonnage of ships dealt with was 68½ millions of tons. The value of the imports and exports dealt with by the practical staff in that year amounted to £685,500,000. The net duty from weighing and gauging all dutiable goods and assessing Customs Revenue amounted to £21,000,000. Then they have the keeping of the accounts of goods in 308 bonded warehouses. They have charge of Quarantine Duties, the examination of passengers' baggage, of ships' stores, of dangerous oils and explosives, and of cattle; and they have to see that there is no evasion of the law with respect to indecent publications and to British trade marks. They have to verify statistics with regard to imports, and to enforce the law respecting copyright. They have also their duties connected with the bonded warehouse, including the examination and certification of the shipments of all bonded and draw-back goods, and the authorisation of all the deliveries from bonded warehouses. Taking the number of the examining staff, every examining officer overhauls annually, on the average, over 40,000 tons of shipping in the year, supervises over £400,000 of imports and exports, and assesses over £12,000 of Revenue. That justifies the statement that the duties of the practical staff are complex and various. In order to bring the ground for inquiry into as small a focus as possible, I will now confine myself to illustrating my point by taking the establishment of the Port of London as exhibiting the general conditions which I think should be inquired into. The establishment of the Port of London consists of a clerical staff of 92, and of an outdoor staff of 1,278; and I find that the average salary of the clerical staff is £293, whilst the average salary of the outdoor staff is only £140. Now, this exemplifies sufficiently one of the points which, I think, demands careful examination, namely, that the average salary of the practical or outdoor staff is less than half the salary of the clerical or indoor staff. This great discrepancy in the salary averages is a matter which, I think, in view of what I have brought before the House, demands serious and careful investigation. I can only account for it by remembering that the Treasury itself is a thoroughly clerical Department, and naturally has a fellow-feeling for the clerical branch of the Customs. As regards hours of work, those of the clerical branch are much the same, I understand, as those of the other clerical Departments of the State, but the hours of duty of the practical outdoor staff are longer—so far as my information goes—than those of any other Department of the Civil Service. I find that officers at the larger ports are often on duty and, perhaps, without rest, for alternative, continuous, periods of 24 hours, and that Sundays and Bank Holidays are included. I find that the Chairman of the Customs, commenting on that statement before the Ridley Commission, observes that—

“When on duty for 24 hours, the officers are allowed time for meals and for such rest and sleep as the Service will permit.”

Well, I think that is a very mild qualification, and one that supports my argument for inquiry. I find that the information was laid before the Civil Service Commission by Mr. Hinks, the head of the Water-guard, that in each 21 days a man is in attendance 224 hours, or 10½ hours in every 24, and is on duty, at most, every other Sunday. That was also a qualifying remark on the broad statement of long hours that was laid before the Ridley Commission by the outdoor Department. I think it will be seen by every one who peruses the Report of that Commission, or reads the Appendix, that it is officially acknowledged that the hours are longer than in the clerical Departments of the Services. Then the outdoor staff have less chances of promotion than the indoor. They receive, on an average, less pay, and they are longer on duty, and yet they do all the practical work of the Customs Department. The origin of this state of things, so far as I am able to ascertain, began in 1882. In that year there was a great re-organisation of the Customs Department, and, as far as I can make out, it resulted in the rapid promotion and increased payments of the clerical heads of the Customs, and an increase of work and reduced chances of promotion to the outdoor practical staff. Previous to June, 1882, the clerical work of the warehousing branch of the Port of London was performed by an indoor special clerical staff of 269 officials with average salaries of £250 a year; but in

Sir John Colomb

1882 the work was transferred as an additional duty to the outdoor services, performed by the practical officers, whose average salaries at that time were about £128 a year. In order to compensate the outdoor staff for the unpleasant effect of this amalgamation a new classification of the staff was not only promised, but actually approved of by the Treasury. In effect, that classification was to provide superior appointments and improvements in the status of the officials in the higher Department of the outdoor branch of the Customs. But the promise has not been kept. The classification was altered, and the benefits promised by it were withheld. In the revised classification the number of higher posts was cut down and a new lower and cheaper grade of outdoor officers—called “assistants”—was added at the bottom of the classification. The increase at the bottom was to compensate for the cutting off at the top of those good appointments and better prospects afforded by the original classification. I find that since 1882 the general Customs staff has been materially reduced, and I find also that there are now only 112 persons employed overlooking and superintending the outdoor Customs work for the whole of the ports of the United Kingdom. Since 1883 the practical staff of the Port of London has been reduced by something like 22 surveyors and 8 first-class examining officers; and I find on comparing the Board of Trade Shipping Returns of 1882 and 1888 that while, on the one hand, the clerical Department has been cutting down the superintendents and practical officers of the Port of London, the aggregate number of tons of shipping entering the port has been 1,500,000 tons greater in 1888 than in 1882. Now, the result of all this, however satisfactory it may have been to the clerical Department, has been that the work of the practical Department has been increased, whilst the promotion has been retarded. I find that, taking the last decade and dividing it into two portions of five years each, in the five years ending 1888 there were 43 less promotions from second-class examining officers to first-class examining officers than there were in 1883; and I find that in the five years ending 1883 the promotions of inferior grades to assistant examining officers and examining officers and gaugers were 425, but in the five years ending 1888 the number of promotions had fallen to 311, so that the decrease of promotions for these two periods, and for that particular step of advancement, has been 114. I find that in 1888 there were only six promotions to first-class, while the average of such promotions in previous years was 28. So that, with increased duties, there has been a decrease of prospects of promotion in the Outdoor Department. In order, as it appears to me, to get the practical work done with less hands, and to avoid increasing the cost, the Department has had to resort to the plan of having temporary makeshift appointments—acting men and acting assistants who belong to the lower grade, and whilst doing the work of the higher grade, receive the pay of the lower. This is naturally a grievance to the lower grade officers, and my point is that on broad grounds of public policy it is a bad system that responsibilities assigned to a particular class of individuals should, because you have an insufficient number of such men, be imposed on men of an inferior grade. Thus inferior officers of the practical staff are employed on superior duty without extra remuneration, although the work has been increasing, a thing which, in itself, it seems to me, deserves very searching inquiry. There is a matter in connection with this subject to which I think I am justified in drawing the attention of the House. I am not going to labour the point, and I am not going to say that the statistics I give are such as justify a strong pronouncement of opinion; but they are curious and interesting, because it does appear to me that as it is the practical staff that stands between this country and evasion by dutiable goods, and on their efficiency and their work depends the revenue of the country, there should be a very minute inquiry to ascertain whether all the changes which have occurred since 1882 to the detriment of the practical staff have not led to a decline, to some extent, of that revenue. During the past eight years, whilst these changes which have tended to diminish the number of the practical staff were occurring, there has been a great advance in our national business. The tonnage of the ships entering and clearing the ports of the United Kingdom in 1888 was 7,000,000 tons greater than 1882. That means a largely increased number of ships, and means a great increase of personal exertion in overhauling 7,000,000 tons of additional shipping. Then, if you take the Export and Import Returns of 1882, and compare them with those of 1889, you will find that goods of the value of £21,000,000 more in the last-named year than the former had to pass under the supervision and constant examination of the practical outdoor staff. The increase in the supervision of passengers and their baggage it is impossible to state, for the reason that whilst there is a record kept of immigration and emigration from and to places outside Europe, there is none in regard to European immigrations and emigrations. In the record that exists, I find that the emigration and immigration figures in 1882 were 78,000 passengers, whereas in 1888 they were 129,000, or an increase of 64 per cent. It is fair to assume that in the unrecorded emigration and immigration the increase has been as great. Therefore, it will be seen that there has been an increase in the amount of work the outdoor Custom House officers have had to perform. But in addition to that, this House has imposed and placed fresh duties on the practical staff since 1882. The enforcement of the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887 is one of these fresh duties. The new work created by the excellent Wine Duties Act of 1888 is another. Then there is the Registry of Fishing Boats Act of 1886, with respect to which new duties are imposed and increased labour is also thrown on them by the new system of gauging casks to the quart instead of to the integral gallon. There is also the testing of spirits for "obscuration." It is a curious fact that, in spite of all the increase of trade and business, the revenue from Customs Duty stagnates in a way not to be satisfactorily accounted for by the alterations made in the amounts of the duties. The Customs Returns, oddly enough, show that the revenue collected has, since 1882 fallen as the number of officers of the outdoor department has diminished. I do not base any strong argument upon the fact; I merely notice the coincidence. I have not been able to work out the variations due to alterations in duty, and there are various nice considerations to be taken into account before it would be safe to lay down the doctrine that the revenue has fallen, because the number of officers has been reduced, and the number of duties imposed upon the Department has increased. There is another odd fact. As the number of officers of Customs has been reduced, the number of seizures of smuggled goods has increased. It is interesting in this respect to compare the figures of 1882 with those of 1889. In 1882 the number of established Customs officers was 5,223. In 1889 it had fallen to 4,595—a decrease of 628. The revenue collected in 1882 was £22,175,937, whilst that collected in 1889 was only £21,888,603—a decrease of over a quarter of a million. The seizures of smuggled goods in 1882 numbered 1,698, and in 1889 they had risen to 4,354—an increase of 2,656. The convictions for smuggling in 1882 numbered 1,516, and in 1889 3,294—an increase of 1,778 cases. The number of seizures of tobacco and spirits had in seven years increased by 113 per cent. When it is remembered that goods seized are liable to treble duty, it is evident that in order to make smuggling profitable there must be at least some three successful evasions of duty to compensate for each failure. Therefore, we may approximately compute the number of cases of smuggling last year at some 10,000 cases, over 8,000 of which were not detected. The revenue from unmanufactured tobacco, which is most likely to be affected by an increase in smuggling, is tolerably stationary, in spite of the increase of population in the last decade. The consumption of tobacco per head of the population given in the Statistical Abstract is, of course, based only upon the consumption of tobacco which has paid duty. I find that in 1868 it amounted to 1.35 lbs., whilst in 1878 it was 1.44 lbs., showing an increase of 9.100ths of a lb. of tobacco per head. But this ratio of increase has not been kept up, for in the 10 years between 1878 and 1888 the increase was only 1.100ths per head. It is certainly difficult to reconcile these figures with one's own observation as to the practice of smoking except by assuming that large quantities of tobacco reach the country without having paid duty.

Sir John Colomb

As a proof that smoking has increased I may mention the fact of the new institution of smoking concerts constantly given by almost all the political clubs in the Kingdom. I find also that the number of occasional dealers licensed in 1889 was nearly fourfold that in 1879. These facts seem to me to show that the consumption of tobacco is increasing, and is not practically standing still, as would appear from the Statistical Abstract. In conclusion, I would mention that the whole case of the complaints of the outdoor staff was laid before the Ridley Commission and was commented on by the Clerical Head and the Secretary of the Customs Service. The Commissioners reported that they "did not feel themselves in a position to report in detail," and for so declining to report they gave as a reason that "It would require much more accurate and technical knowledge than could possibly be at our command, before we could give opinions adverse to those entertained by responsible heads of offices, who are so thoroughly acquainted with the character of the work," &c.

And so the Commission left the question to the Treasury. I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to devise some machinery for an inquiry being conducted "with more accurate and technical knowledge" than the Commissioners possessed, and by which a thorough and impartial investigation may be made into the whole question. The House is aware that neither the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) nor the present Financial Secretary (Mr. Jackson) is responsible for the pulling to pieces of the Customs machinery in 1882. I fully recognise the difficulty of putting right a huge and complex administrative machine after it was pulled to pieces by 'prentice hands eight years ago, and after it has been tinkered with ever since. I recognise also that the cry for economy in this House involves cheese-paring in the lower grades of Departments. I am fully alive to the fact that there are inherent evils and dangers to the administration of the Services by the modern system of multitudinous Commissions and Inquiries, which are often at cross purposes with each other. I apprehend that the ever-increasing demands on the time and attention of Ministers by the continually accumulating power of Parliamentary talk, is really shifting the practical duties of administration from their hands to those of permanent clerical officials, who in theory are their subordinates. It appears to me that as the time and attention of Ministers is more and more absorbed by this House than by the Departments over which they preside, so must the permanent clerical officials transfer to themselves more and more of the administrative functions of Ministers. For the grave evils I have ventured to bring before the House I blame not men but the modern system, and I bring forward my Motion on the ground of its importance, and because I am persuaded of its public necessity.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"In the interests of the Revenue and the commercial and shipping transactions of the United Kingdom, it is expedient that special inquiry should be made into the organisation of the Customs Department, particularly as regards the position, the hours, and the overtime of the outdoor officers, upon which subjects the Royal Commissioners on Civil Establishments were unable to report, and therefore remitted to the Treasury to deal with,"—(Sir John Colamb.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(5.35.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): In rising to second the Amendment moved by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I wish to say I am placed in an exceedingly difficult position by the concluding words of his speech. If I fancied anything I was likely to say in support of the Amendment tended in any way against the policy of economy which I understand both Front Benches practically concur in, I should be extremely loth to occupy the time of the House. But there is economy and economy, and if the case presented with so much detail by the hon. and gallant Member has anything in it, as I think it has, a ground for inquiry has been made out. It is true that many evils necessarily result from raising discussions in this House upon the administration of the various Departments; but I think that is an evil inherent in our system of Parliamentary Government, and it is no use deploring it at the present moment. Ministers are under the control of Parliament, to some extent at any rate, and evils in the Departments should be brought before the House in order that Parliament may understand what it is giving Ministers money for. Prima facie I would suggest that, if there were no such grounds presented as have been presented in support of this proposal, the fact that general inquiries have been deemed necessary by Royal Commissions in the other Departments would involve the possibility that such an inquiry might be necessary here. If it be true that, coupled with the reduction of the Customs staff, from various parts of the coasts and creeks smuggling has increased, some inquiry is necessary. I see the Chancellor of the Exchequer contradicts that, and I am sure his means of information are more complete than can possibly be those at my disposal; but then we have before us the fact that there has been no increase of revenue proportionate to the increase of population. I see the Secretary to the Treasury says I am wrong in that. I know there is nothing more deceptive than a mass of figures; but I am bound to say it seems to me to be the case at the moment that there has not been the increase of revenue from tobacco and spirits which one would expect in view of the increase of population. Of course, if this was due to the greater sobriety of the people—and I believe the masses of the working-classes are growing more sober year by year—it would be a matter of congratulation. But the statement made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman seems to show that there has been an increase of smuggling all round, and the increase in seizures and convictions seems to show that a business of no inconsiderable extent is carried on. Certainly I think some inquiry should be made into the hon. and gallant Gentleman's allegations. Since the Playfair inquiry, in 1875, the conditions under which these Civil servants work have not been inquired into. This evening, in reply to a question I put to him, the Secretary to the Treasury said some of these men are kept at their work continuously for a period of 24 hours.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No, I did not say that. There is a confusion of terms. I said they were in attendance for duty.

MR. BRADLAUGH: But they are liable to be called upon at any time during the 24 hours. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman in his happy life ever had the disadvantage of being liable to be called upon in this way. Having been part of my life subject to a command of "guards, turn out," I am bound to say that a man who is liable to be called upon at any time in 24 hours, even if he has convenience for rest, is certainly not in a very enviable position. When we are told that in the case of the Harpy cutter no bedding is provided for the men who are on duty, it is quite clear that the authorities think that the men are likely to be called upon so often that the beds would not be much used if they were provided. I do not want to stand between the Government and the Votes they wish to take, and therefore I simply suggest that a prima facie case has been made out by the Mover of the Amendment for some inquiry. The hon. and gallant Gentleman does not ask for a Royal Commission or for an inquiry by the House—forms of inquiry which I expect would not be well received by any one connected with the Department. But surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer might himself undertake some inquiry, or undertake that special attention should be paid to this matter, so that Parliament should see there was no real grievance which was left unredressed. I understand by his manner that the Chancellor of the Exchequer assents to the view I am expressing. If that is so, I am loth to occupy the time of the House longer.

(5.43.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): It appears to me that there is one very simple and quite conclusive ground for the Amendment which almost precludes, and certainly does not require, any lengthened discussion. There seems to be no dispute about the fact that there has been an inquiry into the organisation of the Civil Service establishments, and that those who were charged with that inquiry have not been able, from want of time, to undertake an examination into the organisation of the Customs Department. It is, therefore, in point of fact a question of what has been recognised as a public duty, combined with the evidence before us that a portion of that public duty remains unfulfilled. I therefore think the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member is obviously reasonable in the purpose which it contemplates, and I gathered from different indications that the Government are not indisposed to accede to that opinion. It appears to me also that the hon. and gallant Member has exercised a sound discretion in avoiding any endeavour by the terms of his Amendment to limit the action of the Government as to the nature—the precise machinery—of the inquiry they are to make, and I would suggest, if it should appear that there is a general concurrence with regard to the purpose in view, that the hon. and gallant Member should show a further discretion by withdrawing his Amendment on the clear understanding that the Government are to discover for themselves and to state to the House what they deem to be the best machinery of inquiry. I think the hon. and gallant Member will feel—as I myself certainly feel, and strongly feel—that there ought never to be any interference by the House, through any vote or Motion, in a question of the administration of a Public Department, except where a necessity for such interference has arisen. No necessity for such interference can be said to have arisen when the object contemplated by the Amendment is one which Her Majesty's Government admit to be reasonable, and with respect to which they are prepared to provide adequate means for carrying it into effect. Upon that supposition I recommend the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment not to ask the House to come to a vote on the Amendment. I am bound to say I have another reason for wishing that the House should not come to a vote upon the Amendment, and that is that while I commend what seems to me the sound judgment of the Mover of the Amendment in respect to the discretion he allows to the Government, and in respect to the substantial justice of his object, I certainly should not like to be pledged to the general colour and tendency of the speech of the hon. and gallant Member. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has said that nothing would induce him to second the Amendment if he thought there was anything in it which would be adverse to public economy. Then the hon. Member said "but there is economy and economy." Will he forgive me for saying that that is a remark which I have often heard used in this House? No doubt the hon. Member used it with a good object. The fact is, every one who recommends anything extravagant in this House invariably takes care to have it well understood he does so in the interest of economy. There is good economy and bad economy, such an hon. Member will say, and he is in favour of good economy as opposed to bad economy, and on that account he recommends certain expenditure, having it in his mind to save the money in some other way not yet developed or explained. Such declarations ought to be received with some caution, and I am quite clear that if we go into this inquiry it ought to be undertaken without prejudice and without any general supposition that what is to be arrived at is a foregone conclusion. A considerable point of the Mover's speech was to show that whereas there has been an increase of duty in the Port of London between 1878 and 1888, the increased duty is performed by a diminished number of official persons. I should have thought that prima facie that statement ought to fill the mind of the hon. Member with a lively satisfaction. On the contrary, it is treated by the hon. Member as being a most grave circumstance, requiring a minute and jealous inquiry. Indeed, that part of his speech actually tended to the conclusion that if it could be shown that there was a diminished amount of duty done by an increased number of officials, that circumstance would have filled the hon. Member's mind with satisfaction and joy. I have not the smallest doubt that in the case of the constituents of the hon. Member, as in other cases, a very large amount of public duty is performed by a body of trustworthy servants at moderate remuneration. I do not question that, but I must observe that the case of the Customs Department is peculiar from one very important point of view. There is no other department of the State the duties of which have undergone so extraordinary a revolution in our time—I mean in the sense of simplification and facilities. It is nearly 50 years since, as Vice President of the Board of Trade, I became minutely acquainted with the working of the Customs Department, and it is marvellous to compare its duties at that time with what they are now. A very large proportion of the duties of the Board of Trade at that time consisted in investigating the cases of difficulty which arose, and arose from day to day, under the Customs law, and required incessantly to be made the subject of appeal from the Customs Authorities to the Board of Treasury, which used the Board of Trade as its adviser. What has become of those appeals? The whole subject matter of them has been swept away. The change in our commercial system which has reduced the 1,200 articles of our tariff to something like 12, and which has established as the rule of trade in this country a system of free goods and free entry instead of universal duty, striking every commodity as it approached our shores, and entailing a system of examination, checks and counter-checks, such as are now totally unknown, has happily relieved the department of nineteen-twentieths of its former difficulties. I must say I believe also that the Department has been extremely well administered under its successive heads. Everything I trust that can be established in the nature of a substantive grievance on the part of the hon. and gallant Member's constituents will, I hope, receive a close and careful examination, but I trust this inquiry will not be undertaken with the belief that something must be very wrong indeed, on grounds such as have been laid before the House by the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

Mr. Jackson

*(5.56.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think it is desirable I should rise at once to state the course which the Government propose to take in regard to this Amendment. The Amendment was introduced in a conciliatory speech by my hon. and gallant Friend, and I may say at once that the Government will meet him precisely in the spirit indicated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who for many years has been endeavouring to reform the administration both of the Customs and of the Inland Revenue, and who is as responsible as any one, and probably more responsible than any one, for this desirable result—that the revenue in this country, both of the Customs and the Inland Revenue, is collected with less cost to the taxpayer than in any other country in the world. A distinction ought to be drawn between the efficiency of the Service and the position of the officers engaged in that Service. With regard to the officers engaged in the Service, one fact is clear, namely, that rigid good faith must be kept with them, and that they should have no reason to complain that the terms on which they entered the Service have been changed to their detriment. But neither are they entitled to claim that if there is a Service pretty similar to their own, which stands on a different footing, the terms of their own engagement must be altered to their advantage. There is nothing more dangerous than the levelling up of all Departments of the State by a system of comparison of the salaries received in one Department with those received in other Departments. The question is whether the duties of the officers are adequately remunerated. My hon. and gallant Friend supposes they are not adequately paid, but there are now 600 applicants for the Service. I have had sufficient experience of the Civil Service to know that if the Customs officers are levelled up to some particular point, another class will at once wish to be levelled to the same point also. For the Government I can say that they will inquire into every possible real grievance that may exist; but I must deprecate the basis of a general levelling up of salaries advocated by my hon. and gallant Friend. One of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's main grievances was that there has been a certain reduction in the upper part of the Service.

*SIR J. COLOMB: The Outdoor Service.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Well, my point is that whenever any re-organisation or reform takes place involving a diminution of numbers it must be asked, where is the diminution to take place? It will not take place at the bottom of the scale, where the young men are, nor in the middle, because the House naturally and rightly objects to pensioning men in the prime of life. Therefore, the reduction must take place in the upper branches of the Service; and if any such reduction is to be deprecated because it curtails the opportunities for promotion, there will be an end to all reform at once. I have heard the complaint made many times, and I think that it is impossible to recognise that Civil servants have any vested interest in the number of offices in the higher grades of the Service. If the State acknowledges that there is such a vested interest, then there will be an end to all reform. I therefore would beg hon. Members, when complaints are brought to them that promotion is slackened by any scheme of re-organisation, not to lend too ready an ear to that which is claimed as a vested right. I feel strongly on this point, for I regret to see the degree to which the minds of Civil servants have lately been disturbed. No one recognises more than myself the immense merits of the Civil Service. It is a Service of which any nation might be proud. In its honour, integrity, and loyalty it is unapproached; while the loyalty which it ever shows to the Executive Government of whatever Party is one of the most striking features of the Services. There is also another loyalty, and that is a strong feeling of loyalty among the Civil servants to the Departments to which they belong. I fear that this latter sentiment is being injured by the tendency not to think of the special Department, but to treat the Service as one vast Body. If that is done, loyalty to particular Departments will be destroyed, and I am not sure that the public interests will not suffer thereby. As to the proofs which exists that the Service is not efficient—

Mr. Goschen

*SIR J. COLOMB: Sufficient.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I should be very sorry to think that the Customs officers do not believe their services to be efficient, or that there is any slackness as to seizures. I think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's proofs will entirely break down under examination. But there is no evidence that an increased number of seizures means an increased amount of smuggling. The Customs officers have derived great assistance from the employment of steam launches, and this fact, together with increased vigilance, may account for the greater number of seizures. The hon. and gallant Gentleman suggests that there has been a reduction in the amount per head of the Customs revenue; but he should not be too ready to speak of a reduced consumption of spirits per head. It is rather too soon to do that, and

I am afraid my hon. Friend and the House may have a rude awakening as to any great falling off in the amount of spirits consumed per head. Again, if there has been a reduction it might be due to the increased temperance adopted during the time when wages are not so plentiful. It would not be wise to form any premature conclusions as to the revenue from spirits in a year of increasing prosperity. So far as spirits, then, are concerned, I think my hon. Friend's case has broken down. As to tea, it has been proved conclusively that a reduction in the amount of tea consumed per head is due to the substitution of Indian for China tea, the former being stronger and producing more cups to the pound. My hon. and gallant Friend has not established a conclusive case; but there are points to which the attention of the Government should be directed. I think that there ought to be a rigid examination of all those arrangements which the Customs officers hold to be objectionable; because, even though the officers are wrong, the Government wish to remove the sense of injury. Too much importance cannot be attached to the advisability of having a contented as well as an efficient Service. As to the 24 hours' question, the Government will make it the subject of inquiry how far the convenience of the men and the necessities of the Service can be made to agree. I propose that I myself, if the House will so far confide in me, should undertake to conduct a personal inquiry into the matter. I will enter upon it without any preconceived ideas on one side or the other, and will act simply on the principle that strict justice must be done between the interests of the taxpayers and the demands of the Service, and that the interests of the taxpayers and the contentment of the Service are equally secured.

(6.12.) MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): I desire to express a very earnest hope that the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his inquiry, will call before him officers from the Outdoor Department as well as from the Indoor Department.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes.

MR. FULTON: The outdoor officers complain most that they have to do all the work, while the indoor officers and the clerks from the Treasury secure all the plums of the Service. Nearly all the higher offices have been filled in that way, and this, I think, is a distinct grievance under which they believe they are suffering. I have been brought into close contact with many of these officers; I think them a very reasonable body of men; and I know they will be satisfied with such an inquiry as the right hon. Gentleman offers, provided they have an opportunity of placing their grievances before him.

(6.14.) MR. RALPH NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I wish to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the promise he has given us, and I am quite certain that it will prove extremely satisfactory to my constituents. In Liverpool I think there has been one great abuse, namely, the appointment of officers of one grade to the active duties of those of a higher grade without any payment of the higher emoluments. Though occasionally unavoidable, it is obvious this practice is easily abused, and one result is that by it you are not keeping faith with a body of public servants who took office in the belief that they would have certain chances of promotion. Ever since I have had the honour to represent Liverpool in this House, outdoor officers have frequently complained to me of the extreme length of the hours imposed on many of them. Some of the men who are employed in watching and in boarding vessels are often on duty for 24 hours at a stretch. It may be true that those duties do not require any great amount of intelligence, but they make great demands on physical strength through lack of shelter, for the men have to be on deck in all weathers, and no adequate provision is made for their rest in the short intervals during which they are off duty. I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that too much is expected of some of these men; and I am glad that they are to be afforded an opportunity of stating their grievances. At the same time, I hope it will be clearly understood that the men are not to suffer in any way for stating what they believe to be their grievances. There is a feeling that men who have brought forward grievances have been treated with harshness, and certainly an inquiry which was set on foot at Liverpool was followed by men being removed to other ports, much to their own disadvantage.

(6.18.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer give us an assurance that the inquiry shall extend to the case of the messengers, who believe rightly or wrongly that they have a serious grievance? When the warehousing system was altered in 1882 there were 16 first-class messengers and 20 second-class, and a great majority of the latter entered the Service believing that as vacancies occurred among the first class messengers they would be filled up by men of the second-class. It is true these messengers receive but small salaries. The second-class men get £70 a year, with an annual increment up to £80, while the first-class get £80, with an annual increment up to £90. Their complaint is that now when vacancies occur in the first-class only every alternate one is filled up from the second-class. I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give this matter his attention. I should also like to know if the inquiry will extend to the case of those who are employed in the Statistical Department? It will surprise the House to learn that out of 120 gentlemen employed in that Department as many as 54 are writers, and, therefore, have only temporary engagements. Mr. Giffen, in referring to these men, expressed a strong opinion that they were called upon to discharge duties which should be fulfilled by persons on the permanent staff; and a former Secretary of Customs pointed out that there was no difference between the work done by these writers and that done by the Lower Division clerks. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will inquire whether it is right and in the public interest that a great portion of the responsible work done by this Department should be done by gentlemen who only hold a temporary position.

(6.24.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I desire to express the genuine satisfaction with which I have heard that a personal investigation is to be made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in whom the Civil Service generally will place confidence. But I do venture to impress on the right hon. Gentleman that it will still be necessary to re-assure a large number of men in the Customs, who are very doubtful whether they can give evidence with safety to themselves, whatever tribunal may be constituted. Some time ago an officer was drowned at Harwich, and at the inquest evidence was given by certain Customs officers as to the number of hours he and others had been on duty. Soon afterwards those who gave this evidence were summarily removed to other ports, which involved the breaking up of their homes. This was done by orders of the Board of Customs. I do not say it was the result of their giving evidence, but it certainly was the sequel; and in the Customs generally there is a strong feeling that that is likely to be the kind of treatment meted out to men who venture to give evidence with regard to matters of internal administration. I have been assured that owing to the long hours and the insufficiency of the staff for certain duties—chiefly water-guarding, landing, and export duty—officers are required to give a record of daily work, which it is impossible for them to perform; and those who have made inquiries for me have said that the statements can be proved if opportunity is afforded. Mr. Horsfall's Committee in 1862 recommended a limitation of the number of hours that men should be employed; and since then the tendency has been to increase rather than diminish them. I do think there should be a searching investigation into these matters.

Mr. Ralph Neville

*(6.28.) SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): During the time I have represented Liverpool in this House I have become cognisant of many grievances of Customs officers. Some of the complaints, no doubt, are perhaps exaggerated, and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes to look into them he may find them to be empty grievances. But some of them are, undoubtedly, substantial grievances, and one of these has to do with the matter of promotion. Therefore, the undertaking of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to personally preside over this inquiry will give general satisfaction.

(6.29.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I hope that the inquiry of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will embrace the ports of Ireland, and particularly Belfast, which has witnessed marvellous development, which is now the third port in the United Kingdom, and which probably will compare very favourably with any similar port in respect of the cost at which its revenue is collected. I do, therefore, ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to inquire into the condition of the Customs officials in Ireland, and to give them every facility for laying their case before him.

*(6.30.) MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I do not wish to deny that the officers have grievances of which they may complain; but there is also a grievance among merchants, labourers, and others, which arises from the short hours during which outdoor officers are on duty during part of the year. During four months in the year their hours of duty are from nine to four, and thus the waterside labourer was restricted to earning 2s. 11d. a day, under the old wage rate of 5d. per hour. I trust this grievance on the other side will not be forgotten in this inquiry. I do not think there is a single trade in London in which the hours are so short. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Committee will take into consideration these extremely short hours during four months in the year during which Customs officials allow the landing and storing of goods. I suggest an extension of hours with increased pay, if necessary, as the present system is a source of great inconvenience and loss to merchants, shipowners, and labourers.

(6.31.) MAJOR BANES (West Ham, S.): I only wish to express the hope that this will not be a merely Departmental inquiry, but that every facility will be afforded for every officer to fully ventilate his grievance. For over 40 years I have had practical experience among them, and I know they have substantial grievances of which they complain. I am quite sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer will appreciate the advantage of having contented servants instead of discontented slaves. There is a growing sense of injustice among the men as year by year they have found their work and responsibilities increase, while they have fewer chances of promotion. I am convinced that if they are allowed to state their case fully the right hon. Gentleman will be inclined to give them redress, and so I hope that full opportunity will be given.

*(6.32.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I have no intention of prolonging the debate; I only wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will extend the inquiry to include the messengers of the Customs Department? I am strongly in favour of economy; but I would not have it practised on the lower salaries ranging from £70 to £100 a year. It is fair, however, that all who have grievances should have them inquired into, although I do not suppose inquiry will settle the matter entirely, for I never yet heard that public officers were ever perfectly satisfied. Of course, however, after fair inquiry, there should be less ground for complaint.

(6.33.) MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I do not represent a river side constituency, but a large number of my constituents are engaged in the Customs Department, and I think that I, in common with all Metropolitan Members, may congratulate the Government on their intention to hold this inquiry. But I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to look with too optimistic a spirit on the fact that there is a large increase in the number of prosecutions for bringing in goods without paying duty. The offence of smuggling seems to have greatly increased, so much so, that recently there were as many as 200 prosecutions at Liverpool, and the goods "run" were chiefly tobacco. Concurrently with this there was a diminution in the staff; and I cannot understand how, with a decreased number of officials, there should be an increase in the number of discoveries of cases of smuggling. I also find that since the staff was decreased several warehouses in Liverpool are not watched while goods are landed, and it is practically left to the honesty of traders to declare that goods are not smuggled. I trust when this investigation takes place the question will be included whether there are a sufficient number of Custom House officials to protect the interests of the Revenue and the taxpayers.

*(6.35.) MR. GOSCHEN: With the indulgence of the House I will answer the questions that have been put to me. Certainly Irish officials will have the same opportunity as other classes of having their complaints inquired into.

As to the character of the inquiry, and the suggestion that it shall not be Departmental, I can only describe it as one in which I shall sit as a Judge; and I shall have the assistance of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, and men with practical acquaintance of the matters under investigation and impartial judgment. But I must say, in answer to the hon. Member opposite, that the inquiry will be confined to the class mentioned by my hon. and gallant Friend. It would be impossible for me to extend the inquiry into all the other branches of the Service, and upon this particular Service inquiry was recommended by the Commission, and this is one of the grounds upon which I undertake it. These, I think, were the main questions asked. I am glad that the House is satisfied with the undertaking I have given; but may I venture to express a hope that Members will not too much encourage communication between members of the Civil Service and politicians in relation to the conditions of service, for it has a tendency to undermine proper discipline in the Service.

Mr. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): May I inquire whether inquiry will be directed into the allegations as to the insanitary conditions of work said to prevail in certain classes of the Service?

*Mr. GOSCHEN: I presume that will fall within the scope of the inquiry.

*Mr. MORTON: And in reference to my question as to messengers.

*Mr. GOSCHEN: It is not contemplated that these should be included in the inquiry. I may say that there are no posts in the Service for which there are so many applications, which seems to indicate the conditions are not very unsatisfactory.

(6.40.) Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed.

ALLEGED MISCARRIAGE OF JUSTICE— CASE OF GATCLIFFE.

*(6.40.) Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I take this opportunity to call attention to a grave miscarriage of justice. It is a matter upon which the Home Secretary has been questioned, but his answers have been altogether unsatisfactory. I refer to the circumstances under which a prisoner named Gatcliffe met with his death while confined in Strangeways Prison, Manchester. The facts of the case are briefly these: Gatcliffe was committed for 21 days for a comparatively venial offence, being drunk and disorderly. He was removed to Strangeways Gaol on November 20, and was at the time found to be suffering from delirium tremens, and was at once admitted to the hospital, being lodged in what is called the "Association" room, where at the time there were six or eight prisoners confined. He was there subjected to the usual examination by the assistant surgeon of the prison, and at that time, it is important to observe, the surgeon has stated upon oath there were no external marks of violence upon his body. He was repeatedly seen by the surgeon, and I mention particularly that he was seen by the surgeon on Friday the 22nd, when he presented no unfavourable symptoms. The surgeon next saw him at half-past 9 on the Saturday morning, when he was suffering from severe injuries, was in fact dying, and actually died half an hour afterwards, and the medical evidence is that he died in consequence of certain injuries which the post-mortem examination disclosed. To give a brief summary of the injuries, his breast bone was broken, besides four ribs on one side of the body and two ribs on the other were fractured, one of the ribs being fractured in two distinct places; and, in addition, there were more than a dozen contusions and bruises on chest, arms, and thighs. The post-mortem examination was in accordance with statute made by a surgeon, not an official of the prison (Dr. Kitchen); and from Dr. Kitchen we have it in evidence that, in his opinion, the fractures could not have been self-inflicted, and that some of the fractures and bruises must have been caused by the fist of another person. Dr. Kitchen did not stand alone in this evidence—he was generally corroborated by Dr. Paton, the assistant surgeon of Strangeways Prison. Then came the question, how were the injuries sustained? I mentioned just now that the prisoner was seen by the surgeon, and seemed to be going on well on Friday, 22nd; therefore, it is clear that the injuries, however they arose, were sustained between that time and half-past 9 on Saturday morning. The warder in charge of the association room on that night, a warder named Mitchell, was placed on trial for the manslaughter of Gatcliffe; and against him there was the direct evidence of three prisoners in the room that during the night they saw Mitchell repeatedly strike Gatcliffe with his fist, Gatcliffe being at the time tied down to his bed. These prisoners were asked why they did not ring the bell, or give an alarm, and they replied they were too much afraid to do that, for if they had done so they would have been charged with mutiny, and have got into serious trouble for committing a breach of discipline. Of course, I am not in any way desirous of re-trying the case in the House of Commons, and I will not refer to the trial except so far as the result of it fixes responsibility upon the Prison Commissioners, and, through them, upon the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. The jury rejected altogether the evidence of the three prisoners. Well, for my own part, I do not think their story incredible, or even improbable, and I base my opinion on a very weighty document. Here I have the Report of the Penal Servitude Acts Commission, in which the Commissioners draw attention to the evidence given before them by the Governor of Chatham Prison to the effect that he would never take prisoners' evidence against a warder, that he had always shown prisoners that he takes the warder's part; that even if he disapproved of the conduct of a warder he would not let a prisoner know it; that the word of a warder is decisive in every case; that when a man becomes a convict he is necessarily placed in such a position that under no conceivable circumstances is his word to be preferred to that of a free man; that, in fact, it is of very little use practically a prisoner making a complaint. The Commissioners add, "the Governor of Chatham Prison is an upright, careful officer." Well, my only observation is that when an officer takes such a distorted, extravagant view of his position this character is all the more dangerous. There were two theories set up on the part of the defence, one being that the prisoner Gatcliffe was delirious, and that he injured himself tumbling about. Now, I submit this theory is completely upset if one considers the position of the injuries upon the body of the prisoner. There were no injuries whatever upon the head and face, or on the back part of the body; all the injuries were upon the chest, arms, and thighs. I rely a good deal upon this fact, because I think it will be obvious that if you suppose a delirious patient injuring himself by tumbling about it will be almost inevitable that the extremities of the body, and the head and face particularly, that will sustain injury; whereas, in this case, not a scratch appeared on the extremities of the body; all these terrible injuries were in the front part and near the middle of the body. Another theory for the defence was that the injuries had been sustained in the course of putting a strait jacket upon Gatcliffe, and his struggles against this. This theory is altogether untenable, having regard to the medical testimony, not only of Dr. Kitchen, but of Dr. Paton, the prison surgeon; and when one considers the character, extent, and number of these terrible injuries I submit to the right hon. Gentleman that even if we accept this theory we cannot escape the conclusion that reckless criminal violence was applied to the person of the prisoner, and, therefore, that manslaughter was actually committed, although, of course, there might be some change in the precise legal aspect of the offence. How does the matter stand so far as the responsibility of the Prison Commissioners is concerned? I submit with the utmost confidence that upon the evidence we must conclude one thing, at all events, that the injuries to Gatcliffe were not self-inflicted, and the conclusion is irresistible that in that association room which was occupied at the time by some eight prisoners, criminal and brutal violence was applied to the body of Gatcliffe, and, as a result, he died. Warder Mitchell has been acquitted. Of course, I accept the verdict of the jury as to Mitchell's innocence, but who then, I ask, is the guilty person who committed this offence in the room while eight persons were present? That is the question to which the public have a right to insist upon an answer. Are the Commissioners content that it should be possible to do a man to death by brutal violence in this way, and no one shall be brought to justice? If so, is the Home Secretary content? I am bound to say, with all respect, that if the right hon. Gentleman does not control his Commissioners with a firmer hand they will bring him into very grave discredit with the country. What has been done in the matter? The Home Secretary has informed us that there has been an inquiry, a secret inquiry, so far as the public are concerned, conducted by Captain Wilson. But who is Captain Wilson? He is either a Commissioner or an Inspector, or one of the servants of the Board; so you have actually one of the officers of the Board, whose administration is called in question, appointed to investigate the circumstances of this case. I venture to think that the public would have felt more satisfied if the Visiting Justices of the Prison had been requested to hold the inquiry. In the case of Daly, in Chatham Prison, the Visiting Justices were asked to conduct the necessary inquiry, and I cannot see why, except, indeed, for the purpose of sheltering the Prison Commissioners, a similar course was not taken in this case. Well, Captain Wilson, at all events, has conducted the investigation, and certain results have followed. I understand that Chapman, the hospital warder, has been dismissed. I shall be glad to know if this is so, and, if so, why was he dismissed? I understand, also, that Dr. Braddell, the chief medical officer, who has performed excellent service for 23 years, has been served with three months' notice to leave, and if that is so, I should like to know why? The Home Secretary has told us that two other officers of the prison have been dismissed, and perhaps he will be good enough to tell us why this is the case. Apparently the only person who has escaped with absolute impunity is the Governor of the prison, but if there has been so lax an administration as that in the course of this inquiry, no less than four officials have been summarily dismissed, how is it that the person chiefly responsible for the administration and discipline of the prison, Major Preston, has been allowed to escape censure? I am informed, upon what I believe to be excellent authority, that an order has been given that in future all cases of prisoners suffering from delirium tremens shall be treated in the body of the prison, under the care of two or more prisoners. If that be so, I certainly protest most strongly against any such order being carried out. The Prison Commissioners are not without experience of the fatal results following such an arrangement. I presume the right hon. Gentleman has not forgotten the painful and fatal occurrence which happened at Armley Gaol in March, 1888, when a certificated lunatic was placed in a cell under the care of two prisoners, and, during the night, one of those prisoners was killed by the lunatic. I only mention this because it shows that the Prison Commissioners have had experience of the fatal results which follow mischievous arrangements of this character. Now, this case, so far as the Commissioners are concerned, comes upon the top of many recent cases which have caused very great disquietude in the minds of all who are interested in the administration of our English prisons, and there are one or two of those cases to which I think it necessary to allude. It is only a few months since I drew attention in this House to an occurrence in Ipswich Gaol. In a civil action brought against the Governor of that prison the plaintiff recovered damages to the amount of £75, on the ground that he, being an unconvicted prisoner, was put in prison clothes and forced to enter the bath against his will. The gravamen of the complaint in that case lies in the fact that it was proved that for 10 years there had been in operation in that gaol a set of rules that were absolutely contrary to the law. Only a month or two ago a much stronger case occurred, and the late Governor of Northampton Gaol is now suffering 10 years' penal servitude for attempting a criminal operation on a pregnant woman, that pregnant woman being the matron of the female side of the prison of which he was the chief officer. That was a scandal of the very grossest kind, and is proof that the supervision exercised by the Prison Commissioners is not what it ought to be. Now, Sir, I have just a word to say with regard to Daly's case. I am aware that that case is still sub judice, but it is admitted on both sides that Daly, a prisoner in Chatham Gaol, was poisoned not once, but on several occasions, by the wrongful administration of belladonna, which is sufficient evidence that there was very considerable laxity in the administration of that prison. Let me take another case. I refer to one that occurred in Birmingham Gaol last year. The Visiting Justices of that prison reported to the Borough Justices that the bread served out in the gaol was unfit for human food and that the health of the prisoners who had eaten it had thereby become impaired. Of course, one is glad that the Visiting Justices discovered this, and drew public attention to it, but surely it was not the business of the Visiting Justices to find out an impropriety of such a character. It ought to have been discovered by the officers of the prison long before. There is another case to which I will briefly call attention. It is one which occurred inside Millbank Prison in January last—only two months ago; in that case an inquest was held on the body of Joseph Honeysett, who was seriously injured there during the month of December, so much injured that he died in consequence. It is true, I believe, that the prisoner stated that he fell down in his cell, but, according to the evidence given by his mother at the inquest, he had had to undergo a regular fight to get into the Infirmary. The Coroner naturally inquired for the prison doctor, but that person was not forthcoming. I presume they have more than one prison doctor in that gaol, but it was said that the doctor was ill and there was no one to represent him. A juror said—

Mr. Goschen

Mr. Pickersgill

“Mr. Coroner, I am afraid we shall not get at the bottom of this now, for the case is most unsatisfactory.”

And a witness said—

“It is a strange thing that the deceased should have been in prison for five or six months, and the authorities there should know nothing of it.”

I think that the remark made by the Coroner is worthy of the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, for he said—

“It is idle to hold inquiries if the information is withheld from us.”

Now, this exactly touches what I believe to be the real source of the mischief. The Prison Commissioners have adopted a policy of hushing up everything that may in any way bring discredit on the administration, and consequently on themselves. For my part, I do not hesitate to say that this policy of excessive secrecy leads, and always will lead, to abuses and scandals, because it affords the most effective cover for bad and unscrupulous persons. I do not wish to do any injustice to the prison service of this country. It is clear that in every service there must be a certain proportion of bad and untrustworthy men, and this remark, I think, applies with exceptional force to the prison service, where the duties are of a singularly unpleasant and repulsive character, and where the officers of every grade are constantly brought into contact with the seamy side of human nature. It is only by publicity, and by meting out punishment where power has been abused, that you can hope to make the prison service of this country what it ought to be. In conclusion, I have only to say that in the case of the prisoner Gatcliffe there has been, in my judgment, a serious miscarriage of justice, and that if the matter is left where it is you will have taught a bad lesson to unscrupulous men in the prison service, namely, that they may be guilty of brutal ill-treatment towards helpless creatures placed under their charge, and the Prison Commissioners will do their best to hush up the matter, and thus secure for them practical immunity. I think it is high time that a protest should be made against the policy which distinguishes the present Prisons Board. I have felt it my duty to make this protest to-night, and I trust that, in doing so, I shall have, at any rate in some degree, the support of this House.

*(7.10.) SIR R. N. FOWLER (London, City): I only desire to say a few words upon this matter to which my attention was called a few weeks ago. I refer to the Manchester case which I looked into with some care. I was not, however, aware that it would be brought up to-day, or I should have been better prepared to have discussed it. Nevertheless, I may say that it struck me as being a case which we can hardly be called upon to decide in this House, because it has already been considered by a jury whose verdict ought to prevent our going into the matter. All I wish to do at the present moment is to point out that several of the officials of the prison have been dismissed by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, which is a proof that he has had the matter under his careful consideration. Representations were made to the Home Office, and the case was thoroughly investigated by my right hon. Friend, and from the fact that he has dismissed a number of the prison officials it is evident that he was not satisfied with the result, and that he is disposed to take a strenuous line in the discharge of his duty.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I do not think it is at all surprising, after the cases that have been brought before this House in reference to the treatment of prisoners in Irish gaols, that an English Member should have thought proper to bring forward the question which is now before the House. The experience we have had in Ireland, where the question of prison treatment has long been a burning question, has had the effect of throwing a little light on what appears to be going on in England. And I am glad that the prison discipline of this country is now beginning to attract the attention of English Members. I do not think you could have a better instance of this than the fact that the hon. Baronet who has just addressed the House, and who, when Irish cases have been brought before us, has habitually treated them with contempt, and invariably given his Vote for the Government, has at last found it necessary to bestow some attention on an English case. Now that the question has reached a stage in which it has secured the attention of British Legislatures, there can be little doubt that before long the necessary reforms in regard to prison treatment will be brought about. I read in one of the London papers, published on Saturday last, an account of an interview with a man who had recently been released from Chatham Prison, and, in the course of his statements, the man preferred very serious charges against the officers of more than one gaol. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will be able to say, in the reply he will presently make, whether there is any ground for those charges, and what course he intends to take with regard to the officers who are implicated. This man alleges that while he was in Chatham Prison, he was very badly treated. He says:—

"Four times I was punished by solitary confinement in a solitary cell, and on every one of those occasions the punishment was unjustly given. They charged me with not returning to work when I was not able to work through my ill-health, and they charged me with talking when I was not. I cannot describe the terrors of those cells. The smell in them is horrible, and they are so cold, while the light is altogether insufficient. Whenever I came out of them after confinement, I felt like a drunken man on regaining a better atmosphere; but if the change made me reel, as it did once or twice, I only got a clump on the head."

Sir R. N. Fowler

This is a strong charge against some officer in the gaol, and I think it is one that ought to be inquired into. I am not going to accept the bare statement of any prisoner, but I know, from my own experience of prisoners in Ireland, that cruelties are perpetrated of which no one ever hears in consequence of that sort of freemasonry which is known to exist among the prison officials. This man, whose name is Harrison, was removed from Chatham to Millbank, and he states:—

"I saw the dynamitards there and they complained bitterly of their penal cells. The two who were last convicted—Gallagher and Hawkins—are only allowed a quarter-of-an-hour's exercise daily instead of an hour, and they feel the deprivation keenly. Our food consisted of skilly, soup, potatoes, bread, and sometimes meat, but it was very tough and gristly meat, strongly reminding one of cat's food. The food and general treatment of prisoners has been so bad that several cases of insubordination occurred. I will give an instance of some of the treatment. There was one man in a dying condition over whom a pail of water was thrown as a remedy, with the result that he had to be removed to the infirmary and his parents sent for, so critical became his condition. But he eventually recovered."

Here we have complaints of the quality of the food and the condition of the cells, and we are told that several cases of insubordination had occurred. This is what might be expected under the circumstances, as it very seldom happens in well-conducted prisons that revolts take place. Harrison goes on to say—

"On another occasion, in the cell next to mine, I heard two officers go in and beat a prisoner unmercifully with their staves. It was something terrible, for I could hear it was his poor head they were hitting. I have not seen him since. He is either in the Infirmary or dead. I stopped in my cell about two hours after that, but I never heard him move, and I determined to let the world know of it when I got out. I believe a special inquiry has been held recently into the charges alleged by prisoners, but what has been done, or whether anything has been done, I cannot say."

That was a case which occurred in Millbank, and I think it is one deserving investigation by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. Harrison also makes charges against the chaplain which I hope are not true, for a prisoner has the right to look to the chaplain for encouragement and sympathy. One chaplain said to him, "You are like the rest of them that want to turn the world upside down," and did not give him encouragement; whereas at Wormwood Scrubbs the chaplain advised him that if he observed the rules, and conducted himself well, he might get out of prison before the completion of his term. There you have the contrast between the sympathetic chaplain who does his duty, and advises the prisoner to observe the rules and to regain his liberty, and the chaplain who offers no word of consolation, but, priding himself on being an old, true-blue Tory type of man, permits himself to carry his political opinions into the gaol, to the irritation of political prisoners, with whose political sentiments I have yet to learn that the rules allow interference on the part of the chaplain. The same man says that he was three months at Chatham without having received a visit from the chaplain at all. The chaplain, as soon as the prisoner is classed, ought to be the first to go and see him, and when he does go it ought to be to console and encourage, and not to gibe. If Mr. Harrison's statement is true, not only did the chaplain at Chatham annoy him, but he neglected a plain duty, which was to have gone and seen the prisoner as soon as he was passed. It rests with the prisoner himself, as soon as he is passed, to say to what denomination he belongs. As soon as he does that a card is put upon his door, and it is the business of the chaplain to see him as soon as possible. If this chaplain has failed to do his duty, I hope he will be called to order for his misconduct. If you cannot make him fulfil his duty in this prison of Chatham, which the criminal classes recognise as a hell upon earth, at least you can get some other clergyman who will realise the responsibility of his office. I think experience shows that a case has been made out for impartial and thorough investigation into the prison system. It should be seen that men who find themselves in prison, often as much from their misfortunes as their faults, are not worried and interfered with, but are treated as kindly as possible. I hope the Home Secretary will see the advisability of having some Commission to inquire into the various charges which arise all over England; and if the right hon. Gentleman has not the information now, I trust he will be able to give us some information to-morrow, as to the allegations respecting Millbank Prison.

(7.25.) DR. TANNER: Sir, before the right hon. Gentleman replies, I take this opportunity of emphasising the remarks made by my hon. Friend. It was only last Friday that I addressed a question to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, and it is really most extraordinary that Her Majesty's Government have done nothing in this case. I cannot understand how the right hon. Gentleman can feel satisfied himself with the answers which he gives on the information supplied to him, and I believe that if he made thorough examination into the matter he would not remain satisfied. I asked him about the Warder Mitchell, who assaulted another delirious prisoner; and if you find such a case of gross inhumanity as to insult a poor man who was suffering from delirium, I think it ought to be inquired into, and matters not allowed to remain as they now are. The right hon. Gentleman was not perfectly certain whether Mitchell would or would not be present.

MR. MATTHEWS: I did not say so.

DR. TANNER: I did not understand that at the time. But it shows the great use of pressing these questions, for each time we get more definite information. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is proverbially courteous in this House, and I acknowledge courtesy whenever I meet with it. Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the suggestion of the Inspector, Captain Wilson, whose counsels, from his official position, certainly carry weight? I think the country requires an answer, and I hope the Government will be able to clear themselves from the charge of sheltering people guilty of inhumanity of the worst possible character. I should also like to have some information as to the prisoner Daly, for, as a medical man, I cannot understand how it came to pass that a medicine like belladonna, which is a strong poison, was administered in such large doses as appears to have been the case. It appears to me that there must have been something radically wrong in the treatment of Daly. If there is such laxity in regard to the dispensing of medicines in Her Majesty's prisons it is easy to stretch matters still further, and have prisoners actually killed with other poisons. I think the circumstances of this case should be thoroughly inquired into.

(7.33.) MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot complain of hon. Members raising questions of this kind as to the conduct of prison officials, as I believe that nothing is more calculated to keep these officials up to the mark than the application to them of this constant watchfulness on the part of hon. Members. I think it best not to enter into the case of the man Daly in any detail, as the case is still under investigation by the Visitors of the prison, whose Report, I hope, will be full and searching. I beg to postpone any observations I may have to make upon the case until the Report comes in. This much I may say, however, that I have allowed the Visitors an absolutely free hand, having left them to pursue their investigation without the slightest control on my part. There can be no doubt that the task of the prison warders is not an easy one, from the very nature of their duties, for they are constantly being provoked and irritated by prisoners who resist prison discipline as much as they can, and I do not say this to censure such prisoners, as it is very natural on their part to resist so far as they can. The duty of the warders is disagreeable, and necessarily disagreeable, and there is no doubt that the men are constantly in a state of irritation, and that being so, it is necessary that the Prison Authorities should keep a watchful eye upon them to see that the great power which, from the very necessity of the case, is exercised by them is not marked by cruelty. When the hon. Member for Bethnal Green, however, makes the case at Strangeways Gaol illustrative of the charge that the Prison Commissioners shrink from inquiry and try to hush up these matters, it appears to me that the accusation is utterly unwarranted by the facts. What did the Commissioners do? I hold in my hand an enormous mass of evidence collected by them. This shows that they held a most careful inquiry in the hospital ward to find out the real facts of the case; and, as the result of their investigation, the man Mitchell was put on his trial. That, surely, was not trying to hush the matter up, or an endeavour to cloak the guilt of a warder!

Dr. Tanner

*MR. PICKERSGILL: Their hands were forced by the verdict of manslaughter returned by the Coroner's Jury.

MR. MATTHEWS: I would point out that before that verdict was returned the prison officials had inquired into the circumstances attending Gatliffe's death, and the matter had been put into the hands of the public prosecutor. The hon. Member felt—and, of course, I feel still more—embarrassed by the verdict of the jury, but the hon. Member must not make that verdict the foundation for charges against the Prison Commissioners, who were not responsible for the result of the trial. It is not proper that I should comment on what the jury thought fit to find or on what the Judge thought fit to say. The hon. Member has, with some force, put before the House the points which operated on my mind in considering this case. I considered the case over and over again to see if there was any other direction in which an inquiry could take place, but the evidence of the doctors who attended the man Gatliffe from half past 5 to 6 o'clock on the evening of the 22nd November—that was the evening before his death—was conclusive that when they then examined the deceased the injuries of which he ultimately died were not visible. The Prison Commissioners endeavoured, as far as they could, to ascertain all that had taken place on the 22nd November. I hope I shall not be accused of neglecting to say everything that might be said, but when dealing with the case of men over whose heads accusations are hanging, though it is necessary to say something, I cannot go further than that the most careful investigation has failed to bring forth any prima facie evidence on which a charge of undue violence can be brought against any other person. Under the circumstances what other public inquiry is possible? If I could have seen a prima facie case of misconduct against any other person, that case would certainly have been brought forward. It was not my fault, still less that of the Prison Commissioners, that no one has been convicted. The Prison Commissioners displayed the utmost zeal in the case. The greater part of the mass of papers I hold in my hand is made up of Reports by the Commissioners, and they have certainly done their best to investigate the case, as well as to find out the history of Gatliffe, the time his drinking habits began, and all other circumstances connected with him down to the time of his death. Chapman was the hospital warder in charge of the room—it was not an association room, but a hospital ward, and Gatliffe was put into it because he had incipient delirium tremens. Two other persons in the ward, Dukes—who has since been executed—and Chadwick were examined over and over again by the Prison Commissioners. They were put into that ward because it was thought that both men might commit suicide if they were not watched. The conclusion of the Prison Commissioners was that Chapman was responsible for an undoubted irregularity—namely, putting on a strait waistcoat twice in the course of the 21st of November upon Gatliffe, without the positive instruction of the medical officer, which was the rule of the prison. Chapman has been dismissed, and neither he nor Mitchell, the warder, will again be employed in the Prison Service. Of the personal medical qualities of Dr. Braddon I cannot speak too highly. He is a man of very great eminence, a man of perfect humanity, and I desire to say not a word in the way of censure on Dr. Braddon. The Prison Commissioners felt, however, that Dr. Braddon was not able to give that undivided attention to the medical care of the prisoners that was desirable. He was a gentleman who came in under the Act of 1887, and he was allowed to continue his private practice and to pay only occasional visits to the prison during the course of the day. It appeared to me and to the Commissioners that this case showed that a closer and more concentrated attention on the part of the chief medical officer was desirable. Therefore, we determined to substitute a permanent medical officer in the place of Dr. Braddon, and we hope that change will conduce to the satisfactory medical treatment of the prisoners. One other officer has been dismissed, Rappley, the day warder, who was in charge during the hours of daylight both on the 21st and the 22nd

November. Rappley, with the assistance of two of the prisoners in the room, put a strait waistcoat on Gatliffe on two occasions on the day of the 23rd. Rappley's excuse was that he was carrying out the course of practice which he had known to be made use of before when patients were noisy, and Gatliffe was undoubtedly noisy and mischievous. Hon. Members compel me to say that after the acquittal I did look round to see whether anyone else was responsible. I am, however, bound to say that, after making the utmost inquiry into all the circumstances of the unfortunate affair, I have been unable to discover even a prima facie case against Rappley, and the testimony of the medical men, which goes up to the final circumstances in the case, certainly acquit him of any blame in connection with the man's death. I must say, at the same time, I cannot agree with Rappley's conduct after the event. I believe there was a deficiency of straightforwardness in his account of the blows inflicted by Mitchell and others in the ward, and he has been discharged from further service in the prison. The Governor of the prison has not escaped. I believe it will not be denied that he is a most humane man, thoroughly desirous of doing his duty towards the prisoners under his charge. I believe the Governor has the respect and goodwill of all the magistrates who commit prisoners to his keeping, and I believe that will be found to be the feeling entertained towards him in the locality generally. At the same time I thought it right to direct that that gentleman should be severely reprimanded for what I consider a want of sufficient supervision. I have stated that in the House already, in answer to the many questions which have been addressed to me. I do not mean to say that the Governor was responsible for the ultimate injuries sustained by Gatliffe, but there was a deficiency of supervision in regard to the strait waistcoat. It was in a place where it ought not to have been, namely, under one of the beds in the ward. It ought to have been in safe custody, where it could not have been got at without the knowledge of higher officials than the warders. The Governor, however, was not responsible for the character of Mitchell, who was employed as a hospital warder. He was always regarded as a quiet and kindly-disposed man. He was formerly a colour-sergeant in the Army, and had testimonials of the highest kind. I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill) that cases of violence to prisoners are on the increase. When we look at the extent and character of our prison system we must be prepared to find cases of misconduct on the part of warders now and then; but I think, under all the circumstances, the hon. Member will find that the number of such instances is extremely small. As regards what has been said by the hon. Member in reference to the Visiting Commissioners I must also disagree. I regard the Commissioners as a most admirable Body. The Visitors display commendable watchfulness and control in these matters, and spare no effort to check any abuse of power either on the part of a warder or a Governor of a prison. I am convinced that they discharge the duty devolving upon them conscientiously and well. I do not know that any better system could be substituted for that which is at present in force in this respect. It is the duty of the Visitors to visit every prisoner, and if any complaint is made as to the maltreatment of a prisoner it is the duty of the Visitor to investigate the complaint, and to bring any official before him for the purpose of enabling him to arrive at the facts of the case. I cannot conceive any better system of discovering and punishing cases of maltreatment. I am not going to say that any warder or any Governor is not liable to make mistakes, but I do say this much, that the hon. Member who introduced this matter has not brought forward the slightest foundation to support the charge that the Prison Commissioners in this case neglected to discharge their responsible duties. My experience of them is that they do their utmost to prevent any undue exercise of the powers entrusted to prison officials.

(7.55.) MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I would impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the importance of thoroughly probing each case that comes to the front, so as to carry out the spirit of the law which has made the punishment inflicted less vindictive than it used to be. I think the punishment of imprisonment is quite enough to inflict on any man without adding to it by treating the prisoner vindictively. All vindictive punishment tends to harden prisoners. Our object should be to lead them into the paths of virtue rather than to drive them back into the paths of vice. I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has given so much personal attention to this matter, and I hope that all cases of the kind will receive his personal investigation.

Mr. Matthews

GOVERNMENT FURNITURE CONTRACTS.

(7.57.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I should like to ask the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) a question I have already addressed to him on two or three occasions in regard to the system of supplying the Government with furniture. I think that last year the right hon. Gentleman promised that the contracts for the supply of furniture in Government offices should be thrown open instead of being left in the hands of two or three privileged firms in the Metropolis. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether that promise has been redeemed? I feel under deep obligations to the right hon. Gentleman for having kept the promise he made to me two years ago in regard to Kew Gardens. I pressed on the right hon. Gentleman, two or three years ago, the necessity of providing light refreshments to the public who frequent Kew Gardens. I am glad to say he took the hint, and has provided an admirable establishment of the kind in the gardens. I wish now to ask him who it is who provides the seats in our public gardens, and what becomes of the revenue derived from the letting of such seats?

*(8.0.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): As to the hon. Member's first question the pledge I gave last year was that the name of any respectable firm which was sent to the Office of Works should be put on the list of those invited to tender. I now repeat that pledge; some additional names have since then, I believe, been put on the list, and if the hon. Member will submit to me the names of other firms I shall be glad to add them to the list. As to the chairs in the parks the money received from letting them is regarded as extra receipts, and paid into the Exchequer.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to inserting advertisements in the ordinary newspapers for tenders for furniture contracts?

*MR. PLUNKET: One objection is that we have found by experience that if that system be adopted tenders are received from a number of firms that we know never will be able to carry out the contract.

MR. MORTON: I should like to impress on the right hon. Gentleman the fact that he ought to advertise for tenders of this sort. It is well-known that the system of asking tenders from certain firms does not enable you to get fair tenders. I know, in connection with my own business, that very often arrangements are made between the various parties, and the tenders are sent in accordingly. A few years ago it could be told with almost dead certainty who were to get certain tenders, simply because an arrangement was made between the people on the list. Until you get independent persons to tender in the ordinary way you cannot get a fair system of tenders.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £31,725, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for Expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces and Marlborough House."

(8.7.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: This being the first Vote of the Civil Service Estimates, I desire to ask a question, which has reference not only to this particular Vote, but to a number of other Votes in different Classes. The Vote which has just been put from the Chair includes the Royal Palaces, which previously were dealt with in a separate Vote, and also Marlborough House, which was also treated separately. The Government propose in this case, as in a great many others, to take a lump sum for a number of different Services. It seems to me that a Department which obtains this complex Vote will be in the position of having a very much larger balance probably than it had before. It may have a balance on a single Vote equal to what would have been the balances on the two combined Votes in previous years. That will give them a very much freer hand than they ever had before, and will diminish pro tanto the Parliamentary check over the Estimates. I wish to know whether the Government propose to treat this lump sum as a single Vote belonging to the entire Service, or whether they will be compelled to surrender any unexpended balance on the several items? If, for instance, they have an unexpended balance on the Royal Palaces Account, will they be compelled to pay that into the Exchequer, or will they be at liberty to expend it on Marlborough House?

*(8.11.) MR. JACKSON: My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury said, on a previous occasion, that it was the intention of the Government to take the opinion of the Public Accounts Committee as to what steps should be taken as regards the balances—whether the items under each sub-head should be treated as separate Votes and the unexpended balance be repaid into the Exchequer, or whether the balances should be available to be transferred from one sub-head to another. There are obvious advantages in there being the power of transfer, but the Government have no desire to act in any way contrary to the opinion of the House and of the Public Accounts Committee. The continued control of Parliament may be secured in one of two ways. One plan is that the Comptroller and Auditor General should report, in his Annual Report, any case in which one of the sub-heads has been exceeded. The rolling of the Votes into one was not suggested with any desire or view to obtain a larger power of transfer than at present is possessed, but there are advantages in putting two or three Votes of a like character together. As the Committee knows, the margin necessary to avoid Supplementary Estimates is increased in degree and in extent according as the Votes are numerous, and no doubt a reasonable consolidation of Votes with the power of making a transfer of balance arising on one sub-head to defray a deficit arising in another sub-head does tend, and will tend, to diminish the total amount of money which any Government would have to ask for. The Departments are very much opposed to having to come to Parliament for Supplementary Estimates, and I think that to put Votes together will tend in the direction of both economy and control. But the matter will shortly be considered by the Public Accounts Committee, and we shall be guided very much by the opinion they express as to the course to be taken. If it is deemed sufficient that the Comptroller and Auditor General should report every case of excess of expenditure on any sub-head it will be possible, either by an alteration of the law or by some regulation or instruction, to guard against the balance under one sub-head being appropriated under another sub-head.

(8.15.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: The Committee will appreciate the care with which the hon. Gentleman addressed himself to the point which I have raised, but I confess that his answer does not appear to me to be at all satisfactory, and that for more than one reason. We are asked to vote a lump sum, and are not told specifically how that sum is to be appropriated. We are told also that the matter has been referred to the Public Accounts Committee. Is the Public Accounts Committee in such a condition that it can direct how the sums of money voted in Committee of this House are to be appropriated? That is a function never contemplated for the Public Accounts Committee, and how it is to derive power to give such directions I do not know. As a matter of fact, the Public Accounts Committee has, in a special Report to the House, refused to arrogate to itself any authority to direct, or even to advise, with regard to the mode in which the Votes are to be submitted to the House of Commons. It is concerned only in the appropriation of public money after the money has been spent. We are in this difficulty, that if the Public Accounts Committee adheres to the Report which it made about a fortnight or three weeks ago, the House will have referred a matter to an Authority which declines to answer, and we shall be in the position that we shall have voted away sums of money for aggregate Services without any assurance whatever that the balance saved on one Service will not be devoted to some branch of the Service that was possibly never mentioned in the Estimates at all. I had hoped we should have some specific assurance from the Secretary to the Treasury that Votes were consolidated for convenience of procedure in Committee, but that for appropriation purposes each sub-total would be confined to the Services for which it was specifically obtained.

Mr. Jackson

MR. JACKSON: I am sorry I did not make it clear to the hon. Gentleman and the Committee, but it was my intention to give that assurance. I am prepared, if it is desired, to come under a pledge that the surplus under one of these sub-heads shall not be devoted to the purposes of another sub-head.

(8.22.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not quite understand whether the hon. Gentleman does come under that pledge.

MR. JACKSON: If the Public Accounts Committee adhere to their position.

MR. LABOUCHERE: If they adhere to the view that it is ultra vires, then the pledge that the hon. Gentleman has just given holds good? [MR. JACKSON: If it is desired.] I do not precisely know how far the wish of hon. Members now present in the House will be considered to be the desire of the House. [MR. JACKSON was understood to dissent.] Then we must go further. I was going to commence my holiday to-day, but the First Lord of the Treasury was good enough on Friday to give a sort of personal invitation to me to come here to-day and aid him in the transaction of business. Considering the great courtesy of the First Lord of the Treasury, and how anxious I am to oblige him so far as I possibly can, I have come here to aid him in carrying on business, though, perhaps, not in the way he desires—I have come here to look at the Votes in a deliberate, calm, impartial, and economical fashion. This Vote has always provoked a good deal of discussion. It divides itself into three different heads—into Palaces in the personal occupation of Her Majesty, Palaces partly in the occupation of Her Majesty, and Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty. In the case of Buckingham Palace, I find a large expenditure on the Royal Mews. That has always been objected to, because we never understand why this vast expenditure is to take place in these Royal Mews considering that Her Majesty is seldom in London. Then I do not understand why we should pay so much in respect of St. James's and other Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty. A large number of persons have apartments there; but the very least that can be expected of them is that they should keep up their apartments, and provide their own fuel and light. Again, when structural alterations are made in any of the Palaces I do not see why they should be made at our expense. I find that £2,754 against £1,984 last year is asked for Kensington Palace. I should think the best thing to do is to clear that Palace away. It is in a miserable condition at present, and it must cost a great deal to keep it in repair. There are two good ways of dealing with the palace: one would be to clear it away, and the other to let it for a large restaurant for instance—of course, I should advocate that it should be a temperance restaurant. By the adoption of the latter plan we should get a rent for the Palace, and it would be used with advantage to the public. It has been suggested that it should be converted into a picture gallery, but it is too much out of the way for such a purpose. If it were swept away, the grounds might, with advantage, be thrown into Kensington Gardens. Hampton Court Palace is a People's Palace, and therefore I do not complain of the expenditure there, but we have got the Hampton Court Stud House. I should like some explanation about that. I have asked for many years what becomes of the foals. We expend money on stallions. I presume these animals have progeny, and that the foals are sold. We do not, however, get a farthing for any of the foals. Then we get the Kew Palace and buildings upon Kew Green. Now, I have never yet discovered what Kew Palace is. I have been often to Kew, and there I have seen a dead wall, over the top of which you may see part of a wretched looking house, which we understand to be Kew Palace. Who on earth lives in Kew Palace?

*MR. PLUNKET: Nobody.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, then, we have it on official authority that nobody lives there, and here we have this year £1,420 and last year £720 expended upon a place where nobody lives—a wretched, ramshackle place where, I believe, George III. lived while he was insane. At all events, it is a house of no use to any human being, and it is really ridiculous that it should continue to occupy land and prevent other persons from availing themselves of building leases there. Then we have a long list of houses and expenditure upon them for maintenance and repairs, and I believe every one of these houses has been lent to some lady or gentleman who occupies it. But if Her Majesty allows these houses to be occupied rent free, at least, I think, the occupants might be required to keep the houses in repair. The amount is not large, but the principle is one upon which I think we ought to register a protest. Here are buildings the use of which Her Majesty does not require, the maintenance of which costs £7,617. Now, in view of the fact that as I have said this is unnecessary expenditure against which we ought to register a protest, I beg to move a reduction of the Vote by £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That a sum not exceeding £26,725 be granted for the said Service.—(Mr. Labouchere.)

*(9.8.) MR. MORTON: In connection with—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. MORTON: I have been sent here to secure economy in the public expenditure. I do not intend to say a word against Her Majesty or against the Royal Family. But my attention has been particularly drawn to the item in this Vote for Light, Fuel, and Water. Surely these things ought to be paid for out of the allowances we make to the Royal Family? Now, I understand that the allowance to Her Majesty includes the maintenance and repair of Buckingham Palace and the other Palaces used by Her Majesty; but I take it it also includes new works unless they are required for the benefit of the nation. I find in connection with Buckingham Palace there is an item of £270 for fuel, light, water, and household articles. Why should we pay that? Why is it not paid out of the Royal allowance. Again, there has been an expenditure of £500 on some sanitary works at Pimlico Mews. Is there any occasion for keeping up those mews, seeing that they are never used by Her Majesty? Certainly by-and-bye we may have a Monarch who may make use of them; but until then they might be let, and I would suggest that if they were let to Mr. Barnum on the occasion of his next visit to this country a considerable sum might be realised for the benefit of the Public Exchequer. Now I come to Windsor Castle. Under the item for wages, I find that a labourer is paid a guinea a week, and that a turncock, in addition to receiving £1 8s. a week, gets an annual allowance of £8 for acting as rat-catcher. Why is not this paid out of the general allowance? I had supposed that the new drainage system in London had got rid of all the rats. There is a further payment of £10 a year to a rat-catcher employed at the Albert Memorial Chapel. I am not complaining of these amounts, but I do think they should be paid by Her Majesty out of the allowance made her by the nation. Now, I want to know who occupies the White Lodge, Regent's Park? On the general question, I must say I do not think that all these Palaces are required. Surely it is not necessary to keep up both Buckingham Palace and St. James's Palace. Buckingham Palace might be handed over to the people, who could hold their meetings there instead of at Trafalgar Square. It is of no use to Her Majesty, and therefore in the interests of economy, we might very well get rid of it. Kensington Palace might also be got rid of, because it is of no use to Her Majesty. I do not object to Her Majesty having several Palaces if only they are used by her. The London County Council are looking out for a building in which to meet, and, seeing the central position of this building, I think it might be a very desirable building in which they should meet for the transaction of their business. I want some information as to Hampton Court Studhouse, Kew Palace, the Military Knights' House at Windsor Castle, Holyrood Palace, and Marlborough

Mr. Morton

House. At Kew last year we spent £700 on an empty house, and this year we are asked to spend another £1,400. I hope that in the interests of economy that Vote will be withdrawn, and that old Palace got rid of altogether. Then, why are the Military Knights' houses at Windsor kept up out of the public money? This expenditure does not appear to me to be for the good of the nation. For Holyrood Palace there is a Vote of £1,366, of which £700 is for maintenance and repairs. Now I do not object to this Vote, but what is going to be done with the money? When I was last at Holyrood I found it in a wretched condition; it did not look as if anything at all had been spent on it. Indeed, it is generally complained in Scotland that the public buildings are sadly neglected by the British Parliament. I do not know why that is so; perhaps it is because Scotland is so far away. No doubt when the Scottish people get Home Rule they will take better care of these old Palaces. I hold that Holyrood should be kept up; and I hope to hear how this money will be spent. In regard to Marlborough House, I am told there is a bargain with the Prince of Wales similar to the one made with the Queen. I, therefore, do not think the nation ought to pay for new works there, such as alterations to the steward's room. The Prince of Wales should pay for these things out of his allowance. Again, the people who occupy these Palaces should pay for their own coals and light and water. So long as the present system is allowed to exist you will never get real economy. If the Royal Family have not a sufficient grant allowed them at present to do so, then on another occasion sufficient money should be granted to them in order to meet all these items of expense, instead of the Government coming to Parliament and asking the taxpayers to pay the bills. It is in the interests of economy that an arrangement such as this should be put in force. Finally, let me point out that when these Votes are laid before the Committee, we are allowed to criticise them, but we are never allowed to reduce them. They are forced through the House of Commons without regard to our criticism. Unfortunately, the Government make the passing them a question of confidence, and consequently the supporters of the Government are obliged to vote them, whether they like it or not. I think the Liberals are as bad in this respect as the Conservatives when they are in power. The Committee ought to be able to reduce these Estimates regardless of Party allegiance, and an adverse vote ought not to affect the Government. Until you can discuss the Votes under these conditions, you will never get economy practised in any Department. I see there is an item for Insurance, Tithe Rent-Charges, &c. Now, we have been told that tithe is a religious payment; then surely the Royal Family might set the people a good example by paying their own tithes. I do not think the Palaces ought to be occupied by Royal favourites; but if they are, then these tenants should be made to keep the premises in repair at their own expense in the same way that other tenants for life are bound to hand over houses to their successors in good repair. Clergymen who occupy vicarages are bound to do this; then why should not friends of the Royal Family, who are allowed to occupy these Palaces, be compelled to do a similar thing? It is our duty to endeavour to induce this Parliament to secure greater economy in these Votes; and I warn the Government that if they do not, we may presently get a new Parliament which will make greater changes than they may dream of. Personally, I should prefer these changes to be made gradually, and, therefore, I ask this Committee to make a beginning. It is easy to spend other people's money; but when a man has to spend his own, he generally endeavours to do it in the most economical manner. It seems to me that the expenditure of this country is increasing from year to year, and we ought, wherever we can, to practise economy. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to assure us that in future the works coming under these Estimates will be put out to tender, as it is a well-known fact that where the present system is carried out, the tradesmen arrange among themselves who shall get the contract—that, in point of fact, there is what is known as a “knock out” amongst them, the only possible check upon which would be the issue of advertisements inviting tenders from every one desirous of doing the work. This is the method pursued by nearly all other authorities, and has been found to work well in practice. I must apologise for having kept the House so long. I have done so solely in the interests of economy, having been specially pledged on that subject to my constituents.

(9.33.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I am altogether opposed to any increased expenditure on this Vote, as I think the incomes possessed by those who occupy the Royal Palaces ought to suffice for the outlay required upon them. The increase does not arise on Palaces in the occupation of Her Majesty, but on the other two classes, namely, Palaces partially in Her Majesty's occupation and Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty. On some of the Palaces in Her Majesty's occupation there are large reductions. For instance, the amount required for Windsor Castle is reduced from £6,800 to £6,325; but when we come to other Palaces, we find the result to be the other way. Surely we ought to have some explanation of the increased expenditure now asked for, especially in regard to such charges as are made for the supply of fuel and water to those who occupy these Palaces.

(9.36.) MR. H. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): Many of the items that appear under the head of this Vote are so insignificant and trivial that they may almost be characterised as petty. I think that the only ground on which we can be asked to defray these charges is where they contribute to the benefit of the general public; but it can hardly be for the advantage of the public to maintain a number of Palaces which they are unable to use. I call on the Government to see that something is done that will enable a proper use to be made of these Palaces. Whether the Motion of my hon. Friend is the right one I am hardly prepared to say. I do not think some of these items are calculated to deepen respect for existing institutions, for I observe that they include money for ratcatchers, bellringers, fuel, and so forth. I think it is the plain duty of the Government to get rid of this expenditure and to economise.

(9.40.) DR. TANNER: I will not follow my hon. Friend into details, although most of his remarks are sensible ones. In view of the progress of the age, I think a good many of these mediæval remnants might be done away with, and common-sense opinions made to prevail. Really, as one who has had the disadvantage of listening to these recurring debates year after year, I think something might be done to adopt proper phraseology in describing the duties of certain people. But I rise for the purpose of eliciting information with respect to a series of items which have cropped up again this year in connection with the Royal Palaces. I observe an item relating to sanitary work. Year after year I have been trying to get other medical men in this House to give proper attention to this subject with the view of effecting some useful economy. Each year we have this item of sanitary works. The Royal Mews, Pimlico, sanitary works, £500; White Lodge, Richmond Park, £250; St. James's Palace, not in the occupation of Her Majesty, £500; Kensington Palace, £755; Kew Palace and buildings on Kew Green, £475. For "works and alterations of a minor character"—it does not say whether these are sanitary or not—there is a sum £500. I should not so much object to this expenditure if it were brought on one year, but we have it coming up year after year, and I think it is throwing away money not by the hundreds, but by the thousands, and we have this wasteful extravagance when, week after week and month after month, there are poor starving wretches coming into this City. The hon. Member for Peterborough was right in insisting that there should be satisfactory tenders for this work; and we know that if, under a system of tenders for the work, you had this constantly recurring expenditure, you would have someone whom you could hold responsible. I really press the right hon. Gentleman whether this is not a matter to which some remedy could be applied? I admit that these old Palaces require to have adapted to them from time to time recent sanitary improvements, but I certainly think that should not involve the necessity of a large annual charge. A good deal of money has been spent on Pimlico Mews, a place for the housing not of men, but of horses. Further, some of these Palaces are not occupied by Her Majesty, but by a number of pensioners. And this I would say, that when you are incurring this expenditure, you certainly ought to enter into some good and satisfactory contract. I certainly should not think I was doing my duty if I did not rise to obtain some explanation of this expenditure. Why have these alterations been made? Because of disease or infection, or merely in consequence of speculative opinions offered by advisers? I should like to know what reasons the right hon. Gentleman has to advance in connection with these matters.

(9.55.) MR. DILLWYN (Swansea): There is one point I should like some special information upon. What is the use of Kew Palace? Is it used by pensioners, servants, or caretakers? I think we ought to have a specific answer upon that point before we are called upon to spend more money on an old, useless, and rotten Palace.

*(9.56.) MR. PLUNKET: I hope the hon. Member for Fermanagh will not think me unreasonable if I now interpose between him and the House in order to reply to the questions which have been addressed to me. An hour has already been spent in discussing this particular item, and the Committee do not appear to be getting much "forrarder." Underlying the whole of the questions which have been put to me is the assumption that the Palaces we maintain ought to be only personally in the occupation of Her Majesty. Now, when this question came up last year I explained the whole case. The fact of the matter is that all these Royal Palaces and houses for which we ask a vote to be taken in this House were formerly provided for out of the Civil List. What happened? The view taken at the commencement of the reign of William IV. was this: that it would be better, in future, that these Palaces should not be provided for out of the Civil List, but should be borne by the Votes of Parliament. And the way that came about was because a very strong and influential Committee which sat to consider this very question of the Civil List at the beginning of the reign of William IV. recommended that a great number of other expenses which had fallen under the Civil List should be transferred to, and undertaken by, the Votes of Parliament. That recommendation was made in 1831. And, accordingly, these Royal Palaces were placed under the Surveyor General in 1831 in consideration of the reduction of the Civil List from £1,200,000 to £500,000, or more than one-half. That method of dealing with these charges was reconsidered at the commencement of the present reign; and the Committee on the Civil Lists then, as always appointed on the accession of a new Monarch, reported strongly in favour of continuing the arrangement of 1831. They said that the change had worked extremely well and economically. The Report of the Committee of 1831 contains a schedule setting out the charges which had been formerly borne by the Civil List, and which were to be transferred to Parliament under the arrangement I have described; and amongst the charges there set out are the expenses of the Office of Works in regard to all these Palaces. Parliament, in fact, undertook to provide for the maintenance and repair of all these Palaces.

*MR. MORTON: Does that apply to fires, fuel, and lighting?

*MR. PLUNKET: Yes, Sir, all that. Everything for the up-keep of the Palaces. I hope, under the circumstances, hon. Members will not expect me to go through all the cases to which allusion has been made. There are two cases, however, which I must deal with, as a certain amount of misapprehension seems to prevail with regard to them. One was mentioned by the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and with regard to that I am specially anxious that this misapprehension should not prevail. The hon. Member referred to the Palace at Kew. It is the duty of the Office of Works under the arrangement I have mentioned to keep up not only that Palace, but also Cambridge Cottage, which is in the occupation of the Duke of Cambridge, and Church House.

MR. LABOUCHERE: "Church" House?

*MR. PLUNKET: Yes; that is merely the name of the place. It is not attached to a Church. The item for sanitary improvements, to which attention has been called, is connected with these buildings, and not the empty Palace. The Local Authorities of Kew have initiated a new system of drainage there, and, as a result, it has been found necessary to undertake these works. As to the alterations at St. James's Palace, they have become necessary owing to the decease of the Duchess of Cambridge, who was the last occupant of the Palace, and the necessity for putting the building into a condition to receive a new occupant. That new occupant will be Prince Albert Victor. I wish it to be understood, however, that the expense which has been incurred in preparing the Palace for Prince Albert Victor is no more than would have been necessary if the new occupant had been anyone else. There must be considerable additional outlay on alterations owing to the circumstances that the son of the Prince of Wales is about to occupy the Palace; but all this additional outlay will be borne by the Prince of Wales. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) has complained of a matter to which one or two other Members have adverted, namely, the item for fuel. They say, "Why do you not make these personages pay for their own fuel?" and one hon. Member even went so far as to say that Her Majesty should be required to pay for fuel out of the Privy Purse. Well, as a matter of fact, Her Majesty and the other personages in question do pay for the fuel they use out of their private means. The items charged in the estimate for fuel are simply in relation to coal used for heating apparatus, and similar purposes, in the public parts of the Palaces. Then the hon. Member for Mid Cork asked me about sanitary repairs in connection with the Royal Mews.

DR. TANNER: I did not refer to the Royal Mews at Pimlico alone. I referred to a long list of places where sanitary repairs had been made.

*MR. PLUNKET: I understood that. I would point out that the Royal Mews is on the schedule I have referred to. There is permanent accommodation there for 230 persons, besides a large number of horses; and the works carried on there have been such as have been rendered necessary by sanitary considerations. The outlay was not one which it was possible to reduce. Every one of the sanitary works—which are now going on, and which I hope will soon be completed—have been undertaken with great reluctance by myself, and still more reluctantly acceded to by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. We only undertook them because they were absolutely necessary. I hope the Committee will think that I have given sufficient answer to the questions addressed to me.

(10.15.) Mr. LABOUCHERE: I would draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that when we entered into the arrangement at the commencement of the reign of Her Majesty no sort of arrangement was made to maintain these Palaces. What we did was to relieve Her Majesty altogether of the obligation of maintaining them; and, if that had not been the case, why should it be necessary to submit the Vote to Parliament and to ask hon. Members from year to year to sanction these items? It is absurd to suppose that we are under an obligation to the Sovereign to maintain houses which are absolutely unnecessary. As to the £1,700 charged for Church House and Cambridge Cottage, the right hon. Gentleman says the outlay was necessary, as new drainage works were being carried out by the Local Authorities; but I have had quite recent experience of connecting houses with drainage systems and am in a position to say that the expense in the case of a single house should not exceed £10 or £20. But we have heard of these drainage charges before from the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors. I know my old friend the drains. The Government are always getting houses connected with them at enormous expense. As to the charge of £152 for heating this deserted Palace at Kew, this amount represents 140 tons of coal, which would never have been used in one house. As a matter of fact, this money is absorbed by a number of sponging drones. They get something, in all probability, out of these sanitary works also; and I protest altogether against such payments and against keeping up these unnecessary establishments.

Mr. Plunket

(10.20.) Mr. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): The right hon. Gentleman asks the Committee to believe that the Crown would not recommend this expenditure if it were not absolutely necessary, and he also spoke of the reluctance of the Treasury to authorise such expenditure. I am sure there is no Member here who would for a moment insinuate that the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works or the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury have authorised the expenditure of this large sum, knowing that it was unnecessary. What we complain of is that Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench are themselves duped and hoodwinked by others. I do not suppose they have gone over all these Palaces to see what was necessary to be done. We all know that there are no people more likely to bring about a job than builders and contractors; and when we find that year after year large sums of money are asked for putting various buildings into a sanitary condition, and that notwithstanding such expenditure they never seem to be in a sanitary condition, I think we have legitimate cause for complaint. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) gave us an interesting account of how the maintenance of these Palaces came to be thrown on the country. No doubt all he said was true, but it did not at all go to prove that it is either necessary or advantageous that thousands of pounds should be spent every year in maintaining Palaces in which nobody lives. I believe the Queen does sometimes go to Buckingham Palace; but she never goes to Hampton Court, or Kew, or St. James's Palace, and there are a variety of other buildings of the kind to which the members of the Royal Family never go. I say it is in the interest of the Royal Family that expenditure of this kind should not be allowed. There is, undoubtedly, a strong feeling throughout the country that it is monstrous for Parliament to be called on year after year to spend £36,000 in maintaining buildings which absolutely serve no purpose at all. Only the other day an appeal was made to the generosity of the country to provide money for the equipment of the Volunteers. I am not very much in favour of warlike preparations of any kind myself, but I say that if you are to have Volunteers they ought to be effectively equipped. Why cannot the large sums of money which are wasted on the maintenance of uninhabited Palaces be spent on the equipment of the Volunteer Force, and in helping to provide better houses for the unfortunate poor people of this City? When one walks through the streets of this town, even under the very shadow of the walls of this House, and finds them filled with unfortunate wretches who are half starved and at the last stage of misery, it does seem a monstrous thing that money should be squandered in this way. Nobody on these Benches objects to spending what is necessary and proper in maintaining Palaces for the Queen, but we do object to spending money on houses which are never used at all. We believe that the Government Officials are humbugged by contractors. Are there no means by which a satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at as to whether this expenditure is necessary or not? I am certain that if an investigation could be made, it would be found that a great part of the expenditure is unnecessary.

*MR. MORTON: I am sorry to detain the Committee; but I do not thoroughly understand this Vote, and the right hon. Gentleman has left several of my questions unanswered. One of them related to the Estimate of £1,165 for furniture, another to repairs at Holyrood Palace, and another to public tendering. I am glad to hear that these buildings belong to the nation, because, when we get a more democratic Parliament, we shall know what to do with them, and that with very little trouble. The right hon. Gentleman has said that one of the houses at Kew is occupied by the Duke of Cambridge. I object to public money being provided to keep up a cottage for the Duke of Cambridge. His Royal Highness receives a large allowance from this House, and a large salary, and he is the last person in the United Kingdom who ought to call on the House of Commons for money, for a house, furniture, fuel, or anything of the sort.

(10.32.) MR. PICTON: I really must press for an answer to some questions I asked the right hon. Gentleman. Surely it is of some consequence to the Committee to know why the expenditure on the Palaces in the present occupation of Her Majesty has not increased, whilst that upon Palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty has increased. Again, I want to know why it is that the cost of keeping up Kew Palace is precisely double—£1,420 instead of £710? I admit it is very humiliating to have to discuss these matters in a Committee of the whole House, but the right hon. Gentleman ought to remember that the annoyance arises from an increasing discord between the feeling of the age and the customs manifested in these Estimates. The feeling is more for spending money in public needs and not on old-fashioned institutions which do no good to anyone. Public feeling has not shown any tendency to object to reasonable expenditure for the comfort, and state, and splendour of the Court. What public feeling does object to is spending money on old buildings that are of no good to anyone in the world. I really think if hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite knew the true interests of the institution which they always boast of defending, they would offer some proper explanation of this expenditure.

*(10.37.) MR. PLUNKET: I really think we ought to have some regard to the proportion of things and for the time of the House. Hon. Members opposite have occupied an hour and a half of public time in discussing such questions as whether it is necessary to have ratcatchers and turncocks at the Royal Palaces. I am anxious to afford every information of an important character that is asked for, but it is too much to occupy the time of the Committee for so long upon subjects of trifling importance. The expenditure on Palaces has nothing whatever to do with whether or not the Palaces are in the occupation of Her Majesty. The hon. Member for Peterborough asks for information as to the expenditure on furniture. £700 has been expended for furniture for St. James's Palace, which is used for public purposes, and £300 in improving the entrance to the Picture Gallery at Hampton Court, in order to make it more commodious, and, therefore, more adapted for the enjoyment of the people who visited the gallery. Thus £1,000 is at once accounted for.

*(10.40.) MR. CREMER: I hope the hon. Member for Northampton will press his Motion to a Division, not because we wish to waste the time of the House in discussing questions of ratcatchers or the other trifling matters to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, but because we are anxious to register our votes, in the name of the people who have to pay, against the expenditure of £36,000 for the maintenance of seven residences for the very few people who inhabit them. It was my painful duty early one summer's morning not many years ago to walk through St. James's Park, and I counted on and around seats within 300 yards of Buckingham Palace 27 poor creatures huddled together trying to keep themselves warm in the morning air. Each of them looked as if they were on the verge of starvation. A policeman came along and roused them from their miserable slumbers. A more wretched spectacle I never saw! As I stood and looked at these poor creatures and then at that enormous building—Buckingham Palace—in which no one save the hangers-on had resided for five months at the time I witnessed that spectacle, I asked myself, and the people who have to pay this money ask themselves, whether this is a specimen of the civilisation of which we boast in the 19th century. It is not necessary, however dignified and exalted the occupant of the Throne may be, that he or she should have seven residences. It is to protest against this waste of public money and against the glaring anomaly to which I have just made allusion that I shall follow the hon. Member for Northampton into the Lobby. There is just one question I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, and which he has, I am sure, not purposely evaded. It was the question I addressed to him earlier in the sitting. It is why the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presides with so much dignity, and I believe in the main usefulness, does not think it worth his while to issue public tenders for furniture? It is well to say that any respectable firm can, by making application, get its name put on the list; but I have not yet been able to learn that firms, who may get put on the list, ever know when furniture is required in any Government office. If they do not know that, how is it possible they can tender? If there was a disposition to do so, it is very easy for the Department to issue through the public Press tenders indicating that a certain quantity of furniture is required by a given date, and that the Government are open to receive tenders. Then there is an item of £4,325 for repairs. Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say whether those repairs and alterations are done by contract—whether tenders are invited for the work, or whether the work is confined to a few firms who are thus able to arrange matters amongst themselves? It is quite an understood thing that privileged firms do occasionally enter into arrangements, and that, in consequence, the public suffer. A system of open tender would put an end to this sort of thing.

Mr. Plunket

(10.45.) DR. TANNER: I merely rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give his attention to the one point which I raised earlier in the evening, and that is as to the sanitary works at the Royal Mews, Kensington Palace. Were the works undertaken under medical advice? Then in the matter of insurance. Some of the Palaces are insured and others are not. What is the reason of this?

(10.47.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I cannot but think that this subject has been entirely exhausted. I have endeavoured to do right by sitting out the discussion, and I think that every phase of the Vote has been fully discussed. I hope the hon. Member for Northampton, with whom many of us agree in many points, will not put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

*(10.49.) MR. PLUNKET: The sanitary works were, in many instances, rendered necessary by medical reports. The drains were in the worst possible condition, and money was absolutely required to be spent. As to insurance, my impression is that the persons occupying the houses pay the insurance, but I will make further inquiries on the point.

*MR. CREMER: I have put two questions of considerable importance to the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. PLUNKET: I have answered them twice already. As regards furniture, I have said we are willing to put any respectable firm on the list who choose to apply; and as to tenders we do invite tenders where the work to be done is sufficiently great as to make it wise to do so. Many of the works are extremely small, and they are executed by contractors we specially employ.

(10.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 159.—(Div. List, No. 40.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £78,775, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

*(11.5.) Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I rise to move the reduction of this Vote by £701 in respect to the maintenance of Hampton Court Park. This Motion is a hardy annual, but I hope that this is the last year in which it will be necessary to bring it forward. The argument in favour of the proposition which I am about to submit to the Committee is so strong that if it were not for one's experience upon other matters, it would be surprising that it should have been necessary to reiterate it so frequently to the Committee. Hampton Court Park comprises an area equal to that of Kensington Gardens and Hyde Park combined; it is in the midst of rural scenery; it is public property, and yet from this public property the public are absolutely excluded, the enjoyment of it being reserved for deer and horses, and some 90 favoured families in the neighbourhood who pay a guinea a year for the privilege of possessing a key. This matter was very strongly pressed upon the attention of the right hon. Gentleman last year in Committee, and he then said that he had not had that amount of public pressure brought to bear upon him to enable him to overrule the natural reluctance of the Treasury to add to the expenses of the Park. Now, if he would only specify the precise character and degree of the pressure to which he would succumb, I should be glad to take my share in the application of the necessary stimulant. But seriously I do think that since he spoke in March last, he has had brought before him, in a manner it is impossible to dispute, strong evidence of the existence of a large body of public opinion in favour of throwing open the Park to the public. I have had sent to me a copy of a local newspaper suggesting that this matter should be brought forward and strongly urged again this year, and from the tone of the leaders I gather that this newspaper is of a distinctly Conservative complexion. In this paper I find an account of a deputation which in August last waited upon the right hon. Gentleman and urged him to consent to the opening of the Park to the public, and this deputation certainly carried with it a considerable amount of public weight. It included the Mayor of Kingston and representatives of other Local Bodies in the neighbourhood, and they suggested that the public should merely have permission to cross the Park along the footpaths which already exist; and that, in fact, the privilege which is now monopolised by a few favoured residents should be shared by the public at large. The right hon. Gentlemen has always strongly insisted upon the expense that would be involved; but I see that the responsible members of this deputation assured him that, so far as one item of expense was concerned, he need be under no anxiety, as they would guarantee on the part of the locality the expense of four self-acting gates giving access to the Park. The right hon. Gentleman has had, then, some of the pressure he last year said was wanting, so one ground of objection is removed. The other day he was asked a question as to some changes made in the administration of the Park, and I understand he told us that the deer hitherto maintained there were about to be replaced by horses or foals—and, as an hon. Member suggests, cattle—and we were also told that grazing would be let to the Master of the Horse at a net gain to the Exchequer of £600 a year. Now, whether it is £100 or £600, I think the suggestion of a net gain to the Exchequer as the result of the operation is rather calculated to raise a smile, because surely the nominal transfer of the amount from one public official to another—from the Master of the Horse to the First Commissioner of Works—can hardly be regarded as a real source of public revenue. This consideration, I think, may be omitted. As I understand, the demand put forward by the people resident in the locality, all they desire is to be permitted to cross the Park, and therefore if their right, as I shall put it, can be conceded, and at the same time the grazing can be let to the Master of the Horse, well and good; but if it becomes a question whether the enjoyment of the Park by the public, or by the horses and cattle, is to be first considered, I, for one, maintain that the interest of the public ought to have the first place. This is a public Park; it is public property; and it is surely little short of scandalous that it should practically be only available to some 90 favoured families. It is a matter which year after year has been pressed upon the First Commissioners and it is clearly a concession, if you choose to call it a concession, which must eventually come. I cannot but think the right hon. Gentleman would be well advised to make the concession at once with a good grace. For these reasons, which are not new, which I regret to say it has been necessary to urge year after year, I beg to emphasise my protest by moving the reduction of the Vote by £701.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That a reduced sum of £78,074 be granted."

*(11.15.) MR. PLUNKET: The grounds upon which the hon. Member brings forward his Motion this year are somewhat different from those on which it was formerly brought forward. Hitherto it has been considered as a grievance which ought to be redressed that, whereas the public paid for the maintenance of Hampton Court Home Park, they were not admitted to the enjoyment of it. Well, I need not traverse that argument, because, as I will explain, that state of affairs no longer exists. But I think there is, generally, some misapprehension as to the real state of the case. It is generally supposed that this has been, at some time or other, a Park open to the general public; but, that the public have been excluded from a right they formerly enjoyed. That is a misapprehension altogether. The Park has never at any time been thrown open to the public; it has always been reserved for the stud of half-bred horses belonging to Her Majesty; and there is a stud house there which we are obliged to maintain, which we cannot legally dispose of or destroy. The question presents itself, whether the character of the Park is or is not to be changed: whether, apart from any grievance, it is a Park that should be thrown open to the public. It must, I think, be admitted that in this particular place the exclusion of the public from the Park is not, at the worst, such a serious deprivation, as it might be in another place, for the public have at hand the grounds and gardens of Hampton Court Palace and Bushey Park on the other side of the road. The hon. Member has said that a few favoured individuals are admitted to the enjoyment of the Park; but I believe the only persons are those resident in Hampton Court Palace, and a few others, who pay a guinea a year for a key of admission. Then the hon. Gentleman has referred to my observation on a former occasion, when I said that no great pressure had been put upon the Government to induce them to make the change, and he has mentioned a deputation which did me the honour of waiting upon me last autumn. Well, the deputation was one from the immediate neighbourhood of Hampton Court Palace, from Kingston and adjoining places, and they certainly stated, with great propriety from their point of view, a strong desire that the Park should be thrown open. But then it must be remembered that, if thrown open at all, it must be in obedience to the demand of the public generally; because if it is no longer used for the purposes to which it is at present devoted, it must be maintained entirely at the public expense. It is quite true that up to the present time the public have been saddled with such maintenance; but by the arrangement I have mentioned, by the abolition of the herd of deer which were the source of some expense to the nation, this item will disappear from the Estimates, an item of £150 a year, and other small sums, making, I think, about £200. Not only that, but in consideration of the fact that there will no longer be deer there, there will be an increased rental for grazing of horses of about £500 or £600, so that we shall now actually have a small profit on the Park. It must further be said that the expenses the deputation said they were willing to undertake if the Park were thrown open is but a small part of the expenses that would be incurred. It would be necessary if the public were permitted full enjoyment of the Park that additional expense should be undertaken for footpaths and perhaps roads and for management and police. Under all the circumstances, the Government have come to the conclusion that it would be better to keep the Park in its present condition, but that the public should no longer be called upon to provide for the maintenance, and that the item should disappear from the Estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill

(11.22.) DR. TANNER: The right hon. Gentleman will remember that a question was put to him in reference to the grazing. I should like to ask what amount will be realised from the lettings, and will they include grazings for cattle as well as horses? I should also like to know how the income will be expended; whether it will go to the relief of those who have hitherto borne the cost of maintenance?

*(11.24.) MR. PLUNKET: The grazing will be mainly for the purpose of the stud establishment. I am not aware how far the Master of the Horse may think it desirable to include the grazing of cattle. As to the money derived from the letting that goes into the Exchequer as a set-off against expenses in a general way.

(11.25.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 67; Noes 142.—(Div. List, No. 41.)

Original Question again proposed.

(11.35.) MR. PICTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman about certain enclosures in Regent's Park which have been made during the past year. I do not say that they are not justifiable, because, probably, they have been made in order to allow the grass which has been destroyed by excessive traffic to grow again; but I want to know if, when the land is again covered with grass, the enclosures will be thrown open for the perambulation of the public? Otherwise, the enjoyable area of the Park will be considerably reduced.

(11.36.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): What are the present arrangements with regard to games being played in the Royal Parks—games such as lawn tennis, and cricket, and football? Can not more facilities be given for the people to indulge in these games in the Parks? Surely a portion of Hyde Park might be set aside for that purpose. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give the Committee some information on the subject.

*(11.38.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): A portion of the land at Kew Gardens has been railed off, and the public thereby excluded from it. I should like to know why, and I should also like to know what is the cost to the British taxpayer of keeping in repair the building which stands within the enclosure, and which is said to have formerly been a Royal residence?

(11.39.) MR. LABOUCHERE: How many houses are there at the disposal of the Crown in Kew Gardens? Does the present Director live in one?

MR. PLUNKET: Yes.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The other day I asked a question as to the widening of Knightsbridge Road, for which purpose a portion of the Park is to be used. No doubt it will be a considerable advantage to the public. But some years ago, when Mr. Ayrton brought in a Bill with a similar object, it was thrown out by the House. Now, while I do not object to the improvement being carried out, I do think it is doubtful whether the land should be taken without first passing a Bill through the House for the purpose; because if you can give a small portion of the Park away without the assent of Parliament you can equally well give away a large part of it. Would it not be better for the right hon. Gentleman to bring in a Bill order to carry out this useful scheme?

*(11.42.) MR. PLUNKET: I hope hon. Members will excuse me if I only make a brief reply. With regard to what has been called an enclosure in Regent's Park, it consists merely of palings which anyone can step across; the fact of the matter being that the grass has been completely worn away. If hereafter it can be done I shall be glad to have the palings removed; but I cannot give an undertaking until I see how the grass turns out. With regard to the question of games in St. James's Park and the Green Park, it is obviously impossible to entertain the idea. In Regent's Park a considerable amount of ground is devoted to this purpose, and I am afraid that the Government cannot go beyond what has been done there. The question with regard to Hyde Park has been considered again and again; but, with the best wishes to provide the public with ground for games, the conclusion I have come to is that, considering the immense amount of traffic, the public meetings, and the reviews of troops, we cannot provide space for cricket or football. I regret that I cannot give an answer with regard to the enclosed space in Kew Gardens; but if the hon. Member will put down a question I will endeavour to get the necessary information. With regard to the question referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton, it is true that Mr. Ayrton brought in a Bill when he made what was in some respects a somewhat similar proposal, but in other respects the cases were entirely different. In the former case the proposal was to take a considerable amount of ground, and a very considerable advantage would have resulted to private individuals; in the latter case only a very small amount of the Park was required for what would, I think, be a public improvement. Under these circumstances, I was prepared to entertain the proposals of the Vestry—they seem, however, to have dropped the matter, I believe, because the London County Council refused to join them in the expense of making the desired changes.

*(11.47.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I am quite a novice in Supply, and therefore I will venture to ask a few questions with regard to the Vote under consideration, but I will not detain the House long. Now, I notice there is a item of £1,140 for the department of the Ranger at Richmond Park, and of this there are no less than £669 charged for the salaries of the Ranger himself, a Deputy Ranger, of a superintendent under the Ranger, and of an assistant superintendent under the Ranger, as well as for a bailiff of the Royal Parks. I move to reduce the Vote by £669, and I want to know what are the duties of these officials. What does the Ranger do? I have never seen any ranging going on, although I lived near one of the Parks at one time.

Mr. Plunket

*(11.53.) MR. PLUNKET: The bailiff has the management of all the Royal Parks. The Ranger and his assistants have also considerable responsibilities. Amongst others, they have the charge of the herds of deer, and of the gate lodges and lodge-keepers.

*(11.54.) MR. MORTON: Who is the Head Ranger? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us that?

*MR. PLUNKET: The Duke of Cambridge.

*(11.55.) MR. MORTON: I want a little more information as to the expenditure on these Parks, and I hope that the Government will not object to give it. There is a sum of £142 for incidental expenses. What is that for? I find, further, that the expenses for St. James's, Green Park, and Hyde Park are lumped together, and that the items are not set out separately and in sufficient detail to enable hon. Members to check or compare them. Further than that, I find there is an allowance to the Superintendent under the Ranger of £96 in lieu of fees. I object to the fee system altogether. I think we are entitled to further details of this item. Another official gets £20 in lieu of fees. What is the meaning of that? I should like to point out that the Head Ranger, the Deputy Ranger, and the Superintendent under the Ranger are military officers.

(11.58.) DR. TANNER: My hon. Friends around me have good cause to complain that the new arrangement of the Estimates by the Government has increased the difficulty of dealing with these questions, and I think we have just cause of complaint on this head. I know hon. Gentlemen opposite do not complain because they are not allowed to speak on the Estimates. Now, I want to know something about the chairs which are stacked in a great heap near Kensington Park. What is done with the money realised by letting out these chairs? Is it applied to keeping them in repair? As to games being played in the parks, I noticed when I was at Darlington the other day that, in the small park there, boys were playing at football. Surely, then, a portion of such a huge park as Hyde Park should be devoted to such a purpose.

Question put, and agreed to.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee to sit again to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SOUTH INDIAN RAILWAY PURCHASE BILL.—(No. 195.)

Considered in Committee; Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 200.)

Order for Committee read.

SIR R. N. FOWLER: I object.

*MR. HOWELL: There are several Amendments on the Paper which have been agreed to, and the House must go into Committee to dispose of these, and then report Progress.

MR. PARKER SMITH: I would ask the hon. Gentleman whether he agrees to the other Amendments on the Paper?

*MR. HOWELL: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade can state whether arrangements have been made.

*SIR M. H. BEACH: I would ask the hon. Member to withdraw his objection for the present, and allow the Amendments agreed upon to be taken, and the remaining Amendments can be discussed at a later stage.

SIR R. N. FOWLER: I withdraw my objection, Sir; but hon. Members opposite will remember that a good many Bills emanating from this side are objected to, and they cannot be surprised if we object to their Bills in return.

Bill considered in Committee, and Amendments made; Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) RATING BILL. (No. 149.) COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(12.13.) MR. SEXTON: I have no objection to the principle of this Bill, but it requires certain Amendments.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): There are Amendments on the Paper to meet the case.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member's Amendments are not sufficient.

Committee deferred till Monday, 28th April.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS (AMENDMENT) BILL. (No. 132.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.14.) MR. H. W. LAWSON: We do not object to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sussex, if he will allow the Bill to be read a second time.

*MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I object.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his objection.

*MR. M'LAREN: There are two Scotch Education Motions down for discussion, and if we are to discuss these Bills at any length we will not reach those Motions. But I will not press my objection.

Second Reading deferred till Monday, 14th April.

COMMISSIONERS FOR OATHS ACT (1889) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 15.)

Read a second time, and committed for Friday, 18th April.

M O T I O N .

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT (SCOTLAND) (REDHYTHE BURSARIES, &c., FORDYCE).

(12.16.) SIR C. DALRYMPLE (Ipswich): I have to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Scotland) Commissioners for the management of the Endowments in the County of Banff, known as the Redhythe

Bursaries, George Smith's Bounty, and the Stuart Mortification, which consists of and is contained in the following words of Section 26 of the said Scheme (that is to say), 'or with the consent of the Governors at any School where higher instruction is efficiently given which the bursar could attend while living with parents or relatives.'

In making this Motion I have to state that I have no connection with the locality to which the scheme refers, and have only taken it up on public grounds, with a view of carrying out what was the original view of the Scotch Education Department before that Department was influenced by certain representations made by those who are interested in the locality. The Motion proposes to restore the scheme to the form in which it stood in 1888. There is no question as to the benefit conferred by these bursaries, which were formerly bestowed by patronage, being now extended to the whole county. They are to be open under the scheme to the whole county for competition by students in Banffshire, the one point at issue being whether the parish of Fordyce, which is the original locality of the scheme, should be deprived of the advantage of having the bursars educated there. The Motion I propose is only a small modification of the scheme, and the effect of the deletion of the words objected to will be that while the benefits of the bursaries are to be extended to the whole county the advantages of education shall not be withdrawn from the parish of Fordyce.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Scotland) Commissioners for the management of the Endowments in the County of Banff, known as the Redhythe Bursaries, George Smith's Bounty and the Stuart Mortification, which consists of and is contained in the following words of Section 26 of the said Scheme (that is to say), 'or with the consent of the Governors at any school where higher instruction is efficiently given which the bursar could attend while living with parents or relatives.'"—(Sir Charles Dalrymple.)

*(12.26.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I cannot but acknowledge the moderation with which the hon. Baronet has introduced this Motion. He has refrained from introducing a Motion which would involve the rejection of the scheme as a whole, and has merely dealt with one point which has already caused a good deal of discussion in the North. There has been a difference of opinion as to whether the bursars under this scheme should be required to attend school at Fordyce. It appeared to the Commissioners that the competition for the bursaries ought to be thrown open to boys from all parts of the county. It was, therefore, considered reasonable that the Governors should be empowered to dispense with the condition of the bursars all going to Fordyce for their education. On that point there was some difference of opinion; but the Commissioners thought the preponderance of argument was in favour of this extension of power to the Governing Body.

(12.28.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I would ask the House to pause before assenting to the proposal of the hon. Baronet. It is worthy of attention that the local opinion not only in the county but in the burghs is not entirely favourable to this suggestion of extended competition. We know that the Commissioners have made considerable inquiry in the locality, and have the advantage of much information which hon. Members have not been in a position to obtain. Moreover, hon. Members for the county and burghs connected with the scheme, acting on representations made by their constituents, are favourable to the scheme. I think, therefore, the House would do well to pause before overthrowing the conclusions at which the Commissioners have arrived.

(12.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 104; Noes 75.—(Div. List, No. 42.)

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold her consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Scotland) Commissioners for the management of the Endowments in the County of Banff, known as the Redhythe Bursaries, George Smith's Bounty, and the Stuart Modification, which consists of and is contained in the following words of Section 26 of the said Scheme (that is to say), "or with the consent of the Governors at any School where higher instruction is efficiently given which the bursar could attend while living with parents or relatives."

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

ACCIDENTS (FACTORIES, RAILWAYS, AND MINES.)

Address for—

"Return showing (i.) in the case of Factories and Workshops, the number of Accidents which were reported to the Inspectors in the year ended the 31st day of October 1889, under Section 31 of 'The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878,' as having happened to persons employed in Factories and Workshops under the Act, distinguishing between fatal and non-fatal Accidents, giving separately the numbers for Factories and Workshops and the nature of the various employments in which the Accidents occurred, and stating the numbers of the persons employed in all Factories; (ii.) in the case of Railways, the number of Servants of Railway Companies reported during the year ended the 31st day of December 1889, under Section 6 of 'The Regulation of Railways Act, 1871,' as having met with Accidents caused by the travelling of trains or the movement of vehicles used exclusively upon Railways, and also the number of Servants of Companies reported during the same period under the same section as having met with Accidents in which the movement of vehicles used exclusively upon Railways was not concerned, distinguishing between fatal and non-fatal Accidents, classifying as far as possible the occupations of the Servants of Companies killed and injured, and stating the number of the persons employed by such Companies; and (iii.) in the case of Mines, the number of Accidents in the year ended the 31st day of December 1889 to persons employed in Mines, under 35 and 36 Vic. c. 77, and 50 and 51 Vic., c. 58, of which notice has been received by the Inspectors under Sections 11 and 35 of those Acts respectively distinguishing between fatal and non-fatal Accidents, specifying the class of the Mines in which the Accidents occurred, and the number of persons employed in each class of Mines during the year."—(Sir William Plowden.)

ORPHAN HOSPITAL SCHEME, EDINBURGH.

*(12.35.) MR. W. McLAREN: I am sorry to have to detain the House at this hour; but unfortunately this is the last opportunity I shall have for bringing this scheme before the House, and it becomes law if not rejected before April 11th. The Government, or the majority of its Members, have already voted to-night in favour of altering another scheme of the Commissioners, and I sincerely trust that they will at least leave this an open question, and will not appoint their Whips to act as Tellers against my Motion. This is a matter of great importance to a large number of orphans in Edinburgh, and it is a subject on which the citizens of Edinburgh feel very deeply. It should not be called a hospital, the name is misleading; it is really an orphan home, and one of the best managed institutions in Edinburgh. It is not an old endowment absolutely; it is fully up to the requirements of the present time. It is true the original endowment dates from 150 years ago; but the endowment has gone on increasing, such satisfaction has the management given the people of Edinburgh, that for the last few years the capital has been largely increased by bequests and donations. I may say that in the attempt to upset the present management the Commissioners are opposing the wishes of donors still living who are perfectly satisfied with the present management. Since the Charter was granted in 1742 this has been a distinctly charitable and not an educational institution, in so far as charity and not education has been the standard for admittance; and it is one of the objections to the scheme of the Commissioners that under the new constitution it will become almost entirely an educational institution, the charitable element being almost eliminated. The existing management is conducted on the principle of providing destitute children with a home, giving them also instruction in reading, writing, arithmetic, and other subjects; but the destitution is a necessary element in the recipient of the charity. But under the new scheme it is provided that there shall be an educational examination. The capital value of the institution is £78,000, the building standing at something like £20,000; or I believe it is worth a good deal more now; it cost that amount to build many years ago. The Governors have found, on following out the career of the children, that not more than 1½ per cent. of the children taken care of in this institution have turned out badly in later life. I doubt if any institution can show such an extremely satisfactory result. The institution contains both boys and girls; it is not conducted on the monastic system, it is really like a well-managed home, with all the comforts of home and the training that home life gives a child.

The managers have circulated a statement in which they say the hospital was founded and has been extended solely on charity; it is unique in character; and the only qualification required is that a child is destitute, and therefore a proper object of charity, no inquiry being made into its state of knowledge. The 25th section of the new scheme upsets all this, and provides that the hospital itself shall be closed, and that children only shall be admitted to the foundation when he or she has passed an examination in the standard suitable to the age of the child. Such a qualification will be required from every child before any benefit is received; and when there is a greater number of candidates than there are vacancies, which is almost invariably the case, the managers on selection are to have due regard to the merit of examination. It is perfectly clear that this will throw open the endowment not to the class for which it was intended, but to the children of parents who, having been well to do, were able to give their children a better education, and these, of course, will secure the exhibitions. The desire and intention of the founder, and of all those donors who year by year have added to the endowment, would cease to be respected, the institution will cease to be charitable, and will become educational. There is no need under the Endowments Act that this should be so; the 16th section of that Act provides that in framing schemes the Commissioners, in making selection of those eligible for the benefit of an endowment, may provide for examination or in such other manner as they may determine. Besides, this is not primarily an educational endowment. Another great point of objection is the compulsory closing of the hospital. The whole Governing Body is to be swept away, and a new Governing Body appointed of 15 members, eight to be elected by contributors and seven by the representative bodies of Edinburgh—the School Board, the Town Council, the Medical Profession, the Legal Profession, and so on. This is a good enough constitution, no doubt; but it provides a new set of Governors under the new scheme, and there is no reason why a new set of Governors should not manage the hospital as they may think fit, to close it or to keep it open, but I object to the compulsory closing of the hospital in five years. The Town Council have petitioned against it, and so have 22,000 of the inhabitants of Edinburgh. A week ago the Governors held a meeting, and a resolution in favour of closing the hospital was only carried by the casting vote of the chairman. Therefore, I may say that half the Governors are in favour of keeping it open, and but for the accidental absence of Sir William Muir the vote would have been in favour of keeping the hospital open. The opinion of this gentleman is entitled to weight, and he has urged his views very strongly. We want to leave this matter optional, and I do not think the Government should object to that. I do not wish to detain the House unnecessarily; it was necessary to make this explanatory statement, and I hope I have been brief. My objection really lies at the root of the scheme, and therefore I propose to vary the terms of the Motion as I have given notice of them, and to ask the House to object to the whole scheme.

Mr. W. M'Laren

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from the Scheme for the administration of the Orphan Hospital (Edinburgh)."—(Mr. Walter M'Laren.)

* 12.45.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I do not desire to canvass the arguments addressed to the House by the hon. Member for Crewe. I do not doubt that the scheme of the Commissioners is one which would have conferred very large educational advantages on a deserving class of persons; but one cannot shut one's eyes to two facts—in the first place, that the scheme constitutes a very material departure from the existing organisation, and probably from the intentions of the founder of the charity; and, on the other hand, that that change has not commanded that general assent which alone would entitle it to absolute Parliamentary confidence. Looking to these facts, I do not propose on the part of the Government to offer any opposition to the Motion of the hon. Member. I rejoice that he has had the courage of his convictions, and has departed from a Motion which would have embarrassed the charity without pointing out a clear path for its further development. While the Government assent to the Motion, I desire to add that that implies no want of appreciation of the very carefully considered scheme of the Commissioners; but merely, on the whole, that there is a general conclusion arrived at that the existing benefits are greater than those proposed to be conferred by the Commissioners.

(12.48.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I think the House has reason to complain that at the last moment the hon. Member for Crewe has withdrawn his Motion to amend the scheme, and has moved its rejection. I regret also that the Government are a consenting party to this, if they did not even prompt the change.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I first learned that the hon. Gentleman intended to alter his Motion about an hour ago from the hon. Member himself.

MR. C. S. PARKER: I apologise for having supposed, if it be not so, that the move originated on the other side of the House. The alacrity with which the right hon. Gentleman welcomed it suggested that idea. But the chief point to which I ask attention is this: the Lord Advocate represents the Education Department, by whom the Commissioners' proposals have been responsibly considered and approved. Yet, on the three last occasions when their schemes have been attacked he has lent his aid to their opponents—twice silently, without a word of explanation, and now this third time not upon the merits, but simply on the ground that in Edinburgh popular opinion is divided. It is true the Town Council and others have petitioned against the scheme as it stands. But only a few years ago, when a Commission, on which I had the honour to serve, looked into the question, public opinion in Edinburgh, and generally in Scotland, ran strong against the system of keeping children together in hospitals, as against boarding them in separate homes; and the old Governing Body of the hospital, representing the subscribers, still support the proposed reform. The majority of them in favour of selling their building is small; but the feeling still prevails that even for orphans some kind of family life is preferable to collecting them within the walls of one large institution. The Governors also urge that, when they can educate the orphans free of cost in public schools, they are no longer justified in going to the expense of a separate teaching staff. I must add a word on the only other point raised by the Motion as entered on the Notice Paper, the mode of selection for admission. The scheme does not enforce competition, it only requires some examination suited to the children's age, and if they have been at school some "due regard" to their good conduct, regular attendance, and satisfactory progress there. The measure of this regard is left to the discretion of the Governors. The children must all be fatherless and "needful." And there is nothing to prevent avowed preference of those who have lost both parents, or who most require help. I think it reasonable and right that in choosing among the needy some preference should be given to the deserving. I cannot, therefore, vote against examination and due regard to proficiency and character. If the hon. Member would confine his Motion to leaving the Governors free to sell or keep their building as they may find best, I would support that. But he seems to have made other terms with his allies; and against entire rejection of the scheme, compelling the Governors to continue the hospital system, I must protest.

(12.50.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL: I wish to say, on behalf of the Commissioners, that they do not agree with the view that this Orphan Institution is not a Hospital. They consider that it has all the defects of the hospital system, inasmuch as a large number of children are kept there with very little intercourse with the outside world; and that the objections which were so forcibly urged against the hospital system by the Commission on Endowed Schools and Hospitals, which reported in 1875, apply to this institution. The recommendation of that Commission was that the children in ordinary hospitals should be boarded out in families, and that in the case of orphans for whom boarding out was not considered suitable, there should be cottage homes provided, but not with so large a number of residents as would interfere with the domestic character of the home. The Commission felt that this orphan hospital was not a home, and that what was desirable for these orphans was that they should be placed in cottage homes, in so far as that could be carried out. I wish to say so much in defence of the scheme of the Commissioners.

(12.53.) MR. HALDANE: I wish to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary position taken up by Her Majesty's Government. This is the third of these schemes which has been rejected by them. Only a few minutes ago we were discussing another scheme prepared by Commissioners acting under an Act of Parliament for which Her Majesty's present Government at all events are constructively responsible, and carrying out a policy which they have sanctioned, and the Lord Advocate, without a single word and without any warning, went into the other Lobby and threw overboard the scheme of the Commission. We are aware that the head of the Commission is a Conservative nobleman, who is not altogether popular in all sections of his Party; but I recognise him as a man of great ability, and a man for whose opinion I have the greatest respect, as I have also for that of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Campbell). But I do think we have cause to complain that the decision of Lord Balfour of Burleigh and of the hon. Gentleman should have been overthrown on the last occasion without any word or without any warning, and on this occasion by a more general statement, which, if it comes to anything at all, goes to impugn the principle which underlies the Act of Parliament. I do not know what occult influences have been at work with the Lord Advocate, or what outside pressure has been brought to bear upon him; but this I do know: that it is a very extraordinary circumstance that in this House the work of one of the best Commissions that has sat in Scotland for many years past should be treated as it has been treated by the Government.
Mr. J. A. Campbell

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from the Scheme for the administration of the Orphan Hospital (Edinburgh).

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

RIGHTS OF WAY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Buchanan, Bill to confer on County Councils in Scotland the power of maintaining and protecting Rights of Way, and otherwise to amend the Law relating to Rights of Way in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Asher, Mr. Donald Crawford, Mr. Shires Will, Mr. Munro Ferguson, Mr. Birrell, Mr. Esslemont, and Mr. Caldwell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 215.]

RIGHTS OF WAY (SCOTLAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Dalrymple, Bill to enable County Councils in Scotland on a report by the sheriff to sue actions of Right of Way, ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Dalrymple, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. McLagan, and Mr. Mark Stewart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 216.]

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) (NAMES OF LANDOWNERS.)

Return presented,—relative thereto [ordered 31st March; Mr. John Morley]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 115.]

EDUCATION (PRIMARY INSTRUCTION IN PARIS).

Return presented,—of Letter from Sir B. Samuelson, Baronet, M.P., concerning Public Primary Instruction in Paris [Address 31st March; Sir William Hart Dyke]; to lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 1st April, 1890.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

PARCEL POST.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will endeavour to rearrange the scale of charges for Parcel Post so that the maximum charge shall be one penny per pound after the first pound, with a minimum charge of 3d. for each parcel; and for what period has the present Parcel Post arrangement with the Railway Companies been concluded?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I should, of course, be very glad to arrange for any modification of the Parcel Post likely to be beneficial to the public and not injurious to the revenue. The tendency, however, of the hon. Member's proposal would be to increase the number of small parcels carried at scarcely remunerative rates, which, perhaps, he has not fully considered. The present Parcel Post arrangement with the Railway Companies has been concluded for 21 years from the 1st August, 1883.

POST CARDS FOR SOUTH AFRICAN CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a strong desire exists among those having business or other correspondence with the Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State, to be supplied with post-cards for those countries; whether these countries named are the only civilised ones with which there is no communication by post-card; and whether he has taken any steps to supply this want of the public?

MR. RAIKES: I have long recognised the convenience that would be afforded to the public by extending the post card system to the Cape of Good Hope, and have been engaged in negotiations with the Cape Post Office with the object of establishing this mode of communication. An arrangement on the subject has now been made, and as soon as a date has been fixed for commencing the system, I shall have the pleasure of announcing it to the public, in the usual manner. I shall endeavour to make similar arrangements as regards Natal and the other South African States.

VOL. CCCXLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MILITARY PENSIONS.

MR. SAMUEL HOARE (Norwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether James Marshall, late 23rd Regiment, was discharged from Netley Hospital on 22nd August, 1865, suffering from the effects of asthenia, on a pension of 7d. per diem; whether, owing to an error on the part of the medical officer in entering his illness as asthma instead of asthenia, James Marshall received no pension from 22nd August, 1867, until 29th June, 1886, when his pension was restored, with two years' back pay in addition; whether the said James Marshall is not entitled to 17 years' pension; and whether the circumstances of the case will be re-considered?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): James Marshall was discharged on August 22, 1865, on account of asthenia on a pension of 7d. a day for 18 months, which expired on June 11, 1867, when his case was considered, and the renewal of his pension refused. Nothing was heard of his case for 16 years; but in 1883 he again applied for a renewal of his temporary pension, which was refused. In 1886 he made a further appeal, and on re-consideration it was discovered that the medical officers had assumed that his discharge was on account of asthma. He was re-examined for asthenia, and was granted a pension for life, but without arrears. Several appeals have been received asking for arrears of pension for the 19 years from 1867 to 1886, and the utmost allowed under the Regulations, namely, two years', has been granted. During a portion of this time Marshall was in a lunatic asylum, so that had he been in receipt of a pension it would have been paid to the authorities for his support, and would not have benefited his family. Although, therefore, I cannot give him any further arrears of pension, I will consider whether we might not be justified in somewhat increasing his pension for the remainder of his life.

P

IRELAND—RAILWAY BETWEEN GALWAY AND CLIFDEN.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware of the circumstances under which the Grand Jury of Galway, at the Spring Assizes just held, made a presentment in favour of a railway between Galway and Clifden on either a broad or narrow gauge system upon a Report from the Commissioners of the Board of Works, Ireland, the Government to advance in the one case £244,600, and in the other case £219,000, the country guaranteeing only £1,000 in aid of such railway; whether he is aware of the Minute recorded by the Grand Jury of Galway, expressing its regret that the negotiations entered into between five of the members of the Grand Jury as a Committee and the Chairman and Directors of the Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland fell through; whether he is aware that the Grand Jury, in consequence of the advice of Mr. Barton, C.E., stated that they felt bound to pass a perfectly open presentment, but that they also wished to express their earnest desire that the promoters and the Government might come to some arrangement which would secure the maintenance and working of the railway by the Midland Great Western Railway Company; whether he is aware that the Chairman and Directors of the Midland Great Western Railway Company had expressed themselves unreservedly to the Grand Jury, that having regard to the defective mode in which the projected line had been laid, and notwithstanding the modifications suggested and allowed by Mr. Barton and embodied in the Commissioners' Report, that their company would never undertake the working and maintenance thereof; and whether Her Majesty's Government would, under the foregoing circumstances, direct an independent inquiry as to the projected undertakings for giving railway accommodation from Galway to Clifden, under the supervision of the Board of Trade, before payment of any public money is authorised to be made for the construction of railways in Galway?

Mr. E. Stanhope

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The facts are as stated in the first four paragraphs of the question. With regard to the suggestion made by my hon. Friend in the last paragraph, Her Majesty's Government do not see that any advantage would be derived through holding an additional inquiry, the former inquiries in the matter having been of the most exhaustive character.

RAILWAY FROM RATHMULLAN TO FALCARRAGH.

DR. FOX (King's Co., Tullamore): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether application has been made to the Lord Lieutenant to schedule under the Light Railways Act of 1889 a line of railway from Rathmullan to Falcarragh, via Milford, County Donegal, and whether it is the intention of the Government to do so; whether it differs from the route recommended by the Royal Commission in 1887; whether it would be the extension of any existing line; whether Rathmullan and Milford are in any sense congested districts; and whether he is aware that the Grand Jury of County Donegal, at last Assizes, condemned that portion of the line between Falcarragh and Milford?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that no such application has been made to the Lord Lieutenant.

THE ESTATE OF MR. H. B. O'SULLIVAN.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the Report of the professional valuer appointed by the Land Commissioners, as reported in Cork Herald, to inquire into the security offered by the holdings on the estate of Mr. H. B. O'Sullivan at Rahonna and Kilnamartyra, County Cork, for the repayment of the advance, from which it appears that the purchase money offered by the tenants was excessive, and that the combined interests of the tenants and landlord were not deemed by the valuer security for the money; whether it is a fact that the terms of purchase agreed upon by the tenants would have brought down the yearly payments to nearly 50 percent under the present rents; whether it is true that the rental in question was determined and enforced by the Receiver Department of the Chancery Court, and that many tenants were evicted by the Court in default of payment of rack rents; and whether it is his intention to take any notice of the Report of the professional valuer?

MR. MADDEN: I have not seen the newspaper statement referred to; but the Land Commissioners inform me that any such statement would be wholly unauthorised, inasmuch as the Reports of their Inspectors under the Purchase of Land Acts are confidential documents. It is a fact that the Commissioners, not being satisfied with the security, refused the applications referred to, and that the terms of the purchase would have brought down the yearly payments considerably. The Chief Receiver's Department inform me that the rental of the estate was not determined there, but was furnished to the Department in the ordinary way when the management of the estate was taken over, and that one tenant only has been actually evicted.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact, as stated in the second paragraph of the question, that the terms of purchase agreed upon by the tenants would have brought down the yearly payments to nearly 50 per cent. under the present rents?

MR. MADDEN: I have already stated that the rents would have been considerably brought down.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that these tenants have been obliged to pay, again and again, these excessive sums of money, and that many tenants have been evicted in default of the payment of rack-rents?

MR. MADDEN: One tenant only was evicted. I presume that the others paid the rents.

MR. McDERMOTT.

MR. THOMAS GILL (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what have been the costs incurred by the Crown in the various remands of Mr. McDermott, of Clanricarde, including the cost of transporting and escorting him on each occasion from the gaol to the locality in which the secret court before which he has been summoned has been held?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary authorities report that the expenses incurred in the matter in question amount to about £45.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This Gentleman has been 10 times remanded for refusing to give evidence in secret, and I wish to ask the Government whether during the recess they will not allow him to give evidence in open court in order that he may be able to protect himself against defamation?

MR. MADDEN: This is an inquiry under the Explosives Act of 1883. The answer given by Mr. McDermott has invariably been that he could give evidence, but that he refused to do so. In my opinion, it would be extremely undesirable in such a case to interfere with the discretionary powers of the Magistrates who are conducting the inquiry. The man does not state that he has no evidence to give, but that he will not give it, as the law requires him to give it.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not see that if he were to give evidence in secret he would be exposed to imputations hereafter?

MR. MADDEN: The Act of 1882 extends to every part of the United Kingdom, and the mode of conducting the inquiry must be left to the discretion of the Magistrates who conduct it.

THE CASE OF CAPTAIN RYE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. C. J. Harold, one of the Justices who were trying the case against Captain Rye, at Crookstown, County Cork, has been, and still is, employed by Captain Rye as clerk in connection with the lime-kilns, or agent; and, if so, whether an intimation will be conveyed to him not to take any further part in the case in which there are four other Magistrates adjudicating?

MR. MADDEN: The Lord Chancellor's Secretary informs me that it is understood that some years ago Mr. Harold was connected with Captain Rye in the management of some quarries, but that it is not known whether that connection still exists. Inquiries on this point are being made.

DR. TANNER: So much being admitted, will some pressure, in the interests of justice, be brought to bear on Mr. Harold, in order to prevent him from taking any further part in adjudicating upon the case of Captain Rye?

MR. MADDEN: I think that the interests of justice may be safely left in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, before whom the matter has come.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that the decision of the two Removable Magistrates has already been overridden by the local Justices, one of whom is, or has been, in Captain Rye's employment?

[No answer was returned.]

FOREIGN OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has seen the answer of the Decorators' Society to his statement in reference to the repair of furniture in the Foreign Office; and what steps he has taken to inquire into the truth of their allegations?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): I have forwarded the answer of the Decorators' Society referred to in the question to Messrs. Jenks and Wood for their observations. I have not yet had an answer, as the partner in the firm who dealt with the particular subject has not returned to London, but I have no doubt I shall soon have the answer.

EDINBURGH BOTANIC GARDENS.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that 10,000 persons visited the Botanic Gardens, Houses, and Museum, at Edinburgh, the first Sunday on which they were open to the public, and that since then they have been much used on that day; and if the conduct of the people is reported to have been orderly and satisfactory?

Dr. Tanner

*MR. PLUNKET: I am informed that the attendance at the Botanic Gardens in Edinburgh averaged about 10,000 on each Sunday when the weather was favourable during the first two months after the Gardens were open on Sundays, they have been much used since, principally by the artizan classes, and I believe that no complaint has been made of any misconduct on the part of the visitors.

THE YEOMANRY CAVALRY.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, and if so when, he intends to make a statement as to what part the Yeomanry Cavalry are to take in the second line of defence; whether their position will correspond to that of the Volunteer Infantry and Artillery; and, if not, can he explain the reason?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There are a good many difficulties in the way of assigning to the Yeomanry, with the same definiteness as in the case of the Volunteers, the exact position which they will have to fill on mobilisation, and I was unwilling to make any partial statement on the subject. But a scheme is being worked out which will fully recognise the value of the Yeomanry in the defence of the country, and I shall be glad to make it public as soon as it is finally settled.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): How soon will it be that we shall have this information?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I would rather not fix a date.

DR. TANNER: Can the right hon. Gentleman fix an approximate time?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No; there are a good many details involved.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have formally invited the attendance of delegates from Newfoundland to discuss the Fishery Question; and, if not, whether the Government will cable such an invitation to Newfoundland, in view of the great excitement in that Colony?

DR. TANNER: I have received a cablegram from Newfoundland upon this subject, and I think it would save both time and trouble to the House and the right hon. Gentleman if I tell him the effect of it.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not asking a question.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have formally and repeatedly invited the attendance of the Premier of Newfoundland to discuss this question, and have no doubt that he will come to England as soon as the state of Parliamentary business in the Colony permits. They do not think it desirable to telegraph anything further at present. They will, of course, be glad to receive other delegates also if the Colony so desires, but they do not think they should propose it. May I take this opportunity of correcting an error in a report which I have seen of my answer upon this subject yesterday? I am made to say that the modus vivendi with France had not received the assent of "Newfoundland in its original form." What I said was "in its final form," as is obvious from the context.

DR. TANNER: Has the consent of the Legislature of Newfoundland been obtained to the modus vivendi arranged between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France, in reference to the lobster canning industry on the west coast of Newfoundland; and has any attempt been made to obtain the consent of the Legislature before the fishing season opens?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have repeatedly answered the first part of the hon. Member's question, namely, that no despatch has yet been received from Newfoundland, giving the consent of the Legislature to a modus vivendi for arranging the difficulty. So far as the last question of the hon. Member is concerned it is surely one for the Government of Newfoundland.

THE SCOTCH SCHOOL BOARDS.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been directed to the effect of Section 29 of "The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889," upon the franchise for School Board purposes in Scotland; and whether, in the case of service franchise occupiers, the entries of annual value now for the first time required to be made in the Valuation Roll by Section 29 of the Act of 1889 do not satisfy the requirements of Schedule B of "The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872," so as to qualify as electors for School Board purposes all service franchise occupiers whose names are entered on the Valuation Roll as occupiers of lands and heritages of the annual value of not less than £4?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): In my opinion, the persons referred to in the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman are qualified as electors for School Board purposes. As the Valuation Roll is now made up their names are entered as inhabitant occupiers of lands and heritages of the annual value of not less than £4; and I do not think that the fact that they are described as "inhabitant occupiers," and not simply "occupiers," can be held to derogate from what is otherwise a clear qualification.

TUBERCULOSIS.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when it will be convenient for him and the President of the Local Government Board to receive the deputation upon the subject of tuberculosis in cattle?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In reply to the hon. Member, I may say that after communication with my right hon. Friend I have intimated to the gentlemen who desire to wait upon us that we shall be happy to receive them at the Board of Agriculture on Thursday, April 24, at half-past 1, if that day is quite convenient to them.

THE MORFA PIT.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the alleged extreme narrowness of the shaft in the Morfa Pit, as stated in the Daily Graphic recently; whether it is true that it would have been possible to rescue the horses now left to starve in No. 9 level of the said pit, had the shaft been of an ordinary width and the cage of sufficient size; and whether it would be possible to insert a special clause in the Mines Act rendering it illegal for horses to be used in pits wherein there are no means of saving them in cases of explosion?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No, Sir. My attention has not been called to the structure of the Morfa Pit shaft. Until I receive the Report of the Inspector and of the legal representative of the Home Office at the inquest, I am not in a position to answer the question in the second paragraph. I will consider the suggestion in the last paragraph of the question.

THE FACTORY ACTS—VAUGHAN & Co.,
CARDIFF.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the workers in the steam laundries of Messrs. Vaughan and Company, of Cardiff, are under the Factory Acts; if so, how does it come that fines are exacted by this firm; and if Messrs Vaughan and Company's works are under the Factory Acts how is it that the Factory Inspector for the district has not brought this matter under the notice of the proper authorities?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I understand that these laundries are under the Factory Acts. I have not at present any information as to what fines are exacted by the firm. I will make inquiry into the matter.

FACTORY ACTS—GREAT WESTERN COTTON WORKS, BRISTOL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has had any Reports from the Factory Inspectors of the Bristol District in regard to the engine having been repeatedly run overtime at the Great Western Cotton Works in Bristol; if he would make inquiries in order to avert a strike amongst the female operatives in those works; whether he is aware that last autumn an agreement was entered into by the Directors of the Works that the engine would be stopped at 8.30 a.m. to 9 a.m. for breakfast; from 1 to 2 p.m. for dinner; and finally at 5.30 evening, as the operatives complain that in every instance this agreement is not complied with; can he explain why these hours, which are those stipulated by Act of Parliament, have been broken; whether complaints have reached him that on Friday, 21st of March, the Chief Inspector and Sub-Inspector called at the factory, but confined their inspection to walking through two weaving sheds, and that, as soon as the Inspectors left, steam was put on, and the engine ran overtime; if the Inspector notified the manager of his visit; and, if so, why; and why, with the excessive heat and dust that prevails in these works, no preparation has been made for the application of "The Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889," which came into operation 1st March, 1890?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have not yet been placed in possession of the necessary information to enable me to answer all the questions of fact. I have received no Reports as to the engine running overtime, and no complaints as to the visits of the Chief Inspector. The Chief Inspector has been, and is, visiting several towns in connection with the carrying out of the provisions of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act, and, amongst other places, has paid a special visit to Bristol. Inquiries will be made as to the statements in the hon. Member's question.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TELEPHONE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether all or any of the Government Offices in London are connected with the telephone erected for the use of Members within the House of Commons; and, if not, whether, considering the great convenience it would be to Members for making inquiries and appointments, he will have connections established?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Although telephonic communication with the Government Offices might be of some convenience to Members, I am afraid I cannot say the same with respect to Ministers. To them it would be very inconvenient. Suppose, for example, a Member wished to communicate with the Treasury upon some matter of business. There would probably be involved a communication from the Treasury to myself, and I would in all probability be in the House. Inasmuch, therefore, as the convenience would only be available to Members during the sitting of the House, and all the Government Offices are represented in the House, it would be more convenient that a communication, if urgent, should be made direct to the Member of the Government responsible for the Office with which communication is desired. All communications on Government business made to a Government Department should be subject to the authority and supervision of the head of that Department.

In reply to a further question by Mr. P. O'BRIEN,

*MR. JACKSON said: My own personal view is that a clerk communicating upon Government business with a Government Department should only be subject to the supervision and authority of the head of that Department. No information would be obtained through the telephone in the absence of the head of the Department.

DR. TANNER: Might it not be absolutely beneficial to the Minister himself—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member cannot argue the matter now.

DR. TANNER: I will raise the question on a future occasion.

PRISON TREATMENT OF GEORGE HARRISON.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has seen the report of an interview between a representative of the Press and Mr. George Harrison, lately released from Millbank Prison, in which Mr. Harrison alleges that while in Chatham Prison he was four times punished by solitary confinement on a charge of refusing to work when he was unable to work through illness; that he was on these occasions placed in a cold, badly-lighted cell, the smell of which was horrible; and that on one occasion after release from the 'punishment cell, and while suffering from the effects of the extra punishment, he was struck on the head by an official; whether the Prison Rules require that the medical officer's sanction must be obtained before a prisoner is placed in solitary confinement or any extra punishment, and whether reduction of dietary or increase of labour are inflicted; has this rule been observed in Mr. Harrison's case; and whether he will cause a full inquiry to be made into the allegations and state result? I have also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has seen the statements of Mr. George Harrison, lately released from Millbank, to a representative of the Press, that two prisoners named Gallagher and Hawkins, confined in Millbank, are only allowed a quarter of an hour's exercise daily; whether this statement is true; and, if so, why are the prisoners named deprived of the two hours' exercise daily prescribed by the Prison Rules; whether he has seen the further statements of Mr. Harrison, namely, that—

"The food and general treatment of prisoners in Millbank has been so bad that several cases of insubordination occurred."

"There was one man in a dying condition, over whom a pail of water was thrown as a remedy, with the result that he had to be removed to the infirmary and his parents sent for, so critical became his condition."

"On another occasion, in the cell next to mine, I heard two officers go in and beat a prisoner unmercifully with their staves. . . . He is either in the infirmary or dead. I stopped in my cell about two hours after that, but never heard him move."

"They (the insubordinate prisoners) were scourged on the bare back, and sometimes put in irons, according to the orders of the Director, before whom the Governor took them; " and, whether he will cause an investigation to be made into those allegations, and state the result? I have further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has seen the statement of Mr. George Harrison, that, when he was imprisoned in Pentonville Prison, the Chaplain, addressing him, said—

"You are like some of the rest. You want to turn the world upside down. We've got a lot more like you"; whether he has seen the further allegations against the Chaplain of Chatham, namely—

"He did not come near me till I sent for him, after three months had gone, and, when he did come, his words were, what will men not do to make themselves popular before their fellow men";

whether he will cause an investigation into the truth of these allegations; whether he will give the names of the Chaplains of Pentonville and Chatham respectively; and whether any communication has been addressed to them in connection with these matters?

Mr. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I have also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the paragraph published in the Star newspaper of the 29th ultimo, in which George Harrison, who was released on the morning of that day upon a ticket-of-leave, is made to speak of gross ill-treatment suffered by the prisoners at Chatham, and to use the following words:—

"I will give you an instance of some of the treatment. There was one man in a dying condition, over whom a pail of water was thrown as a remedy, with the result that he had to be removed to the infirmary, and his parents sent for, so critical became his condition On another occasion, in the cell next to mine, I heard two officers go in and beat a prisoner unmercifully with their staves. It was something terrible, for I could hear that it was his head they were beating. I have not seen him since. He is either in the infirmary or dead. I stopped in my cell about two hours after that, but I never heard him move";

whether there is any, and, if so, what, truth in the statements contained in such paragraph; and whether there is any power to revoke the licence of a prisoner released on ticket-of-leave, in the event of his causing the publication of accusations against warders and other prison officials, charging them with murder or attempted murder, which, upon inquiry, may be found to be wholly untrue?

Mr. Patrick O'Brien

Mr. MATTHEWS: I will answer the three questions of the hon. Member and that of my hon. Friend the Member for North Camberwell (Mr. J. Kelly) at the same time. With regard to the allegations as to Harrison's treatment, as far as I have been able to ascertain in the short time allowed to me he was punished by close confinement four times, but in each case was certified as fit to work and to receive punishment by the medical officer. Shortly after his arrival at Chatham he complained to the medical officer that the work was too hard, and he was exempted from spade work and heavy lifting, and thenceforward put to light labour only. The cell in which he underwent punishment was not cold or badly lighted; the temperature was 60 degrees; ample provision is made for the ventilation. The story about his being struck on the head the Governor states to be a pure invention. With regard to the charges made against the Chaplains I have made inquiry, but have not had time to receive answers. No complaint was made at the time to the Visiting Director at Chatham. The Rev. Mr. Wheeler is Chaplain at Chatham. The Rev. Mr. Stocker is Chaplain at Pentonville. As to the statement that Gallagher and Hawkins had not more than a quarter of an hour's exercise, I presume the reference is to Callan and Harkins. The rule is that every prisoner during his first nine months is allowed an hour's exercise daily, which these men had. The Governor of Chatham Prison denies absolutely the story as to a pail of water being thrown over a dying man. As to insubordination caused by bad food and general treatment, and as to a man being unmercifully beaten by two officers in his cell, I invite the hon. Members who give publicity to such statements to supply the dates and particulars relating to them. Corporal punishment can be ordered only by a Director after proof on oath of very serious breaches of discipline, and must be inflicted in the presence of the Governor and medical officer. The rules also require that dietary punishment shall not be inflicted on a prisoner, and he shall not be placed in a punishment cell unless certified by the medical officer to be in a fit condition of health to undergo such punishment. These rules were observed in Harrison's case. There is power to revoke a licence at the pleasure of Her Majesty; but though I should deplore the conduct of this licence-holder, if he has been spreading in the Press charges which I believe to be absolutely without foundation, yet I cannot say that on this account I should be justified in advising the revocation of his licence.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I cannot give the dates. I have only asked questions in reference to what I read in the papers. All I ask of the right hon. Gentleman is that he will institute some independent inquiry.

MR. MATTHEWS: I am quite prepared to make an inquiry into the matter, and the character of the inquiry will depend upon the information I receive.

CUSTOMS—DUTIES ON VIOLINS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he would state under what authority a violin (consigned from Paris to Mr. D. Lawrie, of Glasgow, at the Midland Grand Hotel, St. Pancras), valued at £800, dated 1696, and purporting to be the work of Antonius Stradivarius, of Cremona, was on the 25th March detained by the Customs Authorities at Dover; if it is true, as stated by the Station Master at Dover in explanation, that its detention was due to the fact that in consequence of violins, represented as the work of classic makers, having been imported, consignees of such instruments are now required to state whether the imported article is for private use or sale; and, if for sale, to prove the accuracy of the date and name on the label before the instruments are given up by the Customs; whether the violin will be delivered to Mr. Lawrie without further delay; whether the fact of an old violin having passed the Customs is to be taken as a Government certificate of the genuineness of its date and signature; and if the regulation is intended to protect purchasers of violins against imposition, why an exception is made in the case of violins declared to be for private use, but which may subsequently be sold?

*MR. JACKSON: The question appeared on the Paper only this morning; but I have been able to ascertain that this violin was imported at Dover as described by the hon. Member. It was declared to be of the value of £80, and it was detained. On the 28th of March a letter was received from Mr. David Lawrie stating that the violin was his own property, and was intended for his own use. Upon that statement directions were given for its delivery to him, and it has, I believe, been delivered.

DR. CAMERON: Is it the fact that if a violin is declared to be for sale it is stopped unless the signature on it can be verified?

*MR. JACKSON: I have not been able to obtain information in answer to this question.

COLLISION IN THE BRISTOL CHANNEL.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the loss of life which has occurred, he will direct an inquiry into the cause of collision on the 12th instant, in the Bristol Channel, between the steamer Grantully and the trawling smack Holme Bay, of Lowestoft, as the result of which was that the five or six hands on board the smack were lost?

SIR SAVILE CROSSLEY (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg also to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the serious loss of life which occurred through the collision, he will order an inquiry to be held into the facts of the case?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): As all those on board the smack perished, and no evidence on their behalf has been available, I have not thought that any useful purpose would be served by ordering an official inquiry. But if the hon. Members are in a position to furnish me with any evidence I shall be quite ready to re-consider the question.

PARAFFIN.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the terms of an agreement between Thompson and Bedford Company, Limited, as representing American producers of paraffin, on the one part, and the Scottish Mineral Oil Association on the other part, limiting the production and fixing the price, and imposing other restrictions on the sale of the materials necessary for the manufacture of candles within the United Kingdom, and establishing a differential charge of "not less than $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb." against all candle-makers who are not members of the Candlemakers' Association and do not maintain minimum prices of 4s. 4d. and 4s. 6d. per dozen pounds, and also providing that

"The minimum prices herein agreed to are only binding until 30th June, after which they may be raised but not lowered;"

whether he is aware that all the leading candlemakers of the United Kingdom, with one exception, have been coerced into submission to the conditions of this agreement; and whether, having regard to the judgment of Lord Esher in the recent case of the "Mogul Steamship Company v. M'Grigor," he will bring the matter under the notice of the Public Prosecutor, in order that the opinion of the Law Officers may be taken as to whether the facts would justify a prosecution as for an indictable public wrong?

MR. MATTHEWS: This is a question which ought to be put to my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

MR. POWELL (Wigan): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the instructions to Inspectors will be distributed, and when the Code will be printed and circulated in such a form as to show separately all articles cancelled, modified, or established since the last edition, in accordance with custom and the provisions both of the Code now in force and of the New Code? I also beg to ask when the New Code of Regulations will come into force?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I have already stated that the instructions to Inspectors will be distributed as soon as possible; the changes in the Code are so extensive that it would not serve any useful purpose, while enormously increasing the bulk of the document, to print it in the form suggested; the plan observed in the year 1882 has therefore been followed. In reply to the second question of my hon. Friend, I cannot do better than refer him to the terms of the Minute prefixed to the Code, showing that it will practically come into operation on the 1st of September.

*MR. POWELL: When will the Code become law?

SIR W. HART DYKE: It will become law when it has been duly discussed in this House, and perhaps amended.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: When will the instructions to the Inspectors be issued?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I have already said that I hope they will be in the hands of Members next week. They will be published in the form of a Parliamentary Paper.

THE KITCHEN COMMITTEE.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chairman of the Kitchen Committee how much money the Committee will save by putting the waiters on half pay at Easter time; and whether he would consider the advisability of consulting with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to making provision for the amount necessary to give the waiters full pay during the adjournment of the House?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. SIDNEY HERBERT, Croydon): The saving would be about £58. The circumstances would not warrant any application to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject.

In reply to MR. P. O'BRIEN,

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said: According to the present arrangements it would be impossible to add very much to the expense of the staff without altering the tariff.

DR. TANNER: Does the hon. Gentleman mean to say that a sufficient sum of money is not now received for the extremely bad catering we get?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE CROXTON VILLAGE SCHOOL.

MR. NEWNES (Cambridge, E., Newmarket): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Croxton Village School, which is in receipt of a Government grant, was refused to the Liberal candidate for West Cambridgeshire on 18th February, on the ground that it could not be let for political purposes, and on the 12th March was let, or lent, for the annual meeting of the Croxton Conservative Club; and whether he will take any steps to prevent the Government aided schools being used in the interests of one Party and to the exclusion of another?

Mr. Pickersgill.

SIR W. HART DYKE: It is not the duty of the Department to determine for what purposes managers or owners of schools may allow them to be used out of the ordinary school hours. I have no means of bringing pressure to bear one way or the other upon these owners of schools; but I have already expressed an opinion in this House that schools should be lent to both Parties, because the more the views of hon. Members opposite are disseminated the better for the political future of our own friends.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is it not the fact that these schoolrooms are almost universally lent for Conservative demonstrations and refused when asked for by the Liberals?

SIR W. HART DYKE: No, Sir; that is very much denied.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON TOWN HOLDINGS.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Select Committee on Town Holdings will be re-nominated to take evidence and report on the rating of ground rents and values?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I understand that the names will be handed in in the course of the evening.

VACCINATION RETURNS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: My attention has been called to the Returns of Vaccination that have been laid on the Table. May I ask how it is that several counties have been absolutely omitted from them?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask for notice of the question.

IRELAND—THE CLONGOREY HOLDINGS.

MR. SEXTON: I gave notice of my intention to call the attention of the House to this case to-day; but I beg to postpone any further action until after the Easter recess.

TAXATION OF LAND AND BUILDINGS IN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES, IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, AND IN BRITISH COLONIES.

Address for—

“Return showing—

1. Taxation on land:

- (a.) The per-centage on the annual value which the rate levied amounts to;
- (b.) The total amount raised, the totals for local and National purposes being stated separately;
- (c.) The per-centage which the amount raised by taxation of land bears to the total taxation;

2. Taxation of buildings:

- (a.) The per-centage on the annual value which the rate levied amounts to;
- (b.) The total amount raised, the totals for local and National purposes being stated separately;
- (c.) The per-centage which the amount raised by taxation of buildings bears to the total taxation.”—(Mr. Provand.)

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (SUPPLY).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Proceedings on Supply have precedence at the Evening Sitting this day, and also to-morrow; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to the Sitings of the House this day and to-morrow.”—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(2.56.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I think the right hon. Gentleman should have given some reasons for the Motion. Yesterday, the right hon. Gentleman will remember, was the first day on which the House was asked to consider the Civil Service Estimates, and that being so any hon. Member had a right to call attention to subjects before the Speaker left the Chair. The right hon. Gentleman said he expected to pass the whole of the first Class of Civil Service Estimates. Now, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, looking at the precedents, that was a preposterous expectation. We might have gone on with the preliminary discussion until 12 o'clock; but as we understood that the right hon. Gentleman wanted to have some money, we took the unusual course of allowing you, Sir, to leave the Chair at 8 or half-past 8 o'clock. It must not be forgotten that the matter was put off until the very last day before the holidays. Everyone knows that the Votes on the Royal Palaces and on the Royal Parks invariably gave rise to a very considerable amount of discussion, as various Members desire to make comments upon them. The right hon. Gentleman got those two Votes, and he was fortunate in getting them. On the first Vote there was a good deal of discussion, but upon the second there was hardly any. The right hon. Gentleman also got a Vote on Account for two months; and if he will point out one or two Votes in connection with which there are contracts we will be ready to assent to them. But I think it is unfair to us and to hon. Gentlemen opposite to call upon us to pass the whole of the first Class of the Civil Service Estimates before we leave for the vacation. A good many Gentlemen, not dreaming that the right hon. Gentleman would ask for these Votes, have gone away. If it is the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to get money, it is the duty of hon. Members to criticise the Votes. Let there be a modus vivendi. The next Vote is a very controversial Vote.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it?

MR. LABOUCHERE: It is a Vote of £195,000 for the Houses of Parliament. If the right hon. Gentleman will consent to take a couple of Votes which will give him enough money, and will then agree to the adjournment of the House, the whole thing can be settled; but to ask us to pass the whole of these Votes in a perfunctory manner is to ask us to abrogate our duties as an Opposition. I warn the right hon. Gentleman that if he persists in taking this extraordinary course the proceedings are likely to be somewhat lengthy. There is only one instance in which Class I. of the Civil Service Estimates was taken in one night, and it was when the Government brought in their Local Government Bill. There was a feeling on this side of the House that we should be able to turn out right hon. Gentlemen opposite upon that measure. We were deceived, and it was no encouragement to induce us to act in the same manner again. I ask the Government to take now that which has been the usual course on other occasions, and not to keep hon. Members here when they want to be elsewhere.

Mr. Labouchere

*(3.0.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am in the recollection of the House when I state that from time to time during the last week I urged upon the House the necessity which the Government were under of asking for Class I. before the Adjournment. The grounds upon which we asked for those Votes were that there were contracts involved, and, unless the Votes were sanctioned, the most favourable opportunity for building operations would be lost, and serious inconvenience would be caused to the public interest. These contracts extend to all the Votes, and it is on that ground that I adhere to the intimation which I gave with regard to them. Therefore, though it may be the duty of hon. Members to criticise the Votes, it is equally the duty of the Government to endeavour to conduct the business of the House with due regard to the convenience of the House and the public interest, even though in doing so they may trench upon the holidays which hon. Members have a right to expect. Some of the discussions last night might have been curtailed without injury to the public interest. The Government are most anxious to meet the views of every Member of the House, so far as may be consistent with their obligations to the public.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to interrupt? I think we may come to an arrangement if the right hon. Gentleman will leave out Votes No. 6 (Art and Science Buildings) and No. 7 (the Diplomatic and Consular Buildings), which I do not think are pressing. There are a great many Gentlemen who desire to discuss questions connected with them. [Ministerial cries of "No, no!"] If the right hon. Gentleman will do that I believe we shall be able to come to an arrangement.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I am exceedingly sorry that I am not able to comply with the suggestion, which the hon. Gentleman deems a reasonable proposal. The views of hon. Members might be expressed shortly ; I am sure they will be expressed shortly on this side of the House.

MR. LABOUCHERE : There are Members who wish to speak who are not here.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I cannot postpone the Votes. Hon. Gentlemen have had ample notice that these Votes would be asked for before the Adjournment. We must ask for Votes down to No. 13 (Rates on Government Property), postponing Vote 14 (for Public Works and Buildings), before I can move the Adjournment of the House.

DR. TANNER : Are the Government in earnest in pushing forward to-day the Contagious Diseases (Animals) (Pleuro-Pneumonia) Bill ?

(3.5.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) : I think that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to Votes which involve building contracts is a very reasonable one. The Diplomatic and Consular Buildings Vote, however, is scarcely subject to that observation. This Vote includes the building of an agency house at Cairo, a subject which has frequently given rise to discussion. It is important that the contracts referring to buildings in England should be entered into at once ; but as it is not so important in the case of the diplomatic and consular buildings I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should postpone that Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I can only speak again by the indulgence of the House, but I wish to state that there is a special reason connected with the Cairo item in the Vote which obliges the Government to ask for the decision of the House upon it. There is a contract for the land on which the Agency House is to be erected, and this contract only lasts until March 31. The contract has been extended for a few days, in order to give the Government an opportunity of obtaining the decision of the House on the question. If the Vote is postponed the contract lapses altogether, and there would be no site available upon which to erect a building.

DR. CAMERON : I am afraid that when the two sides of the House get to loggerheads the public business makes very little progress. It is quite evident that the Government can, if they choose, force these Estimates through the House with very little discussion. But if they take the Committee stage before Easter, there is still the Report stage to follow. Will the right hon. Gentleman promise to afford an opportunity of discussing the Votes on Report ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : Well, I think that is a reasonable proposal, and I will endeavour, as far as possible, to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman as to any particular Vote on which discussion may be desired.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE : I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not take the discussion on the Report of the Naval Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I agree to that.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) : I think we want a more definite assurance as to the opportunity of discussing the Votes on Report.

*(3.10) MR. MORTON (Peterborough) : To my mind this question of dealing with the public money is the most important question which the House of Commons has to consider. The manner in which Votes of money are rushed through the House appears to me to be simply scandalous. A great deal of time is occupied by the House in discussing other matters, but it does not give nearly sufficient time to the consideration of spending money. If Supply is rushed through in the hasty way now proposed, there will be no opportunity afforded to hon. Members of ventilating grievances, which, in the interests of the people, we ought to have. It is not merely a question for hon. Members. It is a question for the country, and the people of the country demand that all questions concerning the expenditure of money should be properly discussed and considered. I object to anything like a threat on the part of the right hon. Gentleman that hon. Members will lose their holidays if these Votes are not passed. This is neither a fair nor a proper argument to use towards the House. It may be all very well to treat the Irish Members in this way, but there is no one strong enough in this country to treat with contempt and also with impunity Members representing English constituencies. I would recommend the right hon. Gentleman to answer the questions which are put to him, and not to compel hon. Members to ask the same questions twice over. Let them tell us what they want in regard to these building contracts and we shall be glad to comply with their wishes. The Government must remember that they cannot conceal these things; they can be discussed either now or on Report; and I insist upon proper answers being given to hon. Members by the right hon. Gentleman. I trust that in future hon. Members will take more interest in questions connected with the expenditure of the money of the people.

DR. CAMERON: Supposing the right hon. Gentleman obtains the Votes he desires in a reasonable time this afternoon, will he then move the Adjournment of the House at once?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Last night I indicated that the Government would ask the House to pass the Committee stage of the South Indian Railway Purchase Bill and the Second Reading of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. I believe that those Bills will take but a very short time.

Question put, and agreed to.

RAILWAYS, &c., RETURN TICKETS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Morton, Bill to enable passengers in railway trains and on steamboats, &c., to make use of return tickets for twelve months after the date of issue, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Morton, Mr. Causton, Dr. Clark, Mr. Lloyd Morgan, and Dr. Tanner.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 217.]

BANKRUPTCY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Campbell, Bill to consolidate and amend the Law of Bankruptcy in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Thomas Sutherland, and Mr. Baird.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 218.]

SHOP HOURS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Provand, Bill to amend the Law relating to the employment of women and young persons in shops, &c., ordered to be brought in by Mr. Provand, Mr. Whitley, Mr. Jennings, Mr. Channing, and Mr. Samuel Smith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 219.]

Mr. Morton

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £165,767, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for expenditure in respect of Public Buildings in Great Britain, including the Houses of Parliament."

(3.15.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to call attention to Item C., the rents of houses. There is a large number of houses that are rented as public offices, at the same time that there are a considerable number of public sites that are unoccupied and have been unoccupied for years. I notice that the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty has a residence in Queen Anne's Gate at a rental of £700 a year. I could never understand why the First Naval Lord should have a residence, seeing he has a salary of £2,000; it is out of all reason. The Board of Trade Offices might be erected on a vacant site, instead of rents being paid for the present ramshackle buildings. I hope the First Commissioner of Works will, as rapidly as possible, get rid of the hired houses, and to do his best to provide buildings on sites already purchased.

*(3.20.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): For a long time past various plans have been tried by which the bad habit of the housing of the public establishments in hired premises might be got rid of. In recent times the India Office, the Local Government Board, the Home Office, the Foreign Office, and others have been properly housed. The Board of Works are at present engaged in erecting new Admiralty buildings; the War Office will probably be undertaken next, and when those two Departments are provided for, there will be comparatively little room for complaint with regard to the use of hired premises.

(3.7.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W): I would wish to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the great want of accommodation in the Offices of the Board of Trade. When a deputation attends there is no room into which they can be shown without the presence of the clerks. The offices are a disgrace to the country.

*(3.8.) MR. PLUNKET: I agree that the accommodation at the Board of Trade is unsatisfactory, and I think it ought to be improved as soon as possible, with due regard to priority of claims, on the part of others of the Government Departments.

*(3.10.) MR. MORTON: I want to ask a question on Item C. I notice an item of £2,800 for Dover House, and I see, "Stables occupied by the First Lord of the Admiralty." I should like to know what the First Lord of the Admiralty wants with stables. Are they occupied by the celebrated Horse Marines. I think we are entitled to know something about it, because it looks a large sum. Then there is an item on page 22 for the supply of water to various public offices by private companies. I want to know whether that supply is regulated by meter, and what is the cost per 1,000 gallons. On page 23 I see that carpets, &c., cost £2,300; then there is £3,050 for various articles—baskets, glass, and china ware. Are these articles supplied by public tender? So far as I am concerned, I shall not be satisfied until the Government—I do not care of what Party—adopts a system of publicly inviting tenders, a system adopted by the smallest Municipal Authorities throughout the country. I think we ought not to enter into contracts for works costing, say, £200, without publicly advertising for tenders. I do hope we shall have a more satisfactory answer this afternoon upon this point than we had yesterday.

DR. TANNER: There are some matters in connection with this Vote to which I think attention might be called. Some of the larger items are in connection with the sanitary improvement of some of the offices, where a perfectly new scheme has been adopted. We are asked to vote on account a further sum of £5,000, and I ask for what practical purpose is the money to be expended? Take the University of London. Of course, everybody taking an interest in the higher education of the country necessarily feels a deep interest in the education provided by this University, which I believe to be one of the best in the country. Still, I think it right to call attention to the large expenditure of £9,500 which is proposed for the purpose of providing additional accommodation for the students coming up for examination. I want to know whether this is in consequence of an increase in the number of students requiring to be examined, and whether the proposal is one that has had the sanction of the Governing Body? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works will perhaps excuse my putting these questions, and will probably allow me to say further that I am glad to find that money is needed for providing increased accommodation for the University of London. I hope that this will tend to set at rest any question that might be raised in regard to the Royal University of Ireland that will come later on. I may add that I am pleased to see that the expenditure required for the Royal Courts of Justice has this year been reduced. There is one other point to which I wish to direct attention. Yesterday evening I made reference to the item put down in connection with rent, insurance, and tithe rent-charge in respect of our public buildings, and I desire so say that when the Estimates for next year are prepared, I hope these items will be placed under separate headings. As it is, it is impossible for us to know what insurance money is paid by the country in connection with our numerous valuable buildings and institutions. I yesterday called attention to the small sum payable for the insurance of the Royal Palaces. Taking up the list of the public buildings of Great Britain, I find that there is a sum of £4,709 11s. 3d. to be paid under the three headings I have named, which is an increase of over £1,000 on the sum payable last year. This being so, I think it would be advisable to put the amounts payable under separate headings, so that the country may know exactly how much it has to pay for each. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will deem it necessary to offer some explanation with regard to these matters.

*(3.40.) MR. PLUNKET: In answer to the hon. Member for Peterborough, I have to state that the supply of water to the Public Offices is by meter, the price being from sixpence to ninepence per 1,000 gallons. As to the stables, certain of the Public Offices carry with them the right of stabling; but there being no stables at the Admiralty, stables have been provided at Dover House for the First Lord of the Admiralty. With regard to furniture, it is not possible to take contracts for all the furnishing which has to be provided; but whenever the quantity of furniture required exceeds, say, £15 or £20, competitive tenders are invited. Any firm of standing may be placed on the list of those who are invited to tender. With regard to the London University, there is a great increase of students, which has made the present accommodation inadequate. If the hon. Gentleman complains that there are certain firms not on the list, I will see that they are included.

*MR. MORTON: No, Sir. All I wish is that the Government should adopt the system of publicly inviting tenders, though I am quite aware that it could not be carried out in all cases.

(3.42.) MR. CREMER: I should be glad to know who the firms really are? A great many people would be glad to be enlightened.

*(3.43.) MR. PLUNKET: As I have said before, if any hon. Gentleman chooses to submit a firm, I shall be glad to put it on the list. The names I have here are Holland & Sons, Johnston, Norman & Co., Jenks & Wood, Hampton & Sons, Hughes & Co., F. Coote, and occasionally, also Gillows, Howard, Oetzmann, as well as a few others.

(3.44.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the further accommodation will be available for the examinations by the Civil Service Commissioners, who have been very much inconvenienced by not having a suitable place for holding their examinations?

Dr. Tanner

*(3.45.) MR. PLUNKET: The suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman is a very pertinent one, and is well worthy consideration, inasmuch as the present accommodation for these examinations is not only insufficient but expensive.

*(3.45.) MR. MORTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman say that the same rule will be applied to buildings and repairs of buildings as is to be applied to furniture; and are we to understand that, where the repairs are of a serious amount, tenders will be invited by advertisement?

*MR. PLUNKET: Yes.

(3.46.) DR. TANNER: Will it not be advisable to settle this matter by attaching to the Estimates a list showing the various contracts entered into under the different headings. This would save a good deal of trouble, and would protect the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works from any insinuation or innuendo as to things not being square.

*(3.47.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I have a few observations to make in moving the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £500 on account of the restoration of Westminster Hall. The chief point I desire to raise is one that relates to the total want of proper accommodation for carriages and carriage horses in Palace Yard. There is a cave or cavern at one corner of the yard, which is used for the shelter of horses and carriages, but in regard to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) has said that it is intended not for carriages, but for saddle horses. It would, no doubt, be a convenient place for carriages; but for the sudden and abrupt descent from the yard above, and although it is said not to be intended for carriages, I may state that I myself saw within it when I left the House last night no fewer than five carriages. For my part, I am unable to understand why saddle horses should have preference over the carriages and carriage horses which are usually waiting in Palace Yard at night. The precipitous descent into the new cave or cavern might have been easily avoided by the architect, and the fact that it exists is the fault of the Government Officers. I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford in his place, because I know that he, as a former Commissioner of Works, has gone into the matter, and I submit to the House that it is quite a new thing not to have a carriage shed in connection with this House. I have been a Member of this House for a great many years, and I cannot remember the time when there was not a shelter for Members' carriages. Why such provision has not been made in connection with the new work it puzzles my comprehension to understand. The architect, by the exercise of a very small amount of ingenuity, might have provided such a shed; but instead of doing so, he has built a walk right across the entrance to the new buildings, and to the north of that wall there is a large platform of ground which is of no use whatever to Members of this House. I cannot see why that wall should not be removed and a proper carriage shelter erected there. Having thus brought this matter before the right hon. Gentleman with as little circumlocution as possible, I shall be glad to hear what he has to say in regard to it. On the last occasion of the discussion of these Estimates, I endeavoured to impress on the right hon. Gentleman the extraordinary character of the stone parapet at the southern side of Westminster Hall, near Sir Charles Barry's Staircase. It is totally out of harmony with the original design, and I pointed out to my right hon. Friend that it is totally useless for any practical purpose, for anyone wanting to enter the south-west door might approach it by steps through the old iron gates. In conclusion, I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Item N, for the restoration of Westminster Hall, be reduced by £500."
 —(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

*(3.57.) MR. PLUNKET: I have considered the matter of the staircase in Westminster Hall to which my right hon. Friend has referred. I have taken advice upon the subject, and I now propose to make some alterations. I propose to take the present moulded coping off the wall, and reduce the height of the latter by 1 ft. 6 in.; to continue the coping which was fixed by Sir Charles Barry in lieu of that removed; fix a guard rail on the latter coping, and re-fix the iron gates and railing to correspond with those on the opposite side. I have had a Report made to me to the effect that the use for the shelter of carriages of the covered place intended only for horses to stand in is very dangerous, and certainly the building was not planned to be used for any such purpose. I considered the question whether it would be possible to erect in the centre of Palace Yard any considerable shelter for carriages, and I came to the conclusion that it would not be possible to do so without disfiguring the appearance of the yard.

(4.3.) MR. CAUSTON: I think the use to which the new rooms outside Westminster Hall has been put fully confirms the views expressed by many of us who, in 1885, opposed the erection of the new buildings. There has evidently been great difficulty on the part of the Government in finding a use for them at all. I would point out also that the divisions and the bookcases which have been put up in the different rooms are entirely out of harmony with the rest of the elaborate design of the building. I would further draw attention to the fact that the fireplaces and grates are simply ornaments; they cannot be used. Neither coal nor gas can be burnt in them, for the simple reason that there are no chimneys. The health of the officers who use the rooms will, I am afraid, suffer in consequence of this state of things. In consequence of the arrangements adopted for heating the atmosphere is unbearable, and I believe the officials have to spend a great part of the time which should be devoted to work in walking up and down Westminster Hall for the purpose of getting fresh air. The large room does not seem to have been applied to any purpose, and I should like the right hon. Gentleman to say what he proposes to do with it? I know the right hon. Gentleman is not himself for the building, but I believe it to be practically useless.

*(4.7.) MR. PLUNKET: I cannot in the least agree with the view taken by the hon. Member as to the utility of the rooms. It seems to me that by the placing of new Smoking Room, Reading Room, and Ladies Dining Room at the disposal of Members during the present Session—I think much to their satisfaction—by the removal of certain officers to the other side of Westminster Hall, a very great addition has been made to the comfort and convenience of the House. I admit that some complaints were made at first as to the heating of the newly-erected rooms, but they seemed to be due to the differences of opinion existing among the occupants as to the temperature which ought to be kept up. I have since put up partitions between the various offices, and I believe the officials are now as happy as possible. It is true there are fireplaces which cannot be used; but as the rooms are perfectly well warmed and ventilated by other means, I do not think that is a very serious complaint. It is the case that I am not responsible for the new building. I wish I were, for in my opinion it is a very handsome and stately addition to the old Hall.

(4.10.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think I must have been misunderstood on this question. I certainly never said that the erection at the side of Westminster Hall was intended as a shelter for carriages. On the contrary, I always said it was intended only for horses. That was fully explained when the scheme was being discussed. It replaces the shed which stood close by formerly, and which was certainly only intended for sheltering horses. It very often happens that 30 or 40 carriages are in the yard at the same time, and it would be impossible to make provision for sheltering the whole of them. A proposal was made to erect a carriage shelter on the other side of the yard, but it was rejected on the ground that it could not be carried out without spoiling the artistic appearance of the Houses of Parliament.

*(4.12.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: The reply given by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Plunket) as to carriages is most unsatisfactory. We know quite well, after many years' experience, that the old shed accommodation in Palace Yard was amply sufficient for the protection of the coachmen and carriages who come down. All I ask is that equal accommodation should be given now. It seems to me ridiculous that when you are spending this vast sum of money on the new buildings and upon the land in front of them you cannot provide some kind of shelter for servants and carriages of Members during the winter months. I should like to know why the zig-zag wall has been erected on the north side. It is certainly no ornament.

Mr. Plunket

*MR. PLUNKET: It was in the plans, and was approved by the Committee.

*(4.15.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: The fact of its having been in the plans does not make it of any use, and I think that every decision the Committee arrived at ought to be condemned. This is not a question of ornamentation, but one of usefulness and almost of humanity to the servants and to the poor dumb animals brought down here night after night. Last night, at midnight, I found five carriages in the new buildings, and I am informed by the constables in attendance that as many as 10 or 12 have been in there at one time. Does not this show in the clearest way in the world that some such accommodation is necessary? I suppose the right hon. Gentleman will see the new shelter is to be handed over entirely to the horses of telegraph messengers and to the bicycles and tricycles one sees stored away there. I think Members of this House ought to be considered by the right hon. Gentleman before the telegraph boys and messengers. Members of this House are those who vote the money, attending here long hours, and I think they are entitled to some consideration. There is no doubt if the right hon. Gentleman would consult Mr. Taylor, of his own Office, who is a gentleman of ability, some means could be devised for giving shelter to carriages. All I would ask is that Members of Parliament who use private carriages and often have to take them home, as I have, late at night, shall have some consideration given to them. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford can say that this question was before the Parliamentary Committee. I should hardly think that such an important question could have been omitted. However that may be, I think the question now is a serious one, and that, although there is not a large attendance of Members, we ought to take a vote of the House about it. Members may come in and outvote us without having heard the discussion, but we must take the chance of that.

(4.18.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I rather agree with the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. At present, as the right hon. Gentleman says, the shelter is used for carriages. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner has said that it is dangerous to use it for that purpose, and, that being so, I presume he will forbid such use being made of it. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that we have not yet arrived at that democratic age when we all use omnibuses or walk down to the House, but have horses and coachmen who are liable to be affected by the inclemency of the weather when the House sits late, I hope the First Commissioner of Works will make inquiries to see if a change cannot be made without injury to the architectural beauties of this building—to see if some shelter cannot be put in Palace Yard or somewhere else where carriages which have to wait for Members can be protected from the weather.

*MR. PLUNKET: I will undertake to give the matter most careful consideration.

*(4.20.) DR. FARQUHARSON: I must say I am rather sceptical as to the extreme satisfaction of the clerks with the new rooms adjoining Westminster Hall. Though I have heard no complaint, I fail to see how they can be satisfied with the atmospheric conditions under which they live—with the manner in which the rooms are lighted and heated. In the case of one of the rooms it is said that the clerk occupying it likes it, but whether he likes it or not he ought not to be permitted to remain in it, for it is stuffy. It cannot be healthy for any one to remain in it any length of time. Will the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works tell us what is to be done with the large room called the Conference Room? It is a room of splendid proportions, and so handsome that it is a pity it cannot be used for some practical purpose. I should deprecate its being used for a Grand Committee Room for the reason that it is too great a distance from this House, and it would overtax the energies of even the most agile to get from that room to the Lobbies here during the short time the Division bell rings. Members who are old and infirm and not fitted for the athletic performance of running helter-skelter from the Committee Room to the House, traversing a tortuous flight of stairs on the way, would find it impossible to discharge their Parliamentary duties if required, to sit on a Grand Committee in this room. I hope, therefore, we shall not be put to the inconvenience and possible danger of having to use this room as a Grand Committee Room. As to the new shelter for horses and carriages, I think it is equally dangerous for both. I do not think it can be safe for horses to come down that very steep and narrow incline, especially in wet and slippery weather. Whilst inspecting the place to-day, I noticed one or two horses there, and saw a young man suddenly dash down amongst them on a bicycle. Such a thing as that, I should think, must be very inconvenient and very dangerous to horses. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible, without interfering with the architectural proportions of the building, to make some sort of descent down, which horses could be driven with safety?

(4.23.) MR. CREMER: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, I would like to put a question to him with reference to a matter that I raised in the House the other day—though if he has not yet had time to consider it, I will not press for a reply. I desire to know why Members are not allowed to visit, and to escort their friends through, the Painted Chamber and the Buckingham Chamber in the other House? Why should it be necessary to obtain the escort of a Peer in order to visit these places? Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman undertook to ascertain why we are precluded from visiting the crypt, and if he is now in a position to enlighten us on the subject I shall be glad.

(4.25.) DR. TANNER: I desire to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the ventilation of this House—a subject which I had occasion to deal with five years ago. On certain occasions, when, for instance, we are expecting a great Division, the atmosphere gets extremely stuffy, and laden with carbonic acid gas. The draught coming up from the chamber below through the floor is always the same. It cannot be graduated and made to fit the particular circumstances of the time, therefore, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether something cannot be done in the matter? If it is possible to effect a cure it will be greatly to the advantage of the Members of the House, and even more so to the officials who remain here throughout the sittings. The draught could be increased by enlarging the apertures for the escape of foul air overhead. I think the mode of introducing fresh air from below requires alteration. It comes up through the floor, and, therefore, of necessity, brings up with it small particles of dust, which get into the lungs of hon. Members, causing discomfort and danger to health. These are small matters, but they deserve to be gone into. I should also like to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of restoring the frescoes up stairs near Sir Charles Barry's statue, which are in a most dilapidated condition.

(4.28.) MR. CREMER: [Cries of "Divide."] I trust the Committee will bear with me for a moment, as it is seldom I waste the time of the House. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would not place a few trees or shrubs and flowers on the terrace outside the House, which at present has a most cold and barren appearance?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: As I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say he will inquire into the matter to which I draw his attention, I will not press my Amendment to a Division.

*(4.30.) MR. PLUNKET: The suggestions made by the hon. Member opposite (Dr. Tanner) some years ago with the view of excluding fogs from this House were, as the Committee knows, adopted with beneficial results. I shall be very glad to confer with him and the officials who have charge of the ventilation as to whether it is possible to do anything more to improve the ventilation of the House. As to the large room on the other side of Westminster Hall, I am afraid it is too remote to be used by a Committee, unless it is arranged that its sittings shall not overlap those of the House; but in every other respect the room is well adapted for the purposes of a Grand Committee. I have made some inquiries respecting the picture galleries in the House of Lords, and, as regards the Painted Chamber, access can be gained to it only through the Division Lobbies and the writing-room of the House of Lords, so that it is not reasonable to expect that it should be accessible, even to the Members of this House, when the other House is sitting. I will make further inquiry as to whether additional facilities can be given to Members to visit the room when the House of Lords is not sitting. With reference to the Buckingham Chamber, I am still in correspondence with the Lord Chamberlain. I have not yet received an answer to the inquiry I made respecting the admission of Members to the Crypt. As to the frescoes on the staircase, I have taken the best advice I could obtain, and have been assured that they are no longer within the reach of remedial art; and no one is able to suggest a plan by which decay can be arrested.

Dr. Tanner

(4.36.) MR. CREMER: I am not so unreasonable as to imagine that Members of this House should be admitted as of right to the Lobbies and the writing-room of the House of Lords when that House is sitting. But I would point out that the House of Lords does not meet until half-past 4 o'clock, and that it frequently happens that Members of this House are desirous of visiting the Painted Chamber and the Buckingham Chamber between the hours of 2 and half-past 4. Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries to ascertain whether Members of this House will be admitted to those Chambers during the hours I have referred to, and, in fact, during the time the House of Lords is not sitting?

*(4.37.) MR. PLUNKET: The public are admitted in the usual way when the House of Lords is not sitting on Saturdays, and on Monday and Tuesday in Easter week, and at other times, but I will make inquiries to ascertain whether there is any objection to admitting hon. Members of this House whenever the House of Lords is not sitting.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman reply as to the shrubs.

*Mr. PLUNKET: The question has been considered. I have spoken to a large number of people about it and the general opinion is that to put shrubs or flowers on the river terrace would not be an adornment, but rather a disfigurement.

(4.38.) Dr. FARQUHARSON: Is it not the fact that the restrictions upon hon. Gentlemen visiting the House of Lords are of recent date? A few years ago we were free to visit the House of Lords at any time the House was not sitting.

*(4.38.) Mr. PLUNKET: I will inquire.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*Mr. MORTON: I see an item of £200 here for the supply of oil for the lamps used in the Committee Rooms. Why is there so much oil used here? I have been looking about but have been unable to find many lamps in use. I also find that the Resident Engineer has a salary of £250, rising by £5 annual increments to £300; but he is here accredited with £400. How does that happen? I notice that he receives other sums under other heads but there is nothing to account for the increase of salary. Would it not be well in future to put the whole sum paid to this gentleman down in one item instead of dividing it in this way? I am aware that payments are sometimes put down in this way in order that more than the maximum salary can be paid, and, perhaps, that has been done in this case. If so, I must say I do not agree with the system.

*(4.39.) Mr. PLUNKET: Up to the present year the salary of the Assistant Engineer was as stated by the hon. Member, but Dr. Percy, the eminent Engineer of the House of Commons, unfortunately died last autumn, and we took the opportunity of re-modelling the Department. Instead of filling up the vacancy at the old salary of £600 a year we added £100 to the salary of the Assistant Engineer, giving him £400 instead of £300, and conferred the whole responsibility on that gentleman. As to the consumption of oil, oil lamps are used in Committee Rooms and in the residences attached to the House, but the consumption of oil will be reduced as the electric light is extended, as it will be during the Easter and Whitsuntide holidays.

Vote agreed to.

2. £21,000, to complete the sum for Admiralty, Extension of Buildings.

*Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: There has been such a long delay in commencing the extension that I was in hopes the rumour was true that the Government had determined to re-consider the matter, and I regret to learn from this Vote that it is intended to persist in the extension scheme. Two years ago we had the assurance of architects that the work would be completed in two and a half years. Now, two years have passed and nothing has been done beyond digging the foundations. I presume no contracts has been entered into for the new building. I am opposed to the scheme because it will prevent for any period within present contemplation the bringing of the Admiralty and the War Office under one roof. That defect has been prominently brought before our notice by the Report of the Army and Navy Royal Commission. The whole question seems to me to turn on the expediency of bringing the naval and military Departments into harmony with each other. One of the proposals of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) was that these two Departments should be placed under the control of one Secretary of State. Though that proposal was rejected by the Royal Commission it is obvious that the Commissioners regarded it as of enormous importance that the two Departments should be brought into harmonious working, and I understand that they have a plan for effecting that. I believe myself there would be no mode in which the two departments could be brought into greater harmony with one another than by putting them under the same roof. Until quite recently that has always been the view of every high Authority who has considered the matter. In time of peace the adoption of such a scheme would involve economy whilst in time of war it would involve a large increase of efficiency. My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers), who has presided over the Admiralty and the War Office, and who was at the head of the War Office at the time when this country was involved in war with Egypt, stated in evidence before the Committee that in time of peace it was important that the two Departments should be close together, whilst in time of war it was absolutely essential. He also said that the separation of the two Departments was a cause of weakness and might be the cause of disaster. Within the past two or three years a somewhat adverse opinion has been given on the point by the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton) and the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith). I quite admit the high authority of the First Lord of the Treasury in such matters, but at all events he has not had experience of the advantages of such relations between the two Departments in time of war. I believe some proposal has been considered for putting the War Office on the other side of Whitehall on the site of what is known as Carington House; but if that proposal were carried out the War Office would be on the other side of the street, and it would involve great additional cost. It was with the view of bringing the two Departments together that the Spring Gardens site was purchased seven or eight years ago. I am not now recommending that Messrs. Jennings' plan should be revived, as that scheme, in my opinion, is dead.

(4.50.) Mr. COURTNEY retired and the Chair was taken by Sir J. GORST.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE continued: At the same time some scheme might be adopted which would carry out the plan I am advocating. Looking at the question from an economic and an artistic point of view, I must again challenge my right hon. Friend, as I did two years ago, to say whether he could bring forward any single architect of influence or importance who will recommend the present proposal either upon architectural or economic grounds. The proposal is to add two wings to the existing Admiralty at a cost of something like £195,000. The existing Admiralty, which is, I believe, about 150 years old, certainly would not cost more than £80,000 or £90,000 to re-erect. You are going to add to an old building, which is certainly very deficient as an office, and which is not a lofty building as compared with offices in other parts of London, an extension which will cost £195,000, and from the necessity of maintaining the old building you are practically going to extend all its main defects to the two wings. From an economic point of view, that does not seem to be a wise course. As to the artistic point of view, I believe every Authority who has looked at the plans has condemned them. They have been condemned by the Institute of Architects, and I believe I am right in saying that the professional officers of the Office of Works itself have not recommended them to the Government, and that those who are entrusted with the erection of the buildings do not consider the scheme a wise or sound one. I believe myself that even now, at the eleventh hour, it would be wise not to proceed further with the scheme, but to invite suggestions for utilising the site, which was bought at very considerable cost, for the erection of a great building which would accommodate both the Admiralty and the War Office. At present the War Office is spread about in numerous separate buildings. I believe there are as many as nine or ten of them, in different parts of London. The existing War Office site cannot be made available for new buildings, and it will, therefore, be absolutely necessary at some future time to purchase a new site at a very considerable outlay of money. The most serious defect of the present scheme is the impossibility of the two great Departments ever being brought into continuity. On the whole, I most seriously suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether even now it would not be a wise course to postpone further progress with the building, and consider whether it would not be possible to erect upon the Spring Gardens site a building—not according to the original plan of Messrs. Leeming—which will be suitable both for the Admiralty and the War Office. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not think, in the remarks I have made, that I have any personal feeling in the matter, arising from the rejection of the scheme which I originally recommended to the House. On the contrary, I shall be most willing to support the right hon. Gentleman in any scheme which, on the whole, commends itself to me as one likely to attain the object I have set forth. I do not think the present scheme will prove effective from an administrative point of view. I believe that, architecturally, it will be a failure, and that in the long run it will land the country in greater expenditure.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

* (5.2.) MR. PLUNKET: Certainly any suggestion on such a subject coming from the right hon. Gentleman is worthy of very respectful and careful consideration; but when he asks us, not at the eleventh hour, as he says, but at half-past 12 to reject the present scheme he can hardly expect us to assent. I do not suppose that it is desired that I should follow the right hon. Gentleman through all the arguments which he has put forward on several previous occasions, and which have been answered over and over again. The whole question was very carefully considered by a strong and important Committee who rejected the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. It then became our duty to do something, and accordingly in 1887 were entrusted to Messrs. Leeming the duty of preparing fresh plans. It is true Messrs. Leeming preferred their own original plan, but for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of the Committee they do entirely approve of their present plan. That plan was adopted in principle by the House in 1887, when it voted the sum of £500 for the preliminary expenses which it entailed. In the following year the plans when prepared were exhibited in the Tea-room, and in the same year the House voted £5,000 on account of the cost of carrying them out. In these circumstances, I think that it is impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to ask the Committee to go back in the matter. In December last the Government authorised the expenditure of £21,000 upon the construction of the foundations of the new buildings, and I cannot believe that the right hon. Gentleman is serious when he asks the Government now to stay their hands in the matter.

* (5.6.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I do not wish to do any injustice to Messrs. Leeming. I have no doubt they consider they are making the very best of the job which has been entrusted to them, and that they are as a matter of fact doing the work as well as it can be done.

Vote agreed to.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £52,522, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for Expenditure in respect of Miscellaneous Legal Buildings, viz., County Courts, Metropolitan Police Courts, and Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland."

(5.8.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I am afraid I shall be obliged to put the Committee to the trouble of a Division on this Vote. The Committee will see that it includes a very large sum for the Metropolitan Police Court Buildings. It is the old question whether these Metropolitan Police Courts ought to be paid for by London or by the Imperial Exchequer. I have raised the point when Liberal and Conservative Ministries were in power, and before London got its County Council, and the reply I always got was, wait until London gets a County Council or some sort of Municipality. The very last year before the County Council was established the point was especially impressed upon the House, that as soon as the County Council was set up a new arrangement would be made. We have got a County Council, but we still have to pay for the Metropolitan Police Courts. It may be urged that in some sense some of the expenditure is Imperial. A little of the business at Bow Street is connected with extradition treaties and so on, and no doubt to that small extent the expenditure may be regarded as Imperial. Many of us represent towns in different parts of the country, and we know that our constituents have to pay for their own Police Courts. Why, in the name of goodness, should we be called upon to pay for our own and also for the Police Courts of the richest place in the entire country? Under the circumstances, and seeing that neither Liberal or Conservative Governments have kept faith in the pledges given, I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by £18,000, which will allow a little for the Imperial work at Bow Street.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Items G to K, for Metropolitan Police Court Buildings, be reduced by £18,000."
—(Mr. Labouchere.)

(5.13.) At this point Mr. COURTNEY returned to the Chair.

*MR. PLUNKET: Of course I am not going to enter into the general question whether or not these buildings ought to be maintained by the country at large or by the Metropolis itself. That is a question, no doubt, for discussion. The answer I have to give to the hon. Member is simply this, that I am an humble builder who must follow instructions, and the 17th and 18th Vic. cap. 94, authorises and commands me to provide these buildings.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No doubt the right hon. Gentleman is bound by Act of Parliament to provide these buildings, but if my Motion is carried the Parliament that gave him that authority will relieve him of it.

(5.16.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): The question is not as small as the Motion seems to indicate, and I desire to state the reason why I intend to vote against the proposed reduction. I am not prepared to vote for the transfer to the County Council of any expenditure on Metropolitan Police Courts or the Police, now incurred by this House, until the whole question of the control of the Metropolitan Police has been settled in the only way it can be settled, and that is by handing over that control to the County Council.

*(5.18.) MR. MORTON: I do not propose to discuss the question as to who should pay this money, although it is very hard that the people in the provinces should have to pay for their own Police Courts, and that the London Courts should be paid for out of the general purse. What I want to know, however, is whether the works in connection with the Wandsworth Police Court are to be completed. I understand that a site has been purchased. Is the building to be proceeded with at once?

(5.20.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 51; Noes 130.—(Div. List, No. 43.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. Labouchere

4. £18,062, to complete the sum for Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain.

*MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I desire to know whether the First Commissioner of Works can assure us that the New National Portrait Gallery is secure against fire, and also that the building is proof against damp. With regard to South Kensington, many friends of the Government expressed great regret two or three years ago that the Government could not do more for that institution, and especially for the building devoted to educational purposes. It is with great gratification, however, that they now notice that the Government have adopted a more liberal policy. There is a Vote this year for £100,000 for South Kensington. I trust that, having so well begun, and having occupied so worthy a position in connection with education, the Government will proceed further in the same direction. The point I am coming to now is in reference to South Kensington Museum. I think it is greatly to be regretted that that magnificent building, South Kensington Museum, should be left incomplete; that while some portions of the building are just cause of pride, other portions remain in that miserable condition in which they have stood for many years. In the course of last Session I called attention to one particular part of the building, the shed that adjoins the main building, the roof of which was in a hopelessly dilapidated state. Last autumn when I visited the museum and saw beautiful specimens of art from various parts of the country, which were being prepared for exhibition, so unsound was the state of the roof, that large portions of the floor and tables were marked out as being not safe to receive the drawings. Notwithstanding all the care thus exercised many drawings were seriously injured by wet. I cannot conceive anything more mortifying than for students to prepare drawings with much diligence and skill, and then to find them so little cared for or appreciated that they are injured in exhibition. Another point of more importance is the danger to the Museum itself. This building to which I have alluded is of such a character that it is full of inflammable material, and it might well take fire from negligence that could scarcely be called culpable. I do not think there is any warehouse in the country that is liable to such risk as this shed, to which I called attention last year. If a fire should break out the building must inevitably be destroyed, and a great body of fire will be called into existence to the extreme danger of the rest of the buildings. Although in theory the Museum itself is fireproof, we know what a great difference there is between theory and fact in these matters, and how buildings which are calculated to be fireproof are apt to succumb to the influence of fire by reason of some unsuspected crack or flaw in the ironwork, which makes your precautions vain, and so your building is destroyed and your collection perishes. I cannot conceive anything more discreditable to the administration of this country than to allow such a risk to the South Kensington Museum for the sake of the paltry saving over this shed. Other parts of the building are in a not more satisfactory condition; but this shed calls for special condemnation as a discredit to British art and an alarming danger to the Museum. I will not occupy time by going into the history of the South Kensington Museum, but I may be permitted to call attention to the fact that so long as seven years ago, when the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was in charge of the Department of Works, he placed on the Votes a sum of £5,000 as the beginning of the completion of what was then known as the South West Wing. He withdrew that Vote under pressure of debate in the early part of the Session, but he said he would replace it on the Estimates in the course of the Session. This was a distinct promise in 1883, but from that time until now no steps whatever have been taken, so far as I know. I feel great reluctance to occupy the time of the Committee now, for I know how valuable time is. I will content myself with saying that the condition of these buildings is a discredit to this country, and the continued postponement of the necessary work shows an uncertainty of policy which is a condemnation of our administration. I do hope that ere long fresh proposals will be made to the House towards completing the buildings, making them worthy of their purpose, and that, as a preliminary step, this shed may be taken in hand and rebuilt, so that we may have a place wherein to exhibit in safety those specimens of art sent up by our young students all over the country.

*(5.40.) MR. PLUNKET: Certainly my hon. Friend has no need to make any apology for the remarks he has addressed to us on a subject most interesting and important. I think that in a few words I can satisfy him. In the first place I can assure him that the building in which the National Portrait Gallery collection is housed at Bethnal Green is as carefully provided with every possible appliance to prevent danger from fire as any building can possibly be. I need scarcely say that in the new building about to be erected for the collection at the back of the National Gallery every care that experience and science can suggest for the exhibition, lighting, and security of the pictures will be taken. My hon. Friend has alluded to some imperfections in the roof of the South Kensington building and to damage caused to pictures there; but this damage, I think, was caused by the neglect of some of the attendants, who left the sky-light windows open, and allowed the rain to enter. Whatever imperfections in that roof there were have been set to rights. As to the larger question, my hon. Friend is aware that a few weeks ago we obtained, by a Supplementary Estimates, £100,000 for effectually improving the housing of the science and art collection at South Kensington, and I think my hon. Friend will accept that as an earnest of the goodwill of the present Government to carry out the objects he has at heart. We have undertaken the purchase of a large piece of land, and hope to make, if I may use the expression, a really good job of the whole thing for the future. No more time than is necessary will be occupied in the preparation of plans that will take the utmost advantage of the great acquisition of space secured, and my hon. Friend may rest assured that we are prepared to put the buildings on a proper and worthy footing.

(5.42.) DR. TANNER: There is one point to which I should like to call attention. By dint of continual questioning a certain amount of concession has been obtained. There was a great amount of protestation offered at the time we were urging that the British Museum should be thrown open in the evening, and much was said about the additional expense that would be incurred. I am glad to see that these forebodings have not been fulfilled. The British Museum is now opened in the evening, and I notice that under sub-head D, for maintenance and repairs, there is a decrease of £10. There is, I think, sufficient encouragement in this to justify our urging that the Government should go a step further. The Trustees have not incurred that large expense which it was alleged they would have to incur to make the concession to public opinion, and certainly I would hope that, seeing that in every way in which you approach the subject, the public would benefit by the opening of the Museum on Sunday—

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a question that should be raised on the Vote for Administration, not for the Maintenance of the building. The hon. Member should discuss the point he desires to raise when the Vote for Administration and Personnel comes forward.

DR. TANNER: In that case I will defer my observations.

Vote agreed to.

5. £33,993, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings.

(5.44.) MR. LABOUCHERE: This is one of the Votes we were anxious to have postponed, and there is one item in it really very important—£9,000 for the purchase of a site for building a house at Cairo. It can hardly be said that in the present condition of affairs we can discuss this matter just now; and what I would suggest is, that if the Vote is passed now, it should be understood it is without prejudice of any opinion we may have to express as to the purchase of this Cairo site, that we have in no way pledged ourselves, and that we may raise the question on Report.

*(5.45.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member would only be within his right in raising this question on Report; and, as he says, the passing of the Vote now is without prejudice to any Motion he may think it right to make on Report, when he will have full opportunity offered him for raising a discussion. I have explained the circumstances under which we are compelled to ask for the Vote, and those circumstances will equally hold good when we ask the House to confirm the Vote of the Committee.

Dr. Tanner

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did not hear them.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We are compelled to purchase the site, and the arrangement will lapse unless we complete the purchase within a given time.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The House may amend the Vote.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We must take our responsibility for that. The hon. Member will be perfectly within his right in moving the reduction of the Vote by £9,000, but I need not say the Government will adhere to the original sum, and we have no doubt the House will sustain us.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I only hope it will be fairly understood that we have not assented to it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall put it no higher than that the Committee has assented to the Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That is just it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall ask the House to approve the assent of the Committee. The hon. Member knows perfectly well that it is entirely within his right to move that the House shall disagree with the Committee to the extent of £9,000 or any other sum.

(5.47.) MR. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-on-Trent): I have no wish to waste time; but can the Government give us any information as to the increase under the head of new works for the Legations in China and Japan? The item is £5,200 this year; it was only £2,000 last year.

*(5.47.) MR. PLUNKET: As the hon. Member is aware, our relations with China and Japan are becoming very much more extended, and it has become more and more expedient, as the importance of our relations with these countries has increased, that our representatives should be placed in positions of dignity and comfort. Without going in detail into the work, which, in various places has been necessary, I may assure the hon. Member that this additional expense has been found to be absolutely necessary, and it is a not altogether unsatisfactory sign of increasing importance of our relations with these countries.

(5.48.) MR. W. REDMOND: Can the right hon. Gentleman explain the increased cost of the Legation at Tangiers? That which was last year £2,195 is increased this year to £6,200. For a place of this kind it would seem to me it is a disproportionate increase. Also I should like to have some explanation of items under Sub-head T, where there is a decrease from the estimate of last year for various Missions and Consulates. It appears to me that there are many places abroad where large sums of money are spent under this head without any returning advantage. I should like to know how the Government proceed in regard to this expenditure, whose estimate they act upon, and whether any tenders for the contracts are invited. It is fit matter for remark, I think, that we should be asked to sanction an increase of £4,000 on a place like Tangiers without an explanation.

*(5.49.) MR. PLUNKET: As to the Legation at Tangiers, that was a subject of discussion last year, and this is the carrying out of an undertaking I then explained which involved an expenditure of £9,000. The principle we proceed upon, when it becomes necessary to sanction additional expenditure, is where it is practicable to send a surveyor to make personal investigation as to value. We have an officer who is frequently employed in such work. The necessity (Tangiers) has arisen from reasons I need not now go into again. Shortly, I may say that the growth of Native building around the old house has rendered it unfit for the habitation of our Representative.

Vote agreed to.

6. £281,465, to complete the sum for Revenue Department Buildings, Great Britain.

7. £176,000, to complete the sum for Surveys of the United Kingdom..

8. £17,375, to complete the sum for Harbours and Lighthouses Abroad under the Board of Trade.

(5.22.) MR. W. REDMOND: I understood the First Lord to say that he would be satisfied if the first eight Votes were taken.

*(5.22.) MR. W. H. SMITH: No. I said it was absolutely necessary that the first eight Votes should be taken because of the contracts to which I referred; but there were other Votes I mentioned as being of a character that would not occupy much time, and these I asked the Committee to take before the Adjournment. That was the understanding.

(5.53.) MR. W. REDMOND: It appears, then, that I was mistaken. The right hon. Gentleman asks us to take these Votes as being of a non-contentious character, but that does not apply to Vote 10. Occasion arises for a short discussion upon Holyhead Harbour, upon which item there is an increase of £4,702, due to the repair of damages caused by storm. Upon this matter questions have been addressed to the Government, and I am aware that great dissatisfaction has been expressed as to the manner in which works on the breakwater at Holyhead have been carried out. I am not, myself, prepared to state the case; but I know there is much to be said on the subject by Members not now present, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to allow the Vote to stand over, or to give an undertaking that a full opportunity for discussion shall be given on Report.

*(5.55.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry that I am unable to consent to a postponement; but, undoubtedly, there will be an opportunity on Report for the hon. Member and his friends to make such observations as they may think fit. I am in the recollection of the House when I say that I distinctly stated that I must ask the Committee to continue until these Votes were taken.

Vote agreed to.

9. £25,040, to complete the sum for Peterhead Harbour.

10. £4,000, to complete the sum for Caledonian Canal.

11. £156,453, to complete the sum for rates on Government property.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday 14th April.

Committee to sit again upon Monday 14th April.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1890-91.

CLASS 1.

Resolutions [31st March] reported.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £31,725, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces and Marlborough House."

(6.0.) MR. W. REDMOND: I think before the House agrees to this Resolution we ought to have a promise from the Government that they will endeavour to lessen the expenditure on the unoccupied Royal Palaces. As I said last night, we do not complain of proper provision being made for proper Palaces for members of the Royal Family, but it does seem a monstrous thing that year after year thousands of pounds should be expended upon Royal Palaces that members of the Royal Family never occupy. At least, I think an undertaking should be given that inquiry shall be made with a view to the reduction of this expenditure. I do not see why the Government should not undertake to appoint a Committee on the subject. I am quite sure there is much dissatisfaction caused throughout the country as public attention is drawn year after year to the large sums of money the House of Commons is called upon to vote for buildings that serve no public purpose whatever, and I think the Government should give an undertaking that they will endeavour to practise economy under this Vote.

*(6.5.) MR. PLUNKET: Certainly; I can give an undertaking that I will always do my best to reduce expenditure under this Vote, and every other Vote for which I am responsible. So far as I am concerned, the hon. Gentleman may rest assured I will give my best attention to the matter.

MR. W. REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman give a Committee?

Resolution agreed to.

2. "That a sum, not exceeding £78,775, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

(6.10.) MR. W. REDMOND: I cannot lose the opportunity of expressing my strong opinion that a great many of these Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens might, without any detriment to their use by the Royal Family, be thrown open to the public. I may mention, for instance, Hampton Court Park and the grounds of Buckingham Palace. These last, I believe, are extensive, and I am assured on good authority are never used. It is only reasonable, of course, that while Her Majesty is in residence at Buckingham Palace the public should be excluded; but for a great part of the year the Palace is empty, and then the grounds might be thrown open to the public. Open spaces in London are not so many that this would not be a great boon to the people, and I cannot help thinking that Her Majesty would not object to her people having an entry to the grounds during her absence from London. There is no intention whatever of encroaching unwarrantably on the privileges of those who have special claims to the enjoyment of the Royal Parks, but surely it is not an unreasonable request that the people who contribute nearly £100,000 towards the maintenance of the Parks should have some share in the enjoyment.

*(6.15.) MR. MORTON: Several questions were put last night in relation to this Vote to which no answers were given for want of time, and, perhaps, we may have the answers to-day. I asked whether in future the expenses of St. James's Park, the Green Park, and Hyde Park could be kept separate. I also wished to know the functions of the bailiff of the Royal Parks. He appears to be a military officer, but I cannot understand what his duties are. Then I find a large expenditure for the Rangers' Department, and I ask why this expenditure when we have a large item for police. Then I asked for an explanation of the item on page 12—£96 for allowances in lieu of fees. If fees are abolished and you then make allowances out of the public money, I do not see much gain in the result.

Resolution agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
(PLEURO-PNEUMONIA) BILL.—(No. 168.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(6.18.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): It has been arranged that this Bill shall be taken to-night, and I will, therefore, explain its object very shortly. The Bill proposes to confer upon the Board of Agriculture further powers for the purpose of dealing with pleuro-pneumonia, which has previously been dealt with by Local Authorities under various Acts of Parliament and Orders in Council. Most stringent measures have been taken, and large sums of money expended for cattle which have been slaughtered, and great expenses have been incurred by the various Local Authorities, but without any adequate result, owing to a want of uniformity of action, which experience has taught it is almost impossible to obtain. Under these circumstances, it seems impossible and useless to persevere with a system which has involved so many sacrifices without satisfactory results. If that is so, one alternative is that we should altogether abandon the hope of ever getting rid of that disease. That would be a most unfortunate conclusion, for the example of the Netherlands shows the possibility of extirpating the disease. By the Bill it is proposed that there shall be placed at the disposal of the Board of Agriculture a sum of money which it is hoped will obviate the necessity of trenching on local resources. The adoption of this principle is, I think, absolutely necessary, because the Local Authorities cannot be expected to submit to a large and wholly unlimited expenditure of their funds by a Central Department over which they will have no control. It is further provided in the Bill, in view of the possibility of a deficiency arising, that it is in the case of Great Britain to be met out of the local taxation accounts of England and Scotland respectively in the proportions mentioned in the Bill, which are the same as those in which the Probate

Duty is distributed. I am aware objection may be taken to that on the ground that it interferes with the allocation of moneys already provided for certain specific local purposes, and also that a county perfectly free from disease may be called upon to contribute. On the other hand, it should be remembered, first of all, that the risk is very remote. It has been impossible to obtain an accurate estimate; but on the best estimate we could get, I have every reason to hope that the risk of calling upon local resources will be very remote. In the second place, if the localities are called upon to pay, it will be a fractional amount, considering that the whole deficiency would be distributed among all the different counties; and, in the third place, it must be remembered that although there are now a great number of counties entirely free from the disease, they are all liable to it at any moment. In view of the great advantages they are going to receive, they may be well content to bear the infinitesimal risk to be thrown upon them. Ireland will be treated separately under the Bill, and the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council will be substituted for the Board of Agriculture. A sum will be provided by the Imperial Exchequer, and any deficiency will be met out of the General Cattle Disease Fund, which is already in existence and which has been frequently used for that purpose. I hope I have described clearly, if briefly, the objects of this Bill, and the means by which it is intended to carry them out. I sincerely hope the House will allow the Bill to be now read a second time. It is a Bill with regard to which the Government have received numerous appeals and petitions from various parts of the country, and I think there is a general wish that it shall now be read a second time. If there is any objection to it in point of detail that can be dealt with in Committee. I move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Henry Chaplin.)

(6.24.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I conclude that the House is in favour of this Bill being read a second time to-day. I do not therefore oppose the Bill; but I wish to guard the House against being committed to everything it contains. Some of its provisions will, no doubt, have to be discussed in Committee. The Bill arms the Agricultural Department with very large powers in order to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia. I believe that the only way to effect the object of the Bill is by the pole-axe, as has been proved by the experience of the Netherlands. Not only should all the cattle affected be slaughtered, but everything which has been brought into contact with them should be destroyed also. It has been a long, painful, and expensive process in the Netherlands, but it has been successful; and I believe that if the powers in the Bill are courageously acted upon their object will be attained.

(6.25.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I hail the Bill with satisfaction, and congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having so well signalled his accession to office. I have the honour to represent in this House a cattle breeding and feeding county; and I may say that great inconvenience has been experienced in Aberdeenshire owing to the various Local Authorities not being equally strict in their enforcement of the Acts and Orders. We know perfectly well that pleuro-pneumonia is not a disease which springs up spontaneously, and I believe the prospects of stamping it out will be much increased if the provisions of this Bill are properly carried out.

(6.27.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I am hardly so sanguine as my right hon. Friend, who apparently wants to slaughter everything and everybody happening to be brought into contact with a diseased animal. It should not be forgotten that there is a remedy short of extermination. In some of our Colonies the disease has been stamped out by means of inoculation, which is a much less expensive process. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give a reasonable time before the Committee stage is taken.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 24th April.

Resolutions agreed to.
Mr. Mundella

SOUTH INDIAN RAILWAY PURCHASE BILL.—(No. 195.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday, 14th April.

CRIMINAL LAW PROCEDURE AMEND- MENT BILL.—(No. 95.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(6.28.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist at this hour in pressing forward the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH: The whole of the Bill, except one point, has been practically accepted by the Government. As I am willing to abandon that point, I hope the Government will allow the Second Reading to pass. To utilise spare minutes such as these is the only chance that a private Member has of passing a Bill; and I think it is rather hard that, in such circumstances as I have mentioned, the Government should bar its further progress. If the Government intend to adhere to that course, then I am ready to challenge a Division. I will strike out every portion of the Bill to which the Government takes objection.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Then I assent to the Second Reading.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 14th April.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMEND- MENT (RE-COMMITTED) BILL.—(No. 200.)

Ordered, That the Bill, as amended, be printed. [Bill 220.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved, That this House, at the conclusion of the Morning Sitting, this day, do adjourn till Monday 14th April.—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Seven o'clock til Monday, 14th April

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 14th April, 1890.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

ST. MARTIN'S-IN-THE-FIELDS
ELECTRIC LIGHTING BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) moved that the Order for the Second Reading be read and discharged, and that the Bill be withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading be read and discharged, and that the Bill be withdrawn."

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): As my name appears on the Paper in connection with a notice of opposition to this Bill, I wish to explain the reasons which induced me to give it. I know that very strong reasons ought to be given to justify the House in rejecting a Private Bill on the Second Reading, because there is always an opportunity of having the measure fully discussed before a Select Committee. But the House is aware that Bills relating to electric lighting can be proceeded with by way of Provisional Order. In this case the authorities of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields have not taken the trouble to ask for a Provisional Order, but have introduced a Private Bill. They have now withdrawn their Bill; but I think they ought to have given earlier notice of their intention to withdraw it. Notice was only given this morning, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I have come up expressly from the North for the purpose of opposing the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

HEREDITARY PENSIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is now in a position to state, or whether he will be able to lay upon the Table a Minute showing, the course he intends to pursue with respect to the several perpetual and hereditary pensions, payments, and allowances still uncommuted, and as to which a Select Committee of this House, in 1887, unanimously reported in favour of their abolition?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have now received a completed Report from the Law Officers with regard to the several perpetual and hereditary pensions, &c., still uncommuted; but, owing to the preparation of the Budget, I have not yet been able to give to the subject that personal attention which is indispensable to its proper consideration.

IRISH ORDNANCE SURVEY MAPS.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the serious and numerous errors in the Irish Ordnance Survey Maps now being issued, such as for example, sheet 168, inch scale, extensions of Waterford and Limerick Railway opened in 1864 and 1886 not marked; two guide banks, one with lighthouse in River Suir, made 1867 (marked in chart of the river) not marked; about one and a half miles of new road between Waterford and Passage opened in 1855, not marked; Knockaderry Reservoir made in 1875, not marked; sheet 179, inch scale, embankments, reclaiming land near Tramore made in 1863 or 1864, and one mile of cliff road near Lady's Cove, Tramore made in 1869, not marked; sheet 9 (County Waterford) 6-inch scale, People's Park made about 1855, and new court house built about 1855, not marked; whether the Government are taking any action to promptly correct these and similar mistakes in other maps; and whether there is any reason why the Government should not revert to the old plan of supplying maps direct from the Survey Office in the Phoenix Park, so as to save the public the heavy expense of a special messenger there when the Dublin agents are out of stock of sheets required by return post?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincoln, Sleaford): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question. The practice of the Ordnance Survey is to insert new railways only on the 1-inch sheets. The insertion of other details, such as new roads, reservoirs, buildings, &c., on the 1-inch and larger scales, forms part of the general revision of the country. The necessity for completing the cadastral survey of those parts of England and Wales which have hitherto had no map on a larger scale than 1-inch to a mile has been so urgent that it has been impossible to devote as much of the Survey Vote as is desirable to the revision of the Irish maps. This year, however, a considerable increase has been sanctioned in the funds available for the survey of Ireland, and it is hoped that the work in that country will proceed more rapidly. With reference to the last paragraph, contracts for the sale of Ordnance Survey maps have been made with three firms to act as sole agents in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. The Director of the Survey is of opinion that the system is not satisfactory, and when a favourable opportunity occurs it will be carefully considered.

R

IMPORTATION OF MOSS LITTER

MR. YOUNG (Christchurch): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Customs officers have the right, and whether it is their practice, to examine every tenth bale of moss litter imported into this country by cutting it through the centre, thereby rendering it unsaleable; and whether any steps can be taken to modify this practice, so as to protect the consignee of such goods from injury as far as possible?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; the Customs officers certainly have the right to examine any imported package. But I am advised that it is not their practice to cut through every tenth bale. What they actually do is to examine by boring, a different operation from cutting through, 8 or 10 per cent. of the bales, and to investigate about 2 per cent. more by opening.

THE QUINN BEQUEST.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General why there is so great delay in the matter of the "Quinn Bequest" for Newry?

Mr. Chaplin

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. and learned Member, I have to say that there has been no great or unusual delay in the matter to which his question refers. The settlement of schemes of this kind always occupies a certain amount of time. In the month of November of last year I took all the steps in my power to expedite matters. The scheme was settled early this year, and has been deposited in order that suggestions from the locality may be received and considered. The matter is now well advanced, and I hope that it will be completed before Whitsuntide. I would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman, as he is well aware, that I have not the conduct of the matter.

THE CIRCUS ROAD POST OFFICE.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it has been decided to move the Circus Road Branch Post and Telegraph Office from its present central position to St. John's Wood Terrace, where it will be much less convenient for the public, being away from the main road; and whether the owner of the premises in Circus Road is willing to grant extended accommodation at a fair rent?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): It has been decided to move the Circus Road Branch Post Office to 104, St. John's Wood Terrace. The new position will be about 150 yards further from Wellington Road; but it will, I hope, be found reasonably convenient for the neighbourhood generally. The owner of the Circus Road premises was willing to add an adjoining house, but the accommodation would not have been satisfactory, and the increase of rent would have been unduly large.

SECOND DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, with reference to the adjustments of increments and payments of arrears to the new Second Division clerks in connection with the conversion of triennial into annual increments, it is a fact that fractions, amounting in many cases to nearly the complete pound, have been excluded from such calculations, resulting in losses in these instances both immediately and annually; and whether, in view of this, he will remedy this grievance and cause these arrears of increments to be calculated to the nearest pound?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It is true that, in accordance with the directions contained in the recent Order in Council, fractions of a pound are omitted in converting the triennial increments of Second Division clerks into annual increments. No power is reserved to the Treasury to modify these directions.

VACCINATION RETURNS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Return "Vaccination Acts (persons imprisoned, &c.)" is incomplete, and, if so, in what respect; and if he can state the reasons for such incompleteness; whether he can inform the House why no mention is made of persons imprisoned or fined at Edmonton Petty Sessions; and why the County of Middlesex is entirely omitted?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; this Return is incomplete in so far as by inadvertence Returns from the Petty Sessional Courts of Middlesex as well as from the Metropolitan Police Courts is not included. The County of Middlesex are not, however, entirely omitted. It is represented in the Return from the Metropolitan Police Court Districts. Steps have been taken to obtain the necessary statistics from these Petty Sessional Courts, and the Return will be supplemented with the now missing particulars at the earliest possible date.

TELEGRAMS TO FRANCE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the fact that telegrams are charged for throughout France at the rate of less than $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per word, and that throughout the United Kingdom, even between the South-East of England and across St. George's Channel to the North-West of Ireland, the charge is $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per word, he will open negotiations for a reduction of the charge for telegraphic messages from England to France to 1d. per word, in place of 2d., the present rate?

MR. RAIKES: No, Sir.

AMERICA—HONG KONG POSTAL CHARGES.

MR. H. HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the postage from the British Settlement of Hong Kong to the United States of America is 5d. per half-ounce, and from the United States to Hong Kong $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. per half-ounce; and whether he will consider the feasibility of lowering the postal charge from Hong Kong to the United States to $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. per half-ounce?

MR. RAIKES: The explanation is that for which I have so often had to claim the indulgence of the House for the gratification of the hon. Member. The United States is one of the countries of the Postal Union which do not choose to avail themselves of the option reserved by the Convention to charge a surtax over and above the fundamental rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ d. on letters carried long distances by sea. The Colony of Hong Kong is within its Treaty rights in pursuing the contrary course and charging a surtax; and I should not, I conceive, be warranted in interfering in the matter.

IRELAND—EVICTIONS ON THE SWEENEY ESTATE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with regard to the abandoned, or postponed, evictions on the Sweeney Estate, in the County of Donegal, whether any communication was recently made on the part of the Irish Government to the landlord of that estate, urging him to proceed with the evictions?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): It is not the fact that any communication has recently been made by the Irish Government urging the landlord of this estate not to proceed with the evictions.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether there has been any communication with the landlord urging him not to press on the evictions?

tleman that the whole of the facts appeared in the newspapers, and I must refer him to them.

MAIL CONTRACT (LONDON AND EAST COAST OF AFRICA) (ZANZIBAR).

Copy ordered—

"Of Contract with the British India Steam Navigation Company, dated the 5th day of February, 1890, for the conveyance of Mails between London and East Coast of Africa (Zanzibar), together with a Copy of the Treasury Minute relating thereto."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copy presented accordingly ; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 122.]

SUCK DRAINAGE [PROVISION OF FUNDS].

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of a portion of the Costs, Charges, and Expenses which have been or may be incurred by the Drainage Board for the River Suck Drainage District (Queen's Recommendation signified), To-morrow.

CONTRACTS WITH FOREIGNERS.

Return ordered—

"Of all Contracts for Articles of Home Manufacture made in the United Kingdom by the several Government Departments, between the 1st day of April, 1889, and the 31st day of March, 1890, with Contractors outside the Kingdom (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 215, of Session 1889)."—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

MOTION.

EDUCATION CODE (1890) BILL.

On Motion of Sir William Hart Dyke, Bill for the purpose of making operative certain Articles in the Education Code, 1890, ordered to be brought in by Sir William Hart Dyke, Lord George Hamilton, and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 222.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INLAND REVENUE REGULATION BILL.

(No. 211.)

SECOND READING.

(3.50.) Order for Second Reading read.

MR. JACKSON: I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill, which is a consolidation Bill pure and simple, with the exception of four minor points, which are stated in the Memorandum issued with the Bill. The Government have been pressed to introduce the measure, and, having taken the usual means of ascertaining the feeling on both sides of the House, they find that the course now proposed, namely, to read it a second time and refer it to a Standing Committee, is generally acceptable.

Mr. Matthews

MR. W. REDMOND: Is it the fact that the Bill was circulated only this morning?

MR. JACKSON: No; it was circulated before Easter.

Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Bill be referred to the Select Committee on Statute Law Revision," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES 1890-1.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS V.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £307,909, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad, and of the Consular Establishments Abroad and other Expenditure chargeable on the Consular Vote."

(4.2.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I think, Mr. Courtney, that as we have made great progress with the Estimates at this early period of the Session, it is obvious that we shall have more time for entering into this Vote than we have usually had. The First Lord of the Treasury has said that we shall have another opportunity of discussing these questions. I hope that we shall have many opportunities, because it is a Vote which requires careful looking into. I find that the first item of the Vote has reference to the Argentine Republic, and that the Legation and Consulate at Buenos Ayres cost £4,500 a year; but the Committee will be surprised to hear that the cost of a similar mission at Uruguay is something like £1,750 less. The cause of the difference is the tomfooleries in which we indulge at Buenos Ayres and abstain from indulging in at Monte Video. So far as Europe is concerned, there may be some justification for having these Legations, but in South America there cannot be the slightest justification for them. In South America the people are practical people, and they do not understand the difference between a Consul General, an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, and a Vice Consul. They go to the Consulate solely for the business purposes they have to transact. There are very few social duties involved, and if the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs will look into the matter he will find that the Argentine Republic is the sole Republic in South America which enjoys the presence of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. As I find that it costs £2,750 more per annum than any other Mission in South America, I propose to move the reduction of the Vote by that sum, which will leave the expense of our representation in the Argentine Republic at the same figure as for Uruguay, and more than it is at some of the other Republics.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £305,159, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): May I ask, as the general practice is to move the reduction of particular items in a Vote, whether, if the present Amendment is taken, it will be competent for an hon. Member to move a further reduction?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not think that the effect of my Amendment will be to prevent further discussion of the Vote or Motions for further reductions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) is quite right in the view he takes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Then it will be competent to move further reductions?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes, certainly.

*(4.7.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The question which the hon. Member for Northampton has just raised is one which he raised two years ago, and I am afraid that I can only give him the answer which I gave then, and which is equally applicable now, namely, that the raising of the post of Her Majesty's representative at Buenos Ayres to the dignity which now attaches to it was in conformity with the recommendation of the Consular Committee which sat in 1870. It is most necessary that Her Majesty's Government should be efficiently represented, and the expense which is entailed is by no means excessive. The hon. Member says that we should be as well represented by a Consular Officer as by a Diplomatic Minister, but that is not the opinion of foreign countries, and we should be placed in an inferior position to that which is occupied by Foreign Powers if we were not represented at the Argentine Republic in as dignified a manner as they are. In regard to the Argentine Republic there have been special reasons why we should have been led to increase our establishment there, owing to the great amount of emigration to that country from Ireland which has recently taken place, and to which attention has been specially directed by hon. Members opposite. The complaint which has been made is that British and Irish interests have not been adequately safeguarded, and therefore Her Majesty's Government have slightly increased the establishment in order to meet the extra work. I trust that these will be considered sufficient reasons to justify this Vote, and that it will be agreed to without further discussion.

(4.12.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not think that we ought to be bound by the recommendation of a Committee which sat in 1870. I have read the Report of that Committee, and I certainly do not think much of it. I must say that I think the right hon. Gentleman is almost trifling with the House when he says that emigration from Ireland to Buenos Ayres really necessitates the continuance there of double the number of gentlemen to those who are required in Monte Video. Of course, it is possible to get hold of a gentleman who has been in the Diplomatic Service at Darmstadt or St. Petersburg, who has been mixing in courtly society there, and who probably has never seen South America in his life. If such a man is sent out he would probably ask to be surrounded by an expensive staff, and in this case I find that we have a Minister at £1,500 a year, a Secretary of Legation at £500 a year, a second Secretary at £450, together with a clerk at £200, who probably does more work than the Minister and the first and second Secretaries put together. That is not all. At Monte Video all the work is consular work, and so far as the emigration work at Buenos Ayres is concerned it is purely consular, and not diplomatic, work. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that we carry out the same principle all over South America? He knows that we do not. There are a considerable number of Republics in South America where France and other Powers retain Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, but where we have simply Consular Agents; but it is a remarkable fact that when you once put up the salary and the position they always continue. There is really no reason why in the Argentine Republic, any more than in any other of the Republics of South America, we should have the expensive mechanism which is attached to the office of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. I shall certainly divide the Committee upon the Amendment, in order to make it clear that we are not prepared, year after year, to vote for this useless and unnecessary expenditure, simply because a Committee which sat in 1870 thought it desirable.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In certain cases, as in Stuttgart, where a Minister is no longer deemed necessary, the post has been done away with, and in others the office of Minister and Consul General has been united, but in the case of the Argentine Republic, the case is different, inasmuch as the increasing demands of British interests make it necessary that this country should be adequately represented. There are, indeed, reasons connected with emigration which have rendered an increase in the Argentine establishment necessary, and under this head provision has been made in the Vote.

(4.17.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): May I ask what has been and is being done by these gentlemen in the interests of Irish emigrants? What services do they perform to entitle them to the large sum we are asked to vote, and what are the qualifications they possess for the discharge of the duties? So far as I know, complaints are continually coming from the Argentine Republic, in spite of the presence of our representative there, and I believe I am correct in saying that in Ireland the people at large have no knowledge of any special efforts which are being made to protect Irish interests, or of any Reports on the subject.

Mr. Labouchere

(4.20.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the Papers which were furnished on the subject last year. There is no ground for reproach or blame of the kind suggested, and Her Majesty's Representative is assiduous in attending to the interests of British and Irish immigrants, as well as to all the other duties of his post.

(4.22.) MR. W. REDMOND: That is not the complaint. What I contend is that officers could be found who would be quite as zealous and as determined to do their duty for a much less sum than we are asked to vote for these gentlemen. It is precisely because I think we were shown last year that there was something radically wrong in the management of the affairs of emigrants to the Argentine Republic arriving from Ireland, that I made up my mind to come here and repeat what I had said before. I think that the salaries should be cut down by at least one half, and I would certainly urge the hon. Member for Northampton to divide the Committee on the subject. It is simply monstrous that this country should be asked to pay £4,500 a year for a Mission to the Argentine Republic.

(4.25.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I do not think the Under Secretary has told the Committee the whole story in connection with the Consular Service in the Argentine Republic. I believe our representative, Mr. Bridgett, was absent on leave for a considerable time in 1888, and that Mr. Ibbetson, who was appointed Acting Consul in his place, was subsequently sentenced to three months imprisonment for embezzling the consular fees. Another officer, Mr. W. G. Turner, who acted as clerk and pro-Consul, was also charged with embezzlement, and absconded. He was arrested in England and sentenced to a month's imprisonment for misbehaviour in office. Mr. Bridgett seems to have been absent from his duties from the early part of 1888 until a late period in the same year, and it is a matter of some interest to know how the affairs of the Mission were conducted in his absence, and what is the exact condition of the Consulate at Buenos Ayres at the present moment. It would appear that at least £500 was embezzled by Mr. Bridgett's immediate or indirect official representative, and the whole of the Mission appears to have been in an exceedingly lax condition. In this case responsibility cannot be traced; an officer has been absent from an important post for six or eight months, Papers which ought to have been sent to the Foreign Office have not been sent and they have been called for in vain. Nevertheless, the Estimates are proposed to be increased in favour of a Mission of this kind. I think the Committee ought to receive some special information on the points I have indicated before they consent to pass the Vote.

*(4.27.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: It frequently happens that Consular Officers require leave, in which case their places are filled by efficient substitutes.

MR. W. REDMOND: Who are irresponsible.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Consul is still responsible to Her Majesty's Government. As to the arrival of emigrants, unfortunately it occurred that after one ship arrived full of emigrants another arrived on the following day, when the barracks for emigrants were full. Immediate steps were, however, taken to afford accommodation.

(4.28.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I must say that I think the right hon. Gentleman has failed to answer the extremely able speech of the hon. Member for Northampton. The hon. Member showed that he was more than justified in calling attention to the subject, for the debate has developed the fact that, both in regard to the Legation and the Consulate, the arrangements have led to embezzlement and to the discharge of the duties of the Mission in a manner which ought to receive the reprobation of this House. So far as the emigration to the Argentine Republic is concerned, I think that those who intended to emigrate should have received information as to what the real condition of things was before they left Ireland, so that they might have decided upon not emigrating at all, or upon postponing their journey until a more convenient season. I can only say that in the South of Ireland, from which a considerable amount of emigration took place, there has been a feeling of exasperation at the manner in which the emigrants have been treated. When people are proposing to leave their homes and their country, perhaps for ever, they ought to be informed what the actual condition of the country in which they intend to take refuge is. The Under Secretary, unfortunately, has given no answer whatever to the complaints which have been made, but has rather confirmed the reprobation of my hon. Friends. It is quite true that the hon. Member for Northampton made these complaints two years ago, but although attention is called to the misdeeds of the Government year after year the officials have still no answer to give.

(4.30.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman can hold out any hope that the Emigration Information Office can cope with the questions which have arisen in reference to emigration to the Argentine Republic. It is clear that persons have been holding out to the world that they are authorised by the Government of the Argentine Republic to make promises, which are afterwards repudiated by that Government, and that, as a result, persons who have gone out as emigrants have had difficulties of the most serious character in obtaining employment. I think a great deal of the distress that has occurred might have been prevented if proper information could have been furnished to emigrants with regard to the Argentine Republic.

*(4.32.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am very happy to be able to satisfy the hon. Member. There is no difficulty at all in procuring and circulating information about foreign countries in the way he mentions, and during the last year and a half I have been constantly sending to the Emigration Information Office information about the Argentine Republic and other countries. Circulars have been sent to all British representatives, asking them to furnish information that may be useful to persons purposing emigration, and I am sure the excellent office to which I have referred does circulate the information with which we have furnished it about the Argentine Republic. The emigration in question took place in spite of the standing advice given by the most influential people in Ireland, namely, Archbishop Croke and many of the Catholic clergy.

(4.33.) MR. BRADLAUGH: The Emigration Information Office issues very cheap sheets of information about several countries, but I do not know that they have issued any such sheet with reference to some countries with regard to which information might very well be given. I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that there is likely to be a larger tide of emigration from Italy to the Argentine Republic, and if some cheap sheets could be published, like those issued with regard to our colonies, a great deal of misery might be prevented.

*(4.34.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will make inquiries at the Emigration Office, and ascertain whether the hon. Member's suggestion can be carried out.

(4.34.) MR. W. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman has not told us how it is the Representatives of this country in the Argentine Republic have not warned Her Majesty's Government officially of the danger of large numbers of emigrants going there. Information ought to have been furnished as to the way in which emigrants get on in the Argentine Republic. We pay large sums of money to our Representatives, but we are unable to get from them the reliable information we need as to the characteristics of the country. We are obliged to depend upon the information furnished privately to Archbishop Croke and other gentlemen who take an interest in the welfare of emigrants abroad. If proper official information had been forthcoming people would not have gone to the Argentine Republic from Ireland in the numbers they did. If the right hon. Baronet can say that representations came from Her Majesty's Minister warning intending emigrants against the Argentine Republic, and hinting that they would have to face considerable difficulties if they went there, that Minister might be said to have earned the large sum of money he gets. But no such representations were made—or, if there were such, they did not reach the Irish people. What I say is that if we are to pay £4,000 a year to Representatives of Her Majesty's Government in the Argentine Republic, let them properly earn it, and do not let them leave it to Irish Archbishops to do their work.

Sir J. Fergusson

*(4.42.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Representative in the Argentine Republic did exactly what the hon. Member says he should have done. As soon as he heard that large numbers of emigrants were being persuaded to go there, he, of his own accord, wrote home accounts of the country, which were disseminated. But it is a mistake to suppose that emigrants to the Argentine Republic, on the whole, do badly. What Her Majesty's Representative pointed out was that owing to the cost of living and to the different manner in which Southern races are fed emigrants leaving the United Kingdom for the Argentine Republic would not find themselves so well off on reaching there as they do on arriving at such places as Australia. Nevertheless, the emigrants in many parts of the Republic, where the climate is good, find themselves fairly well off. As I said last year when this question was raised, some of the emigrants went to places which were not suited to them, and some of them were thriftless and not industrious, and no credit to their own country.

(4.44.) MR. W. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman says that Her Majesty's Representative sent information to this country as soon as he heard that large numbers of emigrants were going to the Argentine Republic, and that that information was disseminated. I must take exception to that statement. These warnings did not reach the Irish Representatives—they were not circulated in Ireland. What we complain of is that Her Majesty's Representative in the Argentine Republic allowed unscrupulous emigration agents to come to Ireland, and by false pretences induce large numbers of people to emigrate. The right hon. Gentleman says that some of the emigrants were not good specimens of their race; but that is no reason why unscrupulous persons should have been allowed to induce them to emigrate, and why no adequate preparations should have been made to receive them in the Argentine Republic. So far as Ireland is concerned, I think we have been badly represented in the Republic, and have every reason to complain of our treatment there. I trust the Amendment will be pushed to a Division.

*(4.46.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I desire to know whether, when these gentlemen are appointed to represent this country abroad, care is taken that they have adequate knowledge of the language of the people amongst whom they have to live, so that they may not be at the mercy of the permanent local officials?

*(4.47.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not able to say whether or not our Representative in the Argentine Republic can speak Spanish, but I think it likely, and he is a very capable man.

(4.47.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: The answer the right hon. Gentleman gave me just now was not correct. Certain financial irregularities occurred at the particular place I mentioned. The Consul was absent for eight months at a stretch, and left no one responsible in his place. The man who acted for him was fraudulent. This Consul had had experience of embezzlements in previous years, and the person guilty had been punished and the amount of the embezzlements lost altogether. On the second occasion the Consul himself was made responsible, but only for a portion of the money, and the public have to bear a loss of at least £500. I want to know why he is not required to pay the whole of the money lost through his own negligence? What attempt is being made to secure that the administration in this Consular Office will be better in the future than it has been in the past? The right hon. Gentleman ought to be able to give me a definite answer.

*(4.51.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: The question the hon. Member asks me is as to an event not very recent.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: It only occurred last August.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: At any rate it is easy to see how one might be inaccurate in a singular particular. I was under the impression that the Consul had borne the whole of the loss. At all events, he has borne a considerable part of it, and I have no doubt that when the circumstances were considered by the Secretary of State and the Treasury it was held that he was not so blameable that he ought to be required to bear the whole of the loss. Though a public servant, as a rule, is responsible for the robbery of a person he puts in his place, there may be circumstances under which the responsibility is diminished. I admit that at the present time I cannot give all the reasons which bear on the case, but it must be remembered that Consuls have not an extraordinary amount of leave, and that there has been no irregularity in the circumstance that a person not in the public service was temporarily charged with these duties.

(4.55.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 66; Noes 124.—(Div. List, No. 44.)

Original Question again proposed.

(5.3.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The next item relates to Austria, and I find we maintain a chaplain to the Ambassador at Vienna, at a cost of £300 per annum. The law in regard to these chaplains is somewhat singular. Where there is a Consul the Foreign Office is permitted to give the equivalent of any amount which is subscribed by the British residents. The object of this was to enable chaplains to exist at ports. But it appears that now it is carried further, for we find occasionally that where there is a Legation or Embassy in a town in the interior, a salary is granted towards a chaplain. I do not gather whether this £300 is given to the chaplain because any amount is subscribed by the English residents at Vienna. There are exceedingly few English at Vienna, and I do not quite understand why we should have a chaplain there. There is not a chaplain in Paris or in Berlin. We know that Sir Henry Drummond Wolff was very strong in the House in his advocacy of Christianity, but now he is amongst the Mahomedans in Persia, yet he does not require a chaplain. Then why should a chaplain be required for the Ambassador in Austria? I presume the chaplain belongs to the Church of England, but we might send a Roman Catholic, or a Jew, or a Nonconformist to Vienna. Or it may be that some of the secretaries there are Jews or Nonconformists. Are they to have separate chaplains? The whole thing is nonsensical; it is contrary to the elementary principles of religious toleration. The Ambassador is highly paid, and if he wants a chaplain to conduct divine service for himself on Sundays, let him pay him out of his salary. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £300 in respect of the chaplain in Vienna.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £307,609 be granted for the said Services."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

*(5.6.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: The number of chaplains abroad is not as great as it formerly was; it has been reduced by a number of cases where there did not appear sufficient reason for the maintenance of chaplains. The particular chaplaincy to which the hon. Gentleman has called attention has existed since 1817, and the church in which the chaplain ministers was not erected at the cost of the British public, but of private subscriptions, and the Government undertook no responsibility in regard to its maintenance. The reason for appointing this chaplain in connection with the Vienna Embassy was the very strong desire on the part of the British subjects there for the ministrations of a clergyman of the National Church. [HON. MEMBERS: "What Church?"] Well, the Church of the majority. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, oh!" and "Which majority?"] Of course, I do not wish to incite debate on such controversial points, but the reason for appointing a chaplain in connection with the Embassy was, and is, that there is an Austrian law which requires pastors of churches recognised by the State to be Austrian subjects. By this clergyman being attached to the Embassy he is exempted from the operation of that law. I hope that the existence of this chaplain is, on the whole, very beneficial to many who, though they do belong to the Anglican communion, may find comfort in attending to his services. The Committee are aware that at Alexandria a Scotch chaplain is retained, because we find that in the Consulate there are many Scotchmen. [SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: No, English.] Well, perhaps, there is a sufficient number of Scotchmen to render them predominant. This is the only charge that is made in respect of this church and chaplain, and while we retain an Established Church I think I am not wrong in saying that the best way in which we can assist in providing religious services for our fellow-countrymen abroad is through the National Church.

Mr. Labouchere

(5.16.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Though the right hon Gentleman did not distinctly say so, I gathered from his words that this clergyman at Vienna is a member of the Church of England. Certainly the right hon. Gentleman must have done immense violence to his own feelings; he must have let his official capacity overwhelm his private capacity when he talked of that as the National Church. If I am not mistaken the right hon. Gentleman is a distinguished member of the Scottish National Church, an elder of that Church—a representative elder, I think—and that he should speak of the Church of England as the National Church is very strange. I imagine his doctrine is that abroad the religion of the majority should prevail, and that we ought to maintain chaplains for that majority. We are told that at Alexandria, which is, to a great extent, a Scotch colony, we retain a Scottish clergyman. Do we not maintain an English clergyman there? I should be very glad to know if that is the case. But as to the reason the right hon. Gentleman gave for maintaining an English clergyman at Vienna, I understand that the Austrian law is so illiberal that no one is to be allowed to officiate at religious services who is not an Austrian subject, unless he is a member of the Embassy.

*(5.12.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, I did not say that. I said that the Austrian law requires that the permanent pastors of the Churches recognised by the State shall be Austrian subjects.

(5.12.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Surely there can be no difficulty whatever in this matter. I do not wish to be irreverent, but I must say that these British clergymen abroad are really almost nuisances. You are persecuted. You cannot go to any of these places abroad without being bothered and pestered to subscribe to British clergymen. We get enough of religious ministrations at home, and when we go abroad we go for pleasure. Under these circumstances I shall certainly vote with my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton.

*(5.13.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): If my hon. Friend goes to a Division I shall vote with him. I fail to see why we should help to support Protestant England services in Vienna any more than in the eight or 10 German towns where there is Church of England service, and where English residents and visitors (working with an Association at home established for the purpose) support the services they want. I was worshipping in this church in Vienna, not many months ago, and I do not know why I was called upon to hand round the plate, but the result was most unsatisfactory. I will not betray confidence by saying what a miserable collection was made from that very respectable congregation, including an hon. Member of Parliament, who happens to be sitting opposite. But I feel strongly that people will not subscribe to religious ministrations when they find the State supplies it for them. There are Church of England churches on the Continent which are much more deserving of help, if you put the matter on that ground, than the church at Vienna, where there are plenty of people able, and who ought to be willing, to support it.

(5.15.) MR. LABOUCHERE: We are to understand that the real reason why we have to pay this chaplain is that he was appointed in 1817, and that the payment has continued from year to year, apparently without any protest. The English chaplain in Greece receives £100, and the gentleman in Denmark £200, and £115 of the latter sum is subscribed by the residents. Therefore, if it is necessary to have a chaplain at Vienna there is no reason why he should be paid £300 a year. The right hon. Gentleman has laid it down as a ground for our paying £300 to the chaplain in Vienna that the Church of England is in a majority in England. He is labouring under a mistake. The Church of England is not in a majority. The right hon. Gentleman says we ought to agree to this item of the Vote because we have an Established Church. I object entirely to an Established Church. I should like to see the Church disestablished and disendowed. I protest against this chaplaincy being maintained now because it has been maintained for a considerable number of years. Taking the question on its merits, there is no earthly reason why we should pay for this chaplain.

(5.18.) DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I do not think the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has displayed very great knowledge of the state of religion in Vienna or at home. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that most English people, when they go abroad, go to mass? The fact is, there is no necessity at all for these English pastors abroad; and certainly we, the Irish representatives, can hardly see why the Irish taxpayers should be called upon, the Church in Ireland being disestablished, to contribute towards the salary of the minister of a Church in which they do not believe. I hope my hon. Friend will press his Motion to a Division.

(5.19.) MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendesbury): I think the right hon. Gentleman might give us the assurance that he will ascertain from Vienna whether some private subscription might not be obtained for the payment of a salary to the minister of the church. The Ambassador at Vienna has not any greater duties to perform than other Ambassadors; and I am not aware that the existing Ambassador has been so extravagant in his hospitality to the English people in Vienna that it is necessary for him to call on the country to pay for these exceptional services. If the right hon. Gentleman makes the inquiry I suggest we shall be able to judge next year whether there is any reason for a Vote for the maintenance of this chaplain. In the meantime, I entirely acquiesce in the views expressed by the hon. Member for Northampton.

*(5.20.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: The congregation maintains the church itself, though it does not pay the stipend, and it was for this reason that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Winterbotham) performed the duties which he said were carried out by him so ineffectually.

(5.21.) The Committee divided; Ayes 69; Noes 134.—(Div. List, No. 45.)

Original Question again proposed.

(5.30.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: We have discussed the question of our Minister at one South American Republic, and I now turn to the question of our representation in a larger and more important Republic in South America; I mean the Republic of Brazil. A very large establishment is maintained at Rio. Here is a Minister at £4,000 a year, and the rent of a house £500; a Secretary at £700; a Consul at £1,000, and a Vice-Consul at £450. It is a very large establishment indeed. I would take the opportunity to ask whether we have now settled down to ordinary diplomatic relations with the Brazilian Republic, whether all question of acknowledging the Republic has been set at rest, and whether we are now on the same diplomatic footing with the de facto Government of Brazil as with any other country? Also, I should like to ask whether, now that a Republican form of Government is established in Brazil, it would not be possible to reduce the expenditure for our representation in that country to, at all events, the level of that which the Committee has sanctioned for the Argentine Republic? There is, no doubt, a considerable amount of show and ceremonial attending an Imperial Court, but that Court having ceased to exist in Brazil, no doubt the Ambassadorial expenses there will be considerably reduced. I know the country is large and important, but I do not know that our interests there are greater than in the Argentine Republic, and there is no great amount of British emigration to Brazil. I do not know what the Consul and Vice-Consul have to do in addition to what is done by the Minister, the Secretary, and the Under Secretary, but I think they must all have an easy time. It appears to me there is no necessity to keep up a Legation on such an extravagant scale, and I therefore move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £306,909, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir George Campbell.)

*(5.35.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The hon. Member is not quite correct in assuming that our relations with Brazil have been continued on the same footing as heretofore. The exact position is that until the provisional Government, is ratified by the country, or, at all events, by a Representative Assembly, we, in common with other Powers, only recognise it as the de facto Government. I think the Committee will see that it would be an extremely invidious proceeding to alter the status and position of our Minister in Brazil, just because it has ceased to be an Empire, and has become a Republic. As to British interests in Brazil being small, I think it must be generally known that the reverse is the case, and an enormous amount of British capital has been invested in Brazil, and in a variety of ways our interests in that country are very large. I can assure the Committee that questions very frequently arise and call for the interposition of our Minister in Brazil, and these questions, require very careful handling indeed. Again, I must remind the Committee that these posts, and the pay attached, had the careful consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular Committee, and I do not think the Committee will consider the recommendations made are obsolete because the inquiry was made 19 years ago.

Sir G. Campbell

(5.39.) MR. W. REDMOND: It would be unfortunate, I think, if we, by any change in diplomatic representation, should seem to throw discredit on the present form of Government in Brazil, or to imply an opinion one way or the other upon the political change in Brazil. Among the items in respect to the Legation in Brazil I find £300 for the services of a translator, and we further find that this same gentleman holds the post of Vice Consul at Rio. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what amount in addition to the £300 is paid for the Vice Consular duties? I presume that the translator is required to have a knowledge of the Spanish language; but would it not be perfectly possible to obtain a Secretary to the Legation with this knowledge, and so effect an economy of £300?

*(5.40.) MR. P. STANHOPE: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us some assurance that Her Majesty's Government, while recognising the de facto Government in Brazil, will insure the careful watching of British interests by our Minister there. Those interests are very considerable. It must be generally known that many English companies have invested large capital in railway and other works in Brazil, and with, I think, hopeful prospects in the future. I am anxious there should be no semblance of discredit cast upon the future of Brazil, and I trust that Her Majesty's Government will urge upon the Government of Brazil the desirability of upholding public credit in the interest of the country, and of British subjects who have invested their capital there.

*(5.41.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I am afraid I cannot, off-hand, tell the Committee the amount of the pay attached to the additional duties of the translator, but I will give the information on Report. I am sure the hon. Member will see it is not possible to anticipate all the questions that may be asked. As to the reason for the extra pay, I could recall many cases in which the translation and compilation of official papers in a foreign country require a knowledge that cannot be acquired in a short time, and indeed, knowledge of a technical character, and at certain posts it has been necessary, with every desire for economy, to retain the extra services of gentlemen as translators, for which they are paid in addition to the salary attaching to their ordinary duties. As to the question of the hon. Member for Wednesbury, undoubtedly Her Majesty's Representative in his informal relations with the de facto Government of Brazil will continue to look after British interests as heretofore; and I am glad to say he is on good terms with the existing Government, and as in former times obtains satisfaction whenever it has been required. It would be most unfortunate if, for a single day, those relations should be suspended.

(5.43.) MR. W. REDMOND: I find here the information I sought, and it appears that this gentleman who gets £300 as translator receives also £450 as Vice Consul at Rio. This, I think, is an unsatisfactory way of distributing expenditure over the Estimates. Why not set down the payment in one item as £750? Anyone who did not take the trouble to examine the matter carefully would suppose that the payment is made to two men, whereas this official, in his double capacity, receives £50 a year more than the Secretary to the Legation. It seems to me to be an extravagant item. No doubt a translator must be thoroughly conversant with the Spanish language; but does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that in Brazil it is not possible to get the services of a gentleman thoroughly qualified for a salary of £500, and who would consider himself well paid for his services as Vice Consul and translator? But I have a doubt if it is possible for one man to discharge the double duty. In any case, I think the right hon. Gentleman might promise to communicate with the Head of the Legation in Brazil with a view to effecting an economy in expenditure under this head.

(5.46.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I only wish to disclaim the idea that a Republic requires an inferior representation to an Empire. All I suggested was that under a Republic there is less ceremonial, and Ambassadors have less expenses. We are represented by an Ambassador in the United States, and our relations with that Government are very important; but our Representative there receives less than do Ambassadors to France, Germany, Turkey, Russia, and other countries. The fact is, that under a Republic the habits of official life are simpler, and rightly so. My suggestion amounted to this: that as soon as matters are settled in Brazil the question of the salary for our Representative there should be re-considered.

(5.47.) MR. W. REDMOND: I do not wish to press the matter unduly; but can the right hon. Gentlemen tell us that the one official can discharge the duties of both translator and Vice Consul; why the two salaries should not be entered as one item; and can he hold out any hope of an economy in this particular?

*(5.48.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The fact is, these salaries are continually being revised, and whenever a post falls vacant any economy that can be made is effected. Very often the new officer appointed receives less salary than his predecessor, and the Committee will observe that occasionally where the work does not seem to require an officer of so high a grade a transfer of that officer is made to a place where there is more work and greater responsibility. The Committee may be assured that these Estimates are year by year narrowly examined by the Treasury, and no opportunity for effecting an economy is lost. On Report I shall be able to give the hon. Member the reasons for the arrangement in the case he mentions, and it certainly was made because, after consideration, it appeared the most economical and suitable.

MR. W. REDMOND: Then I have nothing more to say now.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

(5.53.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): There are one or two questions I should like to ask in regard to our relations with Foreign Powers upon matters connected with Africa. In this connection there have, of course, been difficulties which have prevented the right hon. Gentleman from answering questions, and though there was a short discussion during the debate upon the Address, I think we have shown every forbearance towards the Foreign Office and have given ample time for framing proposals for reasonable settlements of difficulties that have arisen on the Shiré River and in the Nyassa country. We anxiously look forward to a statement which will tell us how these difficulties have been met, and that some effectual form of Government has been established there. We also look forward to a settlement of the questions relating to the open navigation of the Zambesi. We are the more anxious for information in view of the alarming rumours from time to time published in the newspapers—I may instance the telegram from Zanzibar published this morning, which I hope has no foundation in fact. Then, farther North on the African Continent, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can make any statement that may tend to dispel disquieting rumours as to German movements and the conflict between the German and English companies on the South-East Coast? Only this day we have had rumours of a German offer to buy out the interest of the King of the Belgians on the Congo River. I would urge on Her Majesty's Government that they should as speedily as possible come to definite terms with the German Government as to spheres of influence and our mutual relations in South-East and Central Africa. It has been matter of interest and anxiety for a long time. In July, 1887, the German Association addressed a Petition to the Imperial Government expressing anxiety lest the expedition of Mr. Stanley should disturb their commercial interests. The German Government notified the complaint to Her Majesty's Government, and

Lord Salisbury said that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to disclaim all annexation within the sphere of German influence if the German Government would act similarly towards Great Britain. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this understanding is intended to cover the claim put forward by Germany to the country lying between Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa? I wish to urge upon the Government that there is a strong competition going on in that part of the world, and unless a clear decision is speedily arrived at with respect to the limitations of the influence of either Power, there is a prospect of very serious disagreement in the future.

(6.4.) COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): The fact is, that while Germany's sphere of influence is well marked to the North and South, it is very hazy to the West. I therefore join the hon. Member for Edinburgh in urging that steps should be taken at once to clear up the doubts which certainly exist, so that in the future no complications may arise between us and Germany. I should like to be informed whether the East Africa Company have absorbed the Lakes Company, as is reported. If it has, will the charter of the former company include the territory claimed by the latter? I am not favourable to these large companies. I view with considerable dislike the system of farming out the government of large tracts of territory to these companies, because it bristles with difficulties for the future.

*(6.8.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is necessary to be very reticent on questions of great national importance, and debates in the House on these tender questions might possibly complicate the negotiations in progress. It is desirable to avoid doing this. The hon. Member has asked me as to the relations between this country and Portugal in regard to South African affairs. As I stated to the House the other day there are some questions between Great Britain and Portugal which are as yet unsettled. For instance, Her Majesty's Government think Portugal has not fairly treated a British company in the seizure of the Delagoa Railway, and they expect that the company will receive just compensation, though the matter has not yet been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. As to the rumours which have been current of the advance of Portuguese expeditions to the lakes, there is no reason to doubt the loyalty of the Portuguese Government to its engagements. With regard to the rumoured expedition to Mashonaland, the Portuguese Government have assured Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon that they have no information whatever with regard to such an expedition. Telegrams received from Mozambique on the previous day made no mention of it. The Governor has, moreover, been instructed that the Portuguese Government will not sanction further operations in that region pending the negotiations now in progress. There is a report that a German expedition about to set out into Central Africa will affect British interests. I am, however, glad to state that the German Government have, unsolicited, assured Her Majesty's Government that the expedition under Emin Pasha is designed entirely to operate within the German sphere and will not at all prejudice British interests, as the German Government fully recognise the demarcation which has reserved to each Power a sphere of influence. Two Powers in such a position as Germany and Great Britain have lately occupied have never acted with more perfect loyalty to each other and with a greater absence of friction, and I am quite sure we may rely on it that the German Government will take no steps prejudicial to our interests. The region between Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa is undoubtedly one in which Great Britain has great reason to take an interest, as it has been the scene of the enterprise of some very noble British subjects. No definite arrangement has been made with regard to that region, but I hope that the House will feel assured that British interests run no risk from the conduct of allies who have hitherto shown such perfect loyalty. I now think that I have answered all the questions which have been put to me.

(6.14.) MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): What is the position of the negotiations with regard to the Oil Rivers, and what action have Her Majesty's Government taken in respect to that district?

*(6.14.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must first answer a question which I forgot to notice. The Government have no information about the absorption of the Lakes Company by the East Africa Company. It has been rumoured that this is to take place; but, so far as I am aware, no definite arrangement has been come to. No decision has yet been arrived at about the administration of the Oil Rivers. The House will, however, be made aware of the Government's intentions in time to allow of any objections being made before final steps are taken. I hope that it will not be long before a satisfactory arrangement is concluded.

(6.15.) COMMANDER BETHELL: We all know that prevention is better than cure; and I hold that, unless the respective spheres of influence are defined in the West, there will be trouble very soon. I do not care whether one company has been absorbed by the other or not; but it is desirable it should be known what is the policy of the Government towards the absorbing company, how far it can claim the benefit of the terms of the charter, and whether the powers given by the charter extend north of the Zambesi. I wish for an assurance that the terms of the charter do not extend to the region that has been more or less occupied by the African Lakes Company.

(6.17.) MR. BUCHANAN: I wish to know whether Her Majesty's Government have formulated any idea as to the future government of Nyassaland and the district of the Shiré Highlands. I would earnestly urge upon the Foreign Office the extreme desirability—nay, even the absolute necessity—of coming to some definite arrangement with Germany at as early a date as possible with reference to the limits of the respective spheres of influence of the two countries. What one reads from day to day makes it quite clear that the seed is being sown of an endless crop of troubles. It does great credit to those who have had the conduct of delicate negotiations that so far there has been no serious disagreement between those who represent the two Governments; but as things are going on the future cannot be looked forward to with any confidence, and the sooner we come to a clear understanding with Germany the better it will be for all concerned.

(6.19.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I think that the right hon. Gentleman ought now to give a clear explanation about the South Africa Company, as to which I have several times asked him questions. From the terms of the charter I have never been able to understand what are the powers of the company. It appears to have vague territorial rights over Matabeleland, Makolololand, and possibly the Shiré Highlands; but what the rights of the company are I cannot discover. For example, I cannot tell whether it may exclude all other persons engaged in trade. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain this, and also what would happen in case Lobengula, King of Matabeleland—

(6.20.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I rise to a point of order. Can this matter be discussed on this Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: It certainly does come within the sphere of the Vote, but I think the discussion would be more appropriate on the South African Vote which follows.

(6.21.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: This ruling illustrates the extreme inconvenience of lumping a great number of subjects in one Vote, and the framing of the Estimates makes it extremely difficult to discuss any particular point. Evidently a good deal of scrambling is going on for territory in Africa, and precautions ought to be taken that the scramble does not provoke bad blood and difficulty. There is, I am convinced, extreme danger in letting loose companies with vague and indefinite powers, and care ought to be taken that they do not involve their respective Governments in serious misunderstandings. Where you have territorial companies you ought to define the territory within which each shall operate and not give them vague charters which enable them to assume all kinds of rights. I hope and trust, therefore, that the various spheres of influence will soon be clearly defined, and that thus future difficulties will be avoided. I do not sympathise much with the claims of Portugal, who has already got more territory than she can control; but we are bound by the Berlin Treaty to submit to arbitration the difficulty which has arisen with that country.

Mr. Buchanan

and we are taking a somewhat high-handed course in simply saying to Portugal, "Hands off! You shall not touch the territory in question." I trust that this difficulty will be settled in a manner creditable to our good name.

*(6.27.) GENERAL SIR LEWIS PELLY (Hackney, N.): There is no doubt of the goodwill of the German Government towards Her Majesty's Government, but the time has arrived when some clear definition of our respective boundaries should be amicably arrived at. It is all very well to say that certain boundaries have been laid down, but in practice questions and disputes are constantly arising, and such disputes might easily produce great inconvenience. It is not very clear how far the sphere of British influence extends in different directions. It seems to me it might be arranged that representatives of the companies interested and Delegates of the respective Governments should meet amicably in conference and agree as to boundaries, and these might be laid down on maps, and copies given to all concerned.

(6.29.) MR. W. REDMOND: The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has several times spoken of "spheres of influence." I think it would be a satisfaction if we could hear once for all what we are to understand by a "sphere of influence." Does it mean a territory or a district which this country is bound to defend against any other? I hold that the dispute with Portugal arose out of the vagueness of the phrase "sphere of influence." If the right hon. Gentleman will give some explanation to the House on these points, he may be able to satisfy the minds of those who regard with some apprehension the present position of this country in regard to its African responsibilities.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): I would point out that we had a lesson with regard to our relations with South Africa some 10 years ago. I refer to the fact that in consequence of the attempt of the Government, which was unfortunately successful, to stop discussion in regard to the Zulu War, we were led into a second war, and so had two wars instead of one. According to the speech made by the Prime Minister at the beginning of this year, the affairs of Africa were interesting European Powers to such an extent that the African Question had become at that moment an European Question. Having studied this matter somewhat attentively I should like to hear the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs clear up the question as to the principle on which it is intended to settle the different spheres of influence of the European Powers. According to what has happened in the case of Portugal it would appear that the possession of the seaboard outside the sphere of Portuguese influence does not give the right to interference in regard to the interior; but, on the other hand, our whole case in regard to the question that has arisen with reference to Germany is that the possession of the seaboard does give a right of access to the interior territory. Thus it will be seen that we are conducting a diplomatic argument with two different Powers on what is practically the same point, but on absolutely opposite principles. I hope the right hon. Baronet will be able to tell us on what principle we are defining these different spheres of influence. Whether it is right or wrong that we should occupy certain portions of the interior of Africa is a matter of little consequence, as compared with the enormous dangers and expense that will be incurred by any Government that may hold such a position. As has already been pointed out, there is nothing so likely to prevent European Powers from being dragged into future wars in regard to the administration of African territory as the proper definition of the spheres of influence accorded to each Power. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs ought to take the House into his confidence and tell us something of the principles on which he is settling these questions. At present we have no quarrel with Germany, and we ought to get some information from the Government on this very important question.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College Division): I should like to have some explanation from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as to the Nyassa district. It is stated that missionaries out there have recently been engaged in very warlike operations, in regard to which we should like to have some definite information from Her Majesty's Government. We find that the Consul at Nyassa receives £500 a year, while there is also a Consul at Quillimane, who has been imprisoned for some contravention of the Portuguese law, and two Vice Consuls in the African mainlands serving with the army of the missionaries, who have been fighting against the Arabs. Now, we should like to know who these gentlemen are. Last year the position was this: Some of these missionaries and some military officers belonging to Her Majesty's Army were engaged in a filibustering war against the Arabs, for which I do not blame them; but I think I am entitled to press Her Majesty's Government to define what was their position in regard to this matter, and what they think are the actual rights and wrongs of the missionaries. It is stated that they commenced their operations in self-defence, that then they asked Her Majesty's Government for protection, and were told that if they protected themselves they would only be doing what men in such a situation had a right to do. The consequence was that they did protect themselves, with great valour and energy, as any other set of men would do who were fighting for their lives; but at this point a diplomatic dispute arose in connection with the Vice Consul at Quillimane. The Portuguese refused to permit the importation of arms and ammunition for their defence, and, while our Government were encouraging them to defend themselves, the Portuguese Government—according to the Portuguese Report—had, at the instigation of Her Majesty's Government, laid down regulations forbidding the importation of gunpowder and weapons by way of Quillimane or other portions of the Portuguese territory. The consequence was that our own subjects were prevented from obtaining arms and ammunition, while it was alleged that the Portuguese were allowing arms and gunpowder to be sent in for the use of the Arabs to any extent they might require. It was because of the alleged improper importation of gunpowder and arms that our Vice Consul was imprisoned, and that imprisonment means a very long time, because the Vice Consul would have to appeal to the Lisbon Authorities to get his sentence reversed, or confirmed, as the case might with Germany the better it will be for all concerned.

(6.19.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I think that the right hon. Gentleman ought now to give a clear explanation about the South Africa Company, as to which I have several times asked him questions. From the terms of the charter I have never been able to understand what are the powers of the company. It appears to have vague territorial rights over Matabeleland, Makolololand, and possibly the Shiré Highlands; but what the rights of the company are I cannot discover. For example, I cannot tell whether it may exclude all other persons engaged in trade. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain this, and also what would happen in case Lobengula, King of Matabeleland—

(6.20.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I rise to a point of order. Can this matter be discussed on this Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: It certainly does come within the sphere of the Vote, but I think the discussion would be more appropriate on the South African Vote which follows.

(6.21.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: This ruling illustrates the extreme inconvenience of lumping a great number of subjects in one Vote, and the framing of the Estimates makes it extremely difficult to discuss any particular point. Evidently a good deal of scrambling is going on for territory in Africa, and precautions ought to be taken that the scramble does not provoke bad blood and difficulty. There is, I am convinced, extreme danger in letting loose companies with vague and indefinite powers, and care ought to be taken that they do not involve their respective Governments in serious misunderstandings. Where you have territorial companies you ought to define the territory within which each shall operate and not give them vague charters which enable them to assume all kinds of rights. I hope and trust, therefore, that the various spheres of influence will soon be clearly defined, and that thus future difficulties will be avoided. I do not sympathise much with the claims of Portugal, who has already got more territory than she can control; but we are bound by the Berlin Treaty to submit to arbitration the difficulty which has arisen with that country, and we are taking a somewhat high-handed course in simply saying to Portugal, "Hands off! You shall not touch the territory in question." I trust that this difficulty will be settled in a manner creditable to our good name.

Mr. Buchanan

*(6.27.) GENERAL SIR LEWIS PELLY (Hackney, N.): There is no doubt of the goodwill of the German Government towards Her Majesty's Government, but the time has arrived when some clear definition of our respective boundaries should be amicably arrived at. It is all very well to say that certain boundaries have been laid down, but in practice questions and disputes are constantly arising, and such disputes might easily produce great inconvenience. It is not very clear how far the sphere of British influence extends in different directions. It seems to me it might be arranged that representatives of the companies interested and Delegates of the respective Governments should meet amicably in conference and agree as to boundaries, and these might be laid down on maps, and copies given to all concerned.

(6.29.) MR. W. REDMOND: The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has several times spoken of "spheres of influence." I think it would be a satisfaction if we could hear once for all what we are to understand by a "sphere of influence." Does it mean a territory or a district which this country is bound to defend against any other? I hold that the dispute with Portugal arose out of the vagueness of the phrase "sphere of influence." If the right hon. Gentleman will give some explanation to the House on these points, he may be able to satisfy the minds of those who regard with some apprehension the present position of this country in regard to its African responsibilities.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): I would point out that we had a lesson with regard to our relations with South Africa some 10 years ago. I refer to the fact that in consequence of the attempt of the Government, which was unfortunately successful, to stop discussion in regard to the Zulu War, we were led into a second war, and so had two wars instead of one. According to the speech made by the Prime Minister at the beginning of this year, the affairs of Africa were interesting European Powers to such an extent that the African Question had become at that moment an European Question. Having studied this matter somewhat attentively I should like to hear the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs clear up the question as to the principle on which it is intended to settle the different spheres of influence of the European Powers. According to what has happened in the case of Portugal it would appear that the possession of the seaboard outside the sphere of Portuguese influence does not give the right to interference in regard to the interior; but, on the other hand, our whole case in regard to the question that has arisen with reference to Germany is that the possession of the seaboard does give a right of access to the interior territory. Thus it will be seen that we are conducting a diplomatic argument with two different Powers on what is practically the same point, but on absolutely opposite principles. I hope the right hon. Baronet will be able to tell us on what principle we are defining these different spheres of influence. Whether it is right or wrong that we should occupy certain portions of the interior of Africa is a matter of little consequence, as compared with the enormous dangers and expense that will be incurred by any Government that may hold such a position. As has already been pointed out, there is nothing so likely to prevent European Powers from being dragged into future wars in regard to the administration of African territory as the proper definition of the spheres of influence accorded to each Power. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs ought to take the House into his confidence and tell us something of the principles on which he is settling these questions. At present we have no quarrel with Germany, and we ought to get some information from the Government on this very important question.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College Division): I should like to have some explanation from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as to the Nyassa district. It is stated that missionaries out there have recently been engaged in very warlike operations, in regard to which we should like to have some definite information from Her Majesty's Government. We find that the Consul at Nyassa receives £500 a year, while there is also a Consul at Quillimane, who has been imprisoned for some contravention of the Portuguese law, and two Vice Consuls in the African mainlands serving with the army of the missionaries, who have been fighting against the Arabs. Now, we should like to know who these gentlemen are. Last year the position was this: Some of these missionaries and some military officers belonging to Her Majesty's Army were engaged in a filibustering war against the Arabs, for which I do not blame them; but I think I am entitled to press Her Majesty's Government to define what was their position in regard to this matter, and what they think are the actual rights and wrongs of the missionaries. It is stated that they commenced their operations in self-defence, that then they asked Her Majesty's Government for protection, and were told that if they protected themselves they would only be doing what men in such a situation had a right to do. The consequence was that they did protect themselves, with great valour and energy, as any other set of men would do who were fighting for their lives; but at this point a diplomatic dispute arose in connection with the Vice Consul at Quillimane. The Portuguese refused to permit the importation of arms and ammunition for their defence, and, while our Government were encouraging them to defend themselves, the Portuguese Government—according to the Portuguese Report—had, at the instigation of Her Majesty's Government, laid down regulations forbidding the importation of gunpowder and weapons by way of Quillimane or other portions of the Portuguese territory. The consequence was that our own subjects were prevented from obtaining arms and ammunition, while it was alleged that the Portuguese were allowing arms and gunpowder to be sent in for the use of the Arabs to any extent they might require. It was because of the alleged improper importation of gunpowder and arms that our Vice Consul was imprisoned, and that imprisonment means a very long time, because the Vice Consul would have to appeal to the Lisbon Authorities to get his sentence reversed, or confirmed, as the case might be, and await the result. I ask the right hon. Baronet to inform the Committee whether the Vice Consul at Quillimane has been got out of the mess into which he has been drawn, or whether he still remains with the legal sword of the Portuguese hanging over his head? The right hon. Baronet has told us that while British interests in that district are watched over by Her Majesty's Government we need have no anxiety; but I say that it is just when they are watched over by Her Majesty's Government that we have the greatest anxiety, and it is for this reason and because of the oracular and sphinx-like nature of the reply given to my hon. Friend behind me that I venture to ask the right hon. Baronet for more definite information.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sure the hon. Gentleman has no wish that I should enter at length into matters that have been lately in dispute between Her Majesty's Government and that of Portugal, so as to run the risk of reviving the irritation which I trust is in the course of being allayed; but I should be sorry to be thought unduly reticent by withholding information which I am able to give in terms that I hope may be satisfactory to the House. I have been questioned as to the division of the territory in the neighbourhood of Nyassa, and the arrangement for the administration of the district. I have to say that I am not at present in a position to make a declaration on that subject. It is evident that the arrangements for the administration of these regions must be a matter of very careful consideration; and I think hon. Gentlemen will see that I should be acting very improperly were I to make a premature declaration on this subject. It is a difficult subject, and of course it is dependent upon other negotiations which have not been brought to a conclusion. I think it would be extremely desirable that the spheres of influence of the various Powers in Africa should be defined, but obviously that is an object which cannot be accomplished in a short time. It is only lately that we have been able to effect limitations with the French in Western Africa, and we hope that result will be found extremely beneficial for the profitable exercise of our respective influences and the avoidance of disputes. But it may be a long time before that will be brought about everywhere. It is not to be wondered at that, when various Powers are pushing their influence in regions never before reached, it should not be found possible at once to define the territories. The hon. Member for Fermanagh asked what is meant by "sphere of influence." A "sphere of influence," I take it, is founded upon an agreement made between the Powers concerned. For instance, there may be a declaration of a sphere of influence between two Powers which may not affect a third Power's influence, like the agreement made between the Portuguese and the Germans with respect to abstention from the exercise of their respective influence beyond a certain line. In that case it was a declaration of abstention as regards another Power. In the same way, the respective spheres of influence of Great Britain and of Germany are defined in North-Eastern Africa, so that our colonising and administrative operations and theirs may not clash one with the other. The object of declaring a "sphere of influence" is to avoid collision with other Powers, and I hope that, as far as the declaration of the spheres of influence have gone, they will prove profitable in that direction. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has declared himself against entrusting companies with colonising operations. Nothing I can say would alter his opinion upon that point, but it is a policy which was not adopted by Her Majesty's present Government. We have succeeded to arrangements made by our predecessors, and have ourselves made others of a similar kind. As I understand that policy, it is to regulate and control the settlement of our countrymen in uncivilised countries, so that they may avoid the errors which have often been committed in times past. Such powers may be exercised by the companies, whom we know and whom we can control. The Committee will remember that under the Royal Charters there can be no administration or question of settlement without the sanction or control of Her Majesty's Government. My hon. Friend asked a question with regard to the amalgamation of these two companies, and inquired what would be their rights under the Royal Charters. There has been hitherto no question of granting any charter to these companies in the interior of Africa. These companies are voluntary associations at present; they assume and regulate their own responsibility. We have nothing to say to their amalgamation, because they are bodies over whom we have no control. If they amalgamate for their own purposes, and then approach Her Majesty's Government with the view of obtaining certain powers, then arises a question whether they ought to possess those powers. But that is a question which has not been considered.

Dr. Cameron

COMMANDER BETHELL: Is it the case that the South African Company are not bounded on the North at all, and that it is provided in their charter that they may extend on the North?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I believe that is the case. Similarly there is no boundary line by which the East African Company are confined. But I would point out to the House that it is not desirable that these matters should be too closely discussed, for it is manifest that such discussions must touch the interests of other countries. It has been remarked that I have been very reticent in these matters, and I would observe that it is not unreasonable I should be so. The hon. Member for Northampton asked what are the rights of the South African Company. They are limited to the terms of the Charter, and they will be answerable to Her Majesty's Government for the way in which they exercise their powers. Judging by other companies' successes, I hope these Chartered Companies have a future before them, and that they will lead to an extension of British dominions and protection in the regions in which they operate. The hon. Member for Glasgow wished for an explanation of the presence of the Consul at Mozambique and in the neighbouring districts. One Consul was appointed in the Nyassa district; the other happened to be travelling in the country, and, with much courage and devotion, he rendered assistance to the handful of Europeans who were maintaining an unequal contest. It is true that a military officer took part, but I hardly think it worthy to call the strife in which they were engaged as a "filibustering expedition." The British, and the tribes friendly to them, were attacked by slave traders, who, with fire and sword, spread desolation through those regions of Africa, and when they saw danger imminent, they were compelled to stand on their defence. With regard to the imprisonment of the Consul at Mozambique, I am happy to say that it was a mere trifling and ephemeral matter. He was a gentleman who acted for a time as unpaid Vice-Consul. We have a great many about the world who perform the necessary duties merely for the fees. This gentleman, in his private capacity, received the consignment of rockets for the service of the Lake Company. He made, as he thought, an honest declaration of the consignment to the Local Authorities. He was arrested, but before the day was over he was released, and there was an end of the incident. I think I have answered all the questions, and I hope the Committee will not consider it necessary to go further into matters which have lately caused some little difficulty between two countries so long friendly as Great Britain and Portugal, but leave the settlement of points which are still in question between us, without the risk of publicity, to be brought to a conclusion, which is not, I hope, far distant, and which may restore the friendly relations which I trust will always subsist between the two countries.

DR. CAMERON: I want to know something about the Nyassa District. When I used the word "filibustering" I thought it conveyed a much more definite idea than do the words "sphere of influence." "Filibustering" means the fighting of certain persons without their being commissioned by any recognised Government. That was the case with the fighting in Nyassaland. What I want to know is this: If you get these "spheres of influence" defined how are the people within them to be governed? By these Chartered Companies? If so, we should have some guarantee that they will be responsible to the Government of Great Britain. What I complain of is that at the present moment they are not in that position at all. The Consul or Representative of the Government has no power. He had no official position among these men who were fighting for their lives; he had no control over them; and the consequence was that these British subjects were engaged in what was neither more nor less than filibustering. I must say it appears to me to be a matter deserving of some consideration that the right hon. Gentleman does not seem to be aware of the seriousness of such a state of matters. Only a few years back I had occasion to call attention to an occurrence in the same district, where some missionaries took extraordinary powers into their own hands, punishing natives most severely for certain offences against chastity. Because the natives had their own ideas as to what was right and wrong these missionaries inflicted on them most atrocious punishment, absolutely beating some of them to death. We were told that these matters brought them within the scope of our law, and that a Mission would go from Zanzibar to the scene of the disorder. However, the person charged with the Mission fell ill, and nothing was done. Having seen such things going on for a series of years, and having seen a prolonged system of fighting taking place for another series of years, knowing that this country takes a great interest in these people and will not see them abandoned, and knowing that these people are open to a recurrence of such dangers, I say that we ourselves may be landed in a mess unless we take the matter in hand and establish some permanent form of Government. The answer the right hon. Gentleman gives me is that nothing has been done, and that nothing is to be done. I say the Government have made Chartered Companies. These companies derive their rights from you. Are you going to give them rights over the territory occupied by these missionaries and the population they have drawn up around them; are you going to leave these people governed by responsible companies able to defend them if attacked in the exercise of their legal powers; or do you intend to leave things to drift on as they have drifted for years past in a manner which, sooner or later, is sure to embroil the relations of this country with those of other countries who have interests in this part of the world?

(7.4.) MR. LABOUCHERE: A little time ago I made some observations as to the South African Companies, and you, Sir, quite rightly held that those observations were not in order, though I should be able to make them when we got more to the Consular part of this Vote. But the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary has answered one or two of the observations I made, so I presume it will be convenient for me to refer to those matters now. The right hon. Gentleman put forward as an excuse that some of these charters were granted by previous Governments; but that is no answer to hon. Members sitting in this part of the House, who take up a perfectly independent attitude, and oppose such charters no matter by what Government granted. We have opposed them when Liberal Governments have been in power precisely as we oppose them when Conservative Governments are in power. I tried a short time back to discover how these charters are given. So far as I can see, they are granted in the loosest possible manner. Some gentleman, presumably with influence, goes to, I suppose, the Colonial Secretary and says, "We want a charter." There is no opposition. No one knows that the charter is being asked for until it is granted; and as those who ask for it are persons of some influence, it seems an almost necessary consequence of asking for a charter that it should be given. With respect to this South African Charter last Session, there were certain grants made by Lobengula, the chief King of Matabeleland, to Mr. Cecil Rhodes. I asked several questions about the matter—

Dr. Cameron

(7.7.) THE CHAIRMAN: I pointed out before that the question of the sphere of action of these Chartered Companies would come more properly under a later Vote dealing with South Africa. It may be dealt with here in so far as the territory embraced in the charter touches territory also affected by the Consular Vote, but you cannot on this Vote discuss the policy of the original granting of a charter.

(7.8.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I understand, Sir. As to the matter before us, let us have some clear understanding as to how far the "sphere of influence," if you like to call it so, extends. What has been the answer of the Under Secretary? He says the House ought to be very reticent about these charters, as ill-advised publicity may get us into trouble with other nations. He seems to think that it is the Foreign Office and not this House who has to settle these matters. It seems to me that both this House and Foreign Governments ought to know how far the sphere of influence of these companies extends. It should be specifically stated how far the territorial authority of each company extends. I should like to ask the Under Secretary whether, in the case of this latest company, it is a fact that there is no specified line of delimitation—is the Zambesi the boundary, and, if not, what is the line of demarcation? It is most desirable to lay down definite frontier lines between the sphere of influence of each European country; or else, by the action of one of these companies, we may find ourselves involved in war with France, Germany, Portugal, or some other European nation.

*(7.10.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I thought I had indicated what the answer is on this point. I thought I gave the Committee to understand that the interior frontier of this company has not been definitely limited; but let me say that the company working this Royal Charter will be closely watched and will not be allowed to commit any acts that might involve us with Foreign Powers. Any step which it might desire to take which would seriously endanger our relations with Foreign Powers would not receive the sanction of the Home Government, under whose control the company is.

(7.11.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I should like to put a question about a matter which my hon. Friend the Member for the Market Harborough Division brought before the House last Session. I would ask whether there is any likelihood of a relaxation of the extremely inconvenient regulations restraining British medical men from practising in Switzerland?

*(7.12.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have heard several complaints on this head. It is, no doubt, a hardship on our fellow-countrymen in Switzerland that they cannot always avail themselves of the services of British medical men, but the medical profession is a close one in all European countries. In Switzerland Her Majesty's Government have been unable to come to satisfactory terms with the Swiss Authorities, mainly owing to there being no equivalent to be given to the Swiss in return for the relaxation of the objectionable regulations. An arrangement has, however, been come to in favour of British medical men regularly living in Switzerland. I am afraid, however, that it is not possible to get rid of the main grievance the hon. Member refers to.

(7.14.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I would point out that, according to my own knowledge, last year an English medical man was fined 500 francs for giving medical advice to a lady staying at the same hotel in the Engadine.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: That medical gentleman was not one of those in whose favour the relaxation was made.

(7.16.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I think the Swiss Authorities are quite right. There are a lot of quacks in England, and precautions are taken in this country against their palming themselves off as fully-qualified medical men. How are the Swiss to know whether an alleged British medical man is really qualified or not? Why should not an English doctor who goes abroad be required to show to some Authority there that he knows something of his profession? The examination English doctors are required to pass in Switzerland is a very simple one, and I am assured that only the greatest ignoramus would fail under it. I have seen a good deal of English doctors abroad. Generally speaking, they are little men who cannot get on at home. They call themselves "Dr.," get puffed by their friends, and secure a practice, and end by killing and destroying far more than the native doctors in their own country. I hope nothing will be done to urge Switzerland to do away with the excellent regulations she has laid down in this matter.

(7.17.) MR. P. STANHOPE: I must take exception to the items for clerk allowances in the case of Chili, Mexico, Peru, Roumania, Servia, and other places. In my opinion, Chili and Bulgaria would be excellent schools for some of the young attachés. We have 56 second and third secretaries, who seem to enjoy themselves in the larger capitals. In Paris there are five, in Vienna five, in Berlin five, and so on. Many of them I believe to be redundant. In Bulgaria Mr. O'Connor has done excellent service, and a young attaché would be greatly benefited by

of Brazil. A very large establishment is maintained at Rio. Here is a Minister at £4,000 a year, and the rent of a house £500; a Secretary at £700; a Consul at £1,000, and a Vice-Consul at £450. It is a very large establishment indeed. I would take the opportunity to ask whether we have now settled down to ordinary diplomatic relations with the Brazilian Republic, whether all question of acknowledging the Republic has been set at rest, and whether we are now on the same diplomatic footing with the de facto Government of Brazil as with any other country? Also, I should like to ask whether, now that a Republican form of Government is established in Brazil, it would not be possible to reduce the expenditure for our representation in that country to, at all events, the level of that which the Committee has sanctioned for the Argentine Republic? There is, no doubt, a considerable amount of show and ceremonial attending an Imperial Court, but that Court having ceased to exist in Brazil, no doubt the Ambassadorial expenses there will be considerably reduced. I know the country is large and important, but I do not know that our interests there are greater than in the Argentine Republic, and there is no great amount of British emigration to Brazil. I do not know what the Consul and Vice-Consul have to do in addition to what is done by the Minister, the Secretary, and the Under Secretary, but I think they must all have an easy time. It appears to me there is no necessity to keep up a Legation on such an extravagant scale, and I therefore move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That a sum, not exceeding £306,909, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir George Campbell.)

*(5.35.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The hon. Member is not quite correct in assuming that our relations with Brazil have been continued on the same footing as heretofore. The exact position is that until the provisional Government is ratified by the country, or, at all events, by a Representative Assembly, we, in common with other Powers, only recognise it as the de facto Government. I think the Committee will see that it would be an extremely invidious proceeding to alter the status and position of our Minister in Brazil, just because it has ceased to be an Empire, and has become a Republic. As to British interests in Brazil being small, I think it must be generally known that the reverse is the case, and an enormous amount of British capital has been invested in Brazil, and in a variety of ways our interests in that country are very large. I can assure the Committee that questions very frequently arise and call for the interposition of our Minister in Brazil, and these questions, require very careful handling indeed. Again, I must remind the Committee that these posts, and the pay attached, had the careful consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular Committee, and I do not think the Committee will consider the recommendations made are obsolete because the inquiry was made 19 years ago.
Sir G. Campbell

(5.39.) MR. W. REDMOND: It would be unfortunate, I think, if we, by any change in diplomatic representation, should seem to throw discredit on the present form of Government in Brazil, or to imply an opinion one way or the other upon the political change in Brazil. Among the items in respect to the Legation in Brazil I find £300 for the services of a translator, and we further find that this same gentleman holds the post of Vice Consul at Rio. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what amount in addition to the £300 is paid for the Vice Consular duties? I presume that the translator is required to have a knowledge of the Spanish language; but would it not be perfectly possible to obtain a Secretary to the Legation with this knowledge, and so effect an economy of £300?

*(5.40.) MR. P. STANHOPE: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us some assurance that Her Majesty's Government, while recognising the de facto Government in Brazil, will insure the careful watching of British interests by our Minister there. Those interests are very considerable. It must be generally known that many English companies have invested large capital in railway and other works in Brazil, and with, I think, hopeful prospects in the future. I am anxious there should be no semblance of discredit cast upon the future of Brazil, and I trust that Her Majesty's Government will urge upon the Government of Brazil the desirability of upholding public credit in the interest of the country, and of British subjects who have invested their capital there.

*(5.41.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I am afraid I cannot, off-hand, tell the Committee the amount of the pay attached to the additional duties of the translator, but I will give the information on Report. I am sure the hon. Member will see it is not possible to anticipate all the questions that may be asked. As to the reason for the extra pay, I could recall many cases in which the translation and compilation of official papers in a foreign country require a knowledge that cannot be acquired in a short time, and indeed, knowledge of a technical character, and at certain posts it has been necessary, with every desire for economy, to retain the extra services of gentlemen as translators, for which they are paid in addition to the salary attaching to their ordinary duties. As to the question of the hon. Member for Wednesbury, undoubtedly Her Majesty's Representative in his informal relations with the de facto Government of Brazil will continue to look after British interests as heretofore; and I am glad to say he is on good terms with the existing Government, and as in former times obtains satisfaction whenever it has been required. It would be most unfortunate if, for a single day, those relations should be suspended.

(5.43.) MR. W. REDMOND: I find here the information I sought, and it appears that this gentleman who gets £300 as translator receives also £450 as Vice Consul at Rio. This, I think, is an unsatisfactory way of distributing expenditure over the Estimates. Why not set down the payment in one item as £750? Anyone who did not take the trouble to examine the matter carefully would suppose that the payment is made to two men, whereas this official, in his double capacity, receives £50 a year more than the Secretary to the Legation. It seems to me to be an extravagant item. No doubt a translator must be thoroughly conversant with the Spanish language; but does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that in Brazil it is not possible to get the services of a gentleman thoroughly qualified for a salary of £500, and who would consider himself well paid for his services as Vice Consul and translator? But I have a doubt if it is possible for one man to discharge the double duty. In any case, I think the right hon. Gentleman might promise to communicate with the Head of the Legation in Brazil with a view to effecting an economy in expenditure under this head.

(5.46.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I only wish to disclaim the idea that a Republic requires an inferior representation to an Empire. All I suggested was that under a Republic there is less ceremonial, and Ambassadors have less expenses. We are represented by an Ambassador in the United States, and our relations with that Government are very important; but our Representative there receives less than do Ambassadors to France, Germany, Turkey, Russia, and other countries. The fact is, that under a Republic the habits of official life are simpler, and rightly so. My suggestion amounted to this: that as soon as matters are settled in Brazil the question of the salary for our Representative there should be re-considered.

(5.47.) MR. W. REDMOND: I do not wish to press the matter unduly; but can the right hon. Gentlemen tell us that the one official can discharge the duties of both translator and Vice Consul; why the two salaries should not be entered as one item; and can he hold out any hope of an economy in this particular?

*(5.48.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The fact is, these salaries are continually being revised, and whenever a post falls vacant any economy that can be made is effected. Very often the new officer appointed receives less salary than his predecessor, and the Committee will observe that occasionally where the work does not seem to require an officer of so high a grade a transfer of that officer is made to a place where there is more work and greater responsibility. The Committee may be assured that these Estimates are year by year narrowly examined by the Treasury, and no opportunity for effecting an economy is lost. On Report I shall be able to give the hon. Member the reasons for the arrangement in the case he mentions, and it certainly was made because, after consideration, it appeared the most economical and suitable.

MR. W. REDMOND: Then I have nothing more to say now.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

(5.53.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): There are one or two questions I should like to ask in regard to our relations with Foreign Powers upon matters connected with Africa. In this connection there have, of course, been difficulties which have prevented the right hon. Gentleman from answering questions, and though there was a short discussion during the debate upon the Address, I think we have shown every forbearance towards the Foreign Office and have given ample time for framing proposals for reasonable settlements of difficulties that have arisen on the Shiré River and in the Nyassa country. We anxiously look forward to a statement which will tell us how these difficulties have been met, and that some effectual form of Government has been established there. We also look forward to a settlement of the questions relating to the open navigation of the Zambesi. We are the more anxious for information in view of the alarming rumours from time to time published in the newspapers—I may instance the telegram from Zanzibar published this morning, which I hope has no foundation in fact. Then, farther North on the African Continent, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can make any statement that may tend to dispel disquieting rumours as to German movements and the conflict between the German and English companies on the South-East Coast? Only this day we have had rumours of a German offer to buy out the interest of the King of the Belgians on the Congo River. I would urge on Her Majesty's Government that they should as speedily as possible come to definite terms with the German Government as to spheres of influence and our mutual relations in South-East and Central Africa. It has been matter of interest and anxiety for a long time. In July, 1887, the German Association addressed a Petition to the Imperial Government expressing anxiety lest the expedition of Mr. Stanley should disturb their commercial interests. The German Government notified the complaint to Her Majesty's Government, and

Lord Salisbury said that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to disclaim all annexation within the sphere of German influence if the German Government would act similarly towards Great Britain. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this understanding is intended to cover the claim put forward by Germany to the country lying between Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa? I wish to urge upon the Government that there is a strong competition going on in that part of the world, and unless a clear decision is speedily arrived at with respect to the limitations of the influence of either Power, there is a prospect of very serious disagreement in the future.

(6.4.) COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): The fact is, that while Germany's sphere of influence is well marked to the North and South, it is very hazy to the West. I therefore join the hon. Member for Edinburgh in urging that steps should be taken at once to clear up the doubts which certainly exist, so that in the future no complications may arise between us and Germany. I should like to be informed whether the East Africa Company have absorbed the Lakes Company, as is reported. If it has, will the charter of the former company include the territory claimed by the latter? I am not favourable to these large companies. I view with considerable dislike the system of farming out the government of large tracts of territory to these companies, because it bristles with difficulties for the future.

*(6.8.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is necessary to be very reticent on questions of great national importance, and debates in the House on these tender questions might possibly complicate the negotiations in progress. It is desirable to avoid doing this. The hon. Member has asked me as to the relations between this country and Portugal in regard to South African affairs. As I stated to the House the other day there are some questions between Great Britain and Portugal which are as yet unsettled. For instance, Her Majesty's Government think Portugal has not fairly treated a British company in the seizure of the Delagoa Railway, and they expect that the company will receive just compensation, though the matter has not yet been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. As to the rumours which have been current of the advance of Portuguese expeditions to the lakes, there is no reason to doubt the loyalty of the Portuguese Government to its engagements. With regard to the rumoured expedition to Mashonaland, the Portuguese Government have assured Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon that they have no information whatever with regard to such an expedition. Telegrams received from Mozambique on the previous day made no mention of it. The Governor has, moreover, been instructed that the Portuguese Government will not sanction further operations in that region pending the negotiations now in progress. There is a report that a German expedition about to set out into Central Africa will affect British interests. I am, however, glad to state that the German Government have, unsolicited, assured Her Majesty's Government that the expedition under Emin Pasha is designed entirely to operate within the German sphere and will not at all prejudice British interests, as the German Government fully recognise the demarcation which has reserved to each Power a sphere of influence. Two Powers in such a position as Germany and Great Britain have lately occupied have never acted with more perfect loyalty to each other and with a greater absence of friction, and I am quite sure we may rely on it that the German Government will take no steps prejudicial to our interests. The region between Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa is undoubtedly one in which Great Britain has great reason to take an interest, as it has been the scene of the enterprise of some very noble British subjects. No definite arrangement has been made with regard to that region, but I hope that the House will feel assured that British interests run no risk from the conduct of allies who have hitherto shown such perfect loyalty. I now think that I have answered all the questions which have been put to me.

(6.14.) MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): What is the position of the negotiations with regard to the Oil Rivers, and what action have Her Majesty's Government taken in respect to that district?

*(6.14.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must first answer a question which I forgot to notice. The Government have no information about the absorption of the Lakes Company by the East Africa Company. It has been rumoured that this is to take place; but, so far as I am aware, no definite arrangement has been come to. No decision has yet been arrived at about the administration of the Oil Rivers. The House will, however, be made aware of the Government's intentions in time to allow of any objections being made before final steps are taken. I hope that it will not be long before a satisfactory arrangement is concluded.

(6.15.) COMMANDER BETHELL: We all know that prevention is better than cure; and I hold that, unless the respective spheres of influence are defined in the West, there will be trouble very soon. I do not care whether one company has been absorbed by the other or not; but it is desirable it should be known what is the policy of the Government towards the absorbing company, how far it can claim the benefit of the terms of the charter, and whether the powers given by the charter extend north of the Zambesi. I wish for an assurance that the terms of the charter do not extend to the region that has been more or less occupied by the African Lakes Company.

(6.17.) MR. BUCHANAN: I wish to know whether Her Majesty's Government have formulated any idea as to the future government of Nyassaland and the district of the Shiré Highlands. I would earnestly urge upon the Foreign Office the extreme desirability—nay, even the absolute necessity—of coming to some definite arrangement with Germany at as early a date as possible with reference to the limits of the respective spheres of influence of the two countries. What one reads from day to day makes it quite clear that the seed is being sown of an endless crop of troubles. It does great credit to those who have had the conduct of delicate negotiations that so far there has been no serious disagreement between those who represent the two Governments; but as things are going on the future cannot be looked forward to with any confidence, and the sooner we come to a clear understanding with Germany the better it will be for all concerned.

(6.19.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I think that the right hon. Gentleman ought now to give a clear explanation about the South Africa Company, as to which I have several times asked him questions. From the terms of the charter I have never been able to understand what are the powers of the company. It appears to have vague territorial rights over Matabeleland, Makolololand, and possibly the Shiré Highlands; but what the rights of the company are I cannot discover. For example, I cannot tell whether it may exclude all other persons engaged in trade. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will explain this, and also what would happen in case Lobengula, King of Matabeleland—

(6.20.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I rise to a point of order. Can this matter be discussed on this Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: It certainly does come within the sphere of the Vote, but I think the discussion would be more appropriate on the South African Vote which follows.

(6.21.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: This ruling illustrates the extreme inconvenience of lumping a great number of subjects in one Vote, and the framing of the Estimates makes it extremely difficult to discuss any particular point. Evidently a good deal of scrambling is going on for territory in Africa, and precautions ought to be taken that the scramble does not provoke bad blood and difficulty. There is, I am convinced, extreme danger in letting loose companies with vague and indefinite powers, and care ought to be taken that they do not involve their respective Governments in serious misunderstandings. Where you have territorial companies you ought to define the territory within which each shall operate and not give them vague charters which enable them to assume all kinds of rights. I hope and trust, therefore, that the various spheres of influence will soon be clearly defined, and that thus future difficulties will be avoided. I do not sympathise much with the claims of Portugal, who has already got more territory than she can control; but we are bound by the Berlin Treaty to submit to arbitration the difficulty which has arisen with that country, and we are taking a somewhat high-handed course in simply saying to Portugal, "Hands off! You shall not touch the territory in question." I trust that this difficulty will be settled in a manner creditable to our good name.

Mr. Buchanan

*(6.27.) GENERAL SIR LEWIS PELLY (Hackney, N.): There is no doubt of the goodwill of the German Government towards Her Majesty's Government, but the time has arrived when some clear definition of our respective boundaries should be amicably arrived at. It is all very well to say that certain boundaries have been laid down, but in practice questions and disputes are constantly arising, and such disputes might easily produce great inconvenience. It is not very clear how far the sphere of British influence extends in different directions. It seems to me it might be arranged that representatives of the companies interested and Delegates of the respective Governments should meet amicably in conference and agree as to boundaries, and these might be laid down on maps, and copies given to all concerned.

(6.29.) MR. W. REDMOND: The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has several times spoken of "spheres of influence." I think it would be a satisfaction if we could hear once for all what we are to understand by a "sphere of influence." Does it mean a territory or a district which this country is bound to defend against any other? I hold that the dispute with Portugal arose out of the vagueness of the phrase "sphere of influence." If the right hon. Gentleman will give some explanation to the House on these points, he may be able to satisfy the minds of those who regard with some apprehension the present position of this country in regard to its African responsibilities.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): I would point out that we had a lesson with regard to our relations with South Africa some 10 years ago. I refer to the fact that in consequence of the attempt of the Government, which was unfortunately successful, to stop discussion in regard to the Zulu War, we were led into a second war, and so had two wars instead of one. According to the speech made by the Prime Minister at the beginning of this year, the affairs of Africa were interesting European Powers to such an extent that the African Question had become at that moment an European Question. Having studied this matter somewhat attentively I should like to hear the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs clear up the question as to the principle on which it is intended to settle the different spheres of influence of the European Powers. According to what has happened in the case of Portugal it would appear that the possession of the seaboard outside the sphere of Portuguese influence does not give the right to interference in regard to the interior; but, on the other hand, our whole case in regard to the question that has arisen with reference to Germany is that the possession of the seaboard does give a right of access to the interior territory. Thus it will be seen that we are conducting a diplomatic argument with two different Powers on what is practically the same point, but on absolutely opposite principles. I hope the right hon. Baronet will be able to tell us on what principle we are defining these different spheres of influence. Whether it is right or wrong that we should occupy certain portions of the interior of Africa is a matter of little consequence, as compared with the enormous dangers and expense that will be incurred by any Government that may hold such a position. As has already been pointed out, there is nothing so likely to prevent European Powers from being dragged into future wars in regard to the administration of African territory as the proper definition of the spheres of influence accorded to each Power. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs ought to take the House into his confidence and tell us something of the principles on which he is settling these questions. At present we have no quarrel with Germany, and we ought to get some information from the Government on this very important question.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College Division): I should like to have some explanation from the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs as to the Nyassa district. It is stated that missionaries out there have recently been engaged in very warlike operations, in regard to which we should like to have some definite information from Her Majesty's Government. We find that the Consul at Nyassa receives £500 a year, while there is also a Consul at Quillimane, who has been imprisoned for some contravention of the Portuguese law, and two Vice Consuls in the African mainlands serving with the army of the missionaries, who have been fighting against the Arabs. Now, we should like to know who these gentlemen are. Last year the position was this: Some of these missionaries and some military officers belonging to Her Majesty's Army were engaged in a filibustering war against the Arabs, for which I do not blame them; but I think I am entitled to press Her Majesty's Government to define what was their position in regard to this matter, and what they think are the actual rights and wrongs of the missionaries. It is stated that they commenced their operations in self-defence, that then they asked Her Majesty's Government for protection, and were told that if they protected themselves they would only be doing what men in such a situation had a right to do. The consequence was that they did protect themselves, with great valour and energy, as any other set of men would do who were fighting for their lives; but at this point a diplomatic dispute arose in connection with the Vice Consul at Quillimane. The Portuguese refused to permit the importation of arms and ammunition for their defence, and, while our Government were encouraging them to defend themselves, the Portuguese Government—according to the Portuguese Report—had, at the instigation of Her Majesty's Government, laid down regulations forbidding the importation of gunpowder and weapons by way of Quillimane or other portions of the Portuguese territory. The consequence was that our own subjects were prevented from obtaining arms and ammunition, while it was alleged that the Portuguese were allowing arms and gunpowder to be sent in for the use of the Arabs to any extent they might require. It was because of the alleged improper importation of gunpowder and arms that our Vice Consul was imprisoned, and that imprisonment means a very long time, because the Vice Consul would have to appeal to the Lisbon Authorities to get his sentence reversed, or confirmed, as the case might be, and await the result. I ask the right hon. Baronet to inform the Committee whether the Vice Consul at Quillimane has been got out of the mess into which he has been drawn, or whether he still remains with the legal sword of the Portuguese hanging over his head? The right hon. Baronet has told us that while British interests in that district are watched over by Her Majesty's Government we need have no anxiety; but I say that it is just when they are watched over by Her Majesty's Government that we have the greatest anxiety, and it is for this reason and because of the oracular and sphinx-like nature of the reply given to my hon. Friend behind me that I venture to ask the right hon. Baronet for more definite information.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sure the hon. Gentleman has no wish that I should enter at length into matters that have been lately in dispute between Her Majesty's Government and that of Portugal, so as to run the risk of reviving the irritation which I trust is in the course of being allayed; but I should be sorry to be thought unduly reticent by withholding information which I am able to give in terms that I hope may be satisfactory to the House. I have been questioned as to the division of the territory in the neighbourhood of Nyassa, and the arrangement for the administration of the district. I have to say that I am not at present in a position to make a declaration on that subject. It is evident that the arrangements for the administration of these regions must be a matter of very careful consideration; and I think hon. Gentlemen will see that I should be acting very improperly were I to make a premature declaration on this subject. It is a difficult subject, and of course it is dependent upon other negotiations which have not been brought to a conclusion. I think it would be extremely desirable that the spheres of influence of the various Powers in Africa should be defined, but obviously that is an object which cannot be accomplished in a short time. It is only lately that we have been able to effect limitations with the French in Western Africa, and we hope that result will be found extremely beneficial for the profitable exercise of our respective influences and the avoidance of disputes. But it may be a long time before that will be brought about everywhere. It is not to be wondered at that, when various Powers are pushing their influence in regions never before reached, it should not be found possible at once to define the territories. The hon. Member for Fermanagh asked what is meant by "sphere of influence." A "sphere of influence," I take it, is founded upon an agreement made between the Powers concerned. For instance, there may be a declaration of a sphere of influence between two Powers which may not affect a third Power's influence, like the agreement made between the Portuguese and the Germans with respect to abstention from the exercise of their respective influence beyond a certain line. In that case it was a declaration of abstention as regards another Power. In the same way, the respective spheres of influence of Great Britain and of Germany are defined in North-Eastern Africa, so that our colonising and administrative operations and theirs may not clash one with the other. The object of declaring a "sphere of influence" is to avoid collision with other Powers, and I hope that, as far as the declaration of the spheres of influence have gone, they will prove profitable in that direction. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has declared himself against entrusting companies with colonising operations. Nothing I can say would alter his opinion upon that point, but it is a policy which was not adopted by Her Majesty's present Government. We have succeeded to arrangements made by our predecessors, and have ourselves made others of a similar kind. As I understand that policy, it is to regulate and control the settlement of our countrymen in uncivilised countries, so that they may avoid the errors which have often been committed in times past. Such powers may be exercised by the companies, whom we know and whom we can control. The Committee will remember that under the Royal Charters there can be no administration or question of settlement without the sanction or control of Her Majesty's Government. My hon. Friend asked a question with regard to the amalgamation of these two companies, and inquired what would be their rights under the Royal Charters. There has been hitherto no question of granting any charter to these companies in the interior of Africa. These companies are voluntary associations at present; they assume and regulate their own responsibility. We have nothing to say to their amalgamation, because they are bodies over whom we have no control. If they amalgamate for their own purposes, and then approach Her Majesty's Government with the view of obtaining certain powers, then arises a question whether they ought to possess those powers. But that is a question which has not been considered.

Dr. Cameron

COMMANDER BETHELL: Is it the case that the South African Company are not bounded on the North at all, and that it is provided in their charter that they may extend on the North?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I believe that is the case. Similarly there is no boundary line by which the East African Company are confined. But I would point out to the House that it is not desirable that these matters should be too closely discussed, for it is manifest that such discussions must touch the interests of other countries. It has been remarked that I have been very reticent in these matters, and I would observe that it is not unreasonable I should be so. The hon. Member for Northampton asked what are the rights of the South African Company. They are limited to the terms of the Charter, and they will be answerable to Her Majesty's Government for the way in which they exercise their powers. Judging by other companies' successes, I hope these Chartered Companies have a future before them, and that they will lead to an extension of British dominions and protection in the regions in which they operate. The hon. Member for Glasgow wished for an explanation of the presence of the Consul at Mozambique and in the neighbouring districts. One Consul was appointed in the Nyassa district; the other happened to be travelling in the country, and, with much courage and devotion, he rendered assistance to the handful of Europeans who were maintaining an unequal contest. It is true that a military officer took part, but I hardly think it worthy to call the strife in which they were engaged as a "filibustering expedition." The British, and the tribes friendly to them, were attacked by slave traders, who, with fire and sword, spread desolation through those regions of Africa, and when they saw danger imminent, they were compelled to stand on their defence. With regard to the imprisonment of the Consul at Mozambique, I am happy to say that it was a mere trifling and ephemeral matter. He was a gentleman who acted for a time as unpaid Vice-Consul. We have a great many about the world who perform the necessary duties merely for the fees. This gentleman, in his private capacity, received the consignment of rockets for the service of the Lake Company. He made, as he thought, an honest declaration of the consignment to the Local Authorities. He was arrested, but before the day was over he was released, and there was an end of the incident. I think I have answered all the questions, and I hope the Committee will not consider it necessary to go further into matters which have lately caused some little difficulty between two countries so long friendly as Great Britain and Portugal, but leave the settlement of points which are still in question between us, without the risk of publicity, to be brought to a conclusion, which is not, I hope, far distant, and which may restore the friendly relations which I trust will always subsist between the two countries.

DR. CAMERON: I want to know something about the Nyassa District. When I used the word "filibustering" I thought it conveyed a much more definite idea than do the words "sphere of influence." "Filibustering" means the fighting of certain persons without their being commissioned by any recognised Government. That was the case with the fighting in Nyassaland. What I want to know is this: If you get these "spheres of influence" defined how are the people within them to be governed? By these Chartered Companies? If so, we should have some guarantee that they will be responsible to the Government of Great Britain. What I complain of is that at the present moment they are not in that position at all. The Consul or Representative of the Government has no power. He had no official position among these men who were fighting for their lives; he had no control over them; and the consequence was that these British subjects were engaged in what sians and the Kurds. With regard to the administrative reforms then promised, an undertaking was entered into by the Porte that, from time to time, Reports should be made to the other Signatory Powers of the reformatory steps that were taken. I should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what Reports have been received in carrying out this undertaking. I think we shall find they have amounted practically to nothing. If, however, any Reports have been received, I would ask what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to impress upon the Porte the obligations under which it rests in consequence of the words which were added at the express wish of Lord Salisbury. The right hon. Gentleman has given us no information on this point. His remarks are almost entirely confined to the very notorious and extreme cases of crime and atrocity committed by one particular individual, but the individual atrocities are only a small portion of the case. At the time of the Berlin Conference, the Armenians who then addressed Lord Beaconsfield stated emphatically that however great the misconduct of the Kurds and Circassians might have been that of the Turks was still worse and more hateful, and it was in regard to these evils that the undertaking I have referred to was entered into by the Porte. The right hon. Gentleman has informed us that the condition of the country is better than it used to be, and he has referred us to the Report of Colonel Chermside. I also have before me the Report of Colonel Chermside. He says—

"The state of affairs which evokes so much sympathy for the lot of Turkish Armenians in Kurdistan always exists."

Then again—

"The virtual inequality of Christian and Moslem, the want of efficient protection to the former, and of vindication of violence towards him exists as before; nor need I trouble your Excellency with a repetition of the many well-known shortcomings of Turkish administration."

Further on he says—

"The contributions demanded by the Aghas are in no wise recognised by the Government, but the latter is, of course, perfectly aware of their existence."

It should be known that those exactions here referred to are at least three times the amount that can properly be imposed by law. On page 19 of his Report, Colonel Chermside says—

Mr. A. O'Connor

"Former Reports of Major Clayton and Colonel Everett describe the very abject condition of the inhabitants of many Christian hamlets and villages; this still exists."

Further on he says—

"The great scourge of the settled population of the mountainous districts of Kurdistan, between Van and the Tigris, and South of the Eastern Euphrates, is the 'Kocher' or nomad Kurdish population. Since the removal of the Beks, the Kochers have invaded districts formerly free from them. It is freely asserted that since the Berlin Treaty, Turkey has done nothing to improve matters in her Asiatic provinces. The limiting of the power of the Executive, the introduction of the new system of Tribunals of Justice were very comprehensive and expensive measures. Their failure for want of good instruments for execution, and for other reasons, is notorious and fully dealt with in numerous Consular Reports. What is, perhaps, the crux of the question as regards the Armenians, is that efficient protection is not extended to individuals, neither are their rights vindicated, nor their equality anything but a name."

Then again—

"The fostering of the exclusive spirit of Islam, combined with the great jealousy of Moslems at the material prosperity of such a large number of their Christian fellow subjects have stimulated that bitter feeling against Christians which so strongly pervades the Moslems throughout the Empire, more noticeably so, indeed, in other districts than Kurdistan. It is often asserted that, owing to the toleration of Turkey as regards language, religions, &c., the Armenians are by no means disaffected, and only anxious for security, tranquility, and the real recognition of their rights as citizens. This view is rather that of those educated Armenians, dwellers in towns, who are aware of the advantages which they enjoy in Turkey. As education develops, the Armenians who look to the Western nations as their model, become more and more discontented with the Oriental civilisation in which they find themselves. The uneducated classes are merely loyal as far as influenced by the educated. The old race and religious antipathy to Kurd and Moslem exists. Their sympathies are with any Christian Power as against the Turk. The educated from their habits of intrigue and mutual jealousies are as incompetent as ever to combine, and the poorer classes have no power, being rarely armed and being surrounded by a majority of the hostile and dominant religion. The Turks, however, are quite correct, in my opinion, in considering them disaffected. The formation a few years since of Secret Societies and Committees near Erzerum, and in other districts, the proposals and attempts to procure arms, the occurrences of recent years at and near Van, all indicate the true sentiments of disaffection. It would indeed be strange were it otherwise."

On page 23 Colonel Cherm-side says—

"I have, however, the satisfaction to inform you that, through the strong and honest administration of Haji Hassan Bey, almost all the principal bad characters in the Diarbekir Vilayet have lately been arrested, and the prisons of Mardin and Diarbekir are full now. It is hoped that the province may be hereafter tranquilised, provided they receive their deserved punishment, and that depends upon the uprightness of the Criminal Courts, which the experience of past years does not lead us to hope for. It may, perhaps, be within the truth to state that the feelings of Mahomedans in general are not so friendly towards Armenians as some years ago, and they sometimes evince their dislike, but it is impossible to subdue such feelings by any but moral means."

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: If the hon. Member looks at the last paragraph of Colonel Cherm-side's Report he will see the grounds for the observations I have made.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I am afraid I have somewhat mutilated my own copy, having taken out those parts which I thought would be material, and not having with me that part of the Report which the right hon. Gentleman refers to, but, having read the Report with great care, I have not been able to arrive at the conclusions which appear to be so satisfactory to the right hon. Baronet. The question has been raised as to the comparative populations of the districts of Armenia, and an hon. Baronet speaking from above the Gangway seemed to doubt whether the Armenians were in a majority in any part. The fact is that they are in a majority in the districts of the Van, Mush, Bitlis, and Erzeroum, where the total figures amount to 1,330,000 Armenians. The statistics are furnished by the Armenian Patriarch in Constantinople, and I offer them for what they are worth. I know of no better authority, and I think the Turkish Government could scarcely be better informed. In the central portion of major or greater Armenia, the Armenians are in overwhelming majority, yet I find they are subject to every kind of individual atrocity at the hands of the Kurds, and they look in vain for protection at the hands of the Government. This country has undertaken treaty obligations, and it is of no avail for the right hon.

Gentleman to say that the Cyprus Convention cannot be carried out. There is something anterior to, and more important than, the Cyprus Convention, and that is the Treaty of Berlin. If Her Majesty's Government cannot approach the Sultan alone, is there any chance of combined action on the part of the Signatory Powers? From a diplomatic point of view, I should have thought that would have been more acceptable to Her Majesty's Government, because such a step could be taken without arousing the jealousy that would be awakened by isolated action. Has any attempt been made to secure unity of pressure at the hands of the Signatories to carry out these obligations with regard to the Christian populations?

*(9.17.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I hoped I had satisfied the Committee and hon. Gentlemen who initiated this discussion. I am sorry that the hon. Member has not read the full text of the Report, or he would at once perceive the grounds on which I made the statement with respect to Colonel Cherm-side. In his Report, as well as in his conversation, he stated that there was a decided improvement, notwithstanding the many faults that remained. Colonel Cherm-side states, as the hon. Member will see on referring to the Blue Book, that progress has been made which, on the whole, is not discreditable. The hon. Member asks whether the Government intend to propose a Congress to consider how far the promises made at Berlin can be carried out.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Joint pressure.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such action has been proposed by Her Majesty's present Government, or by any preceding Government. It is evident that the Powers would act with very various intentions, and that the power which took the initiative would not increase its influence at the Porte.

(9.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what are the functions of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and of Colonel Cherm-side?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Colonel Cherm-side has been appointed military attaché to the Embassy at Constantinople, and Mr. Clifford Lloyd has been appointed in his place Consul at Erzeroum. There is every confidence that he will satisfactorily discharge the duties.

(9.21.) MR. LEGH: These appointments are of a character which require special training, and they should only be bestowed on persons who are qualified by having received that training, and should not be made in a casual way, and for reasons that do not apply to the particular position. On grounds of general fitness, I cannot say that this is altogether a justifiable appointment.

*(9.23.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: Colonel Chermiside and Mr. Clifford Lloyd appeared to the Secretary of State to be the fittest for the work that is to be done. In such places very special qualifications are required, and I must say, from the manner in which Colonel Chermiside has performed his duties, that his appointment is fully justified.

(9.24.) MR. W. REDMOND: I think it would be satisfactory to Members on this Bench if the hon. Gentleman would give us a little more information with regard to the appointment of Mr. Clifford Lloyd to this extremely important position. I think there is a great deal of force in what has fallen from hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to the advisability of the exercise of the greatest possible care and caution in appointments of this kind. I do not know exactly what the duties of Mr. Clifford Lloyd may be in the position which he occupies; but from our knowledge of his career in Ireland it is extremely probable that the people placed under his influence are suffering very greatly indeed. I would like to know exactly how much Mr. Clifford Lloyd is paid, and how it was he came to be selected when there are many men in this country so much better qualified for the position. I meant also to call attention to the practice of putting down different salaries to one official, and I would suggest that the total sum he receives should be put next his name, in order hon. Members may not be misled, and may know what amount he really receives, and for what he receives it. At the Spanish Embassy I find a clerk receives £300 a year, and a further salary of £250 a year as Consul in Madrid. I do not complain of the amount this gentleman receives, but I think it is extremely likely to mislead

Sir J. Fergusson

hon. Members that the total amount he receives is not shown against his name. There are various examples of this practice. I should like to ask some questions with regard to the item of "Special Missions." There is a "Special Service" in Corea, £1,600; Special Service on the West Coast of Africa, £1,200; "Missions and Services, 1890-91, £11,450; 1889-90, £10,250." It is most undesirable that hon. Members should be asked to vote these sums of money without being told what they are going to be used for. Unforeseen Missions and Services £11,450! I cannot for a moment conceive that it would be likely that if any mission or service was shown to be necessary, the money would not be willingly and readily voted by the House; but it is hardly treating the Members of the House with confidence or courtesy to ask them to vote large sums of money without telling them what the money is for. I have not the least idea what the special service on the West Coast of Africa is. If an expedition is to be sent to the West Coast of Africa tell us so, and I have no doubt the Committee will be willing to vote any reasonable amount of money. But I protest in the strongest possible manner against this sort of repetition of the Secret Service Grant. Now, having heard the speech of the hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor), I cannot but regard the action of the Government, in respect to Armenia, as most unsatisfactory. I consider the Government is bound to take every step to put an end to the atrocities which are from time to time committed on the Armenian people. There was a time when it might very well do for the Government to say that the rumours as to atrocities were not well-founded, but I do not think the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs will have the hardihood to get up now and say there is not good foundation for what is complained of in regard to Armenia. I am sorry to say that, in my opinion, there is not the same disposition on the part of the Government to denounce atrocities committed under the sanction and in the name of the Government of Turkey that there is to denounce cruelties and atrocities committed with the sanction of the Russian Government. The right hon. Gentleman might give us a more satisfactory answer than refer us to the pages of the Report he has quoted. We know that since that Report was made there have been outrages committed, and that there have been appeals made to the people of this country on behalf of the Armenians. All we ask for is an assurance that Her Majesty's Government are determined to make representations to the Government of the Sultan, to let him know that his friendly relations with this country cannot continue if he persists in sanctioning the perpetration of outrages and atrocities which are simply terrifying to the mind of the average Englishman.

*(9.36.) MR. CHANNING: I do not rise to continue the discussion on the Armenian question, but simply to express my regret that the right hon. Gentleman was not in a position to state his authority for his statement with reference to Raouf Pasha. Last year I read a statement with regard to Raouf Pasha, which was taken from the French Le Temps, which is supposed to have the means of obtaining exceptionally good information. The statement was to the effect that Raouf Pasha, when in power at Beyrout, was an entire failure; that there were constant quarrels and murders between the Christians and the Mohammedans, and that it was incumbent on the Porte to remove him. That was the reason why he went to Armenia.

(9.37.) MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): Last year I called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the condition of the Consular Courts in Siam, and he promised then that the Minister would, on his arrival, take the matter into consideration. I should like to know what has been done.

*(9.38.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Consular Court at Bangkok has been brought under the Supreme Court at Singapore, by which any miscarriage of justice will be rectified. But I am not aware that anything has taken place to show that the Consular Court at Bangkok is not an efficient Court. The hon. Member for Fermanagh has expressed dissatisfaction with what I have said in reply to the hon. Member for the Scotland Division, and others, as to Armenia. I rather despair of being able to satisfy the hon. Member upon the Armenian question, as I am not prepared to go further than I have already gone in the matter. Her Majesty's Government have done all that they could judiciously do; and though we regret that much has been left undone by Turkey, yet some progress has been made. With regard to the double office held by the clerk at the Madrid Embassy, it is felt that the gentleman is able to fill the two offices. The salary he receives is certainly not excessive. It is difficult to put down an account of "unforeseen Missions" which will take place next year, and it would be inconvenient to produce a special estimate to the House at various periods of the Session. A sum of £600 will be taken as extra expenses for the Danube Commission, and a sum will be taken for special Consular Service in China in connection with the opening of the ports on the Yenisi River, and in connection with Corea, as well as an item in connection with telegraphs. It is difficult to estimate exactly what will be required for unforeseen Missions, but the sum of £15,000 is what has been thought sufficient in previous years.

(9.47.) MR. W. REDMOND: What I complain of is that no account is given of the £11,450. The right hon. Gentleman says that if it is not used it will be returned to the Exchequer. Well, I want to know when the practice first came into existence of asking Parliament to vote a considerable sum of money when there is no present necessity for it merely on the supposition that something may arise to render it necessary. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks any of us can be persuaded that if there is no necessity for the expenditure of this money it will be returned to the Exchequer, he is of a very imaginative turn of mind indeed. I am of opinion that a Vote of this kind is an invitation to men in Africa and different parts of the world to spend the money. They will say, "If this money is not spent it will be returned to the Treasury; why should we not have a finger in the pie? It is quite as good for us to see the necessity of having it spent as to have it returned to the Treasury." I utterly and completely object to vote and decline to vote money on the understanding that if it is not used it can be returned to the Treasury. I see that last year £1,200 was put down for services on the West Coast of Africa. This year that item is omitted, for purposes of economy, I suppose; but, strangely enough, exactly that amount is added to the item for unforeseen Missions. Last year the amount for these Missions was £10,250, and this year it is £11,450. I would ask how long has the practice of taking this Vote been in existence, and does the right hon. Gentleman think it desirable to ask for this money? Why does he fix on £11,450? Africa is an immense place, and if Missions there are expected millions of money might be spent on them. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman ask for £50,000, or even £100,000? We have been told about complications likely to arise between Germany and this country, or Portugal and this country, in regard to these immense tracts of country known as "spheres of influence." Well, with the rumours afloat as to German Colonial policy and our quarrels in Portugal, there is no doubt we may be embroiled in serious difficulties, and in such event I am afraid that this £11,450 might not be enough for the extra Missions and Services this country might be called on to undertake. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he approves of this system, how much money was spent in this way last year, and whether he can give us any sort of dark hint as to what the unforeseen Missions and Services in Africa may be this year? It would be more than natural if hon. Members did not seek an explanation of these matters.

*(9.55.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am afraid I cannot satisfy the hon. Gentleman. There has been a Mission to the West Coast of Africa, a Conference at Brussels, a Mission to Rome, and two special Missions to Berlin. These are all the Missions which I can remember just now. As the hon. Member is aware, the sum of £15,000 has been voted for unforeseen Missions for the past four years, that amount being found to be sufficient to meet probable requirements. In addition to that amount, in 1885 we had to ask for £12,500. in 1886-7 we spent £7,000, and in 1888 only £6,500. Last year we were within the Estimate, but we cannot hope that that will always be the case. The Committee knows the wide area over which the British Empire extends, and, therefore, over which the necessity for these special Missions extends. As in the Civil Service at home, there is a Vote for "Contingencies," so in the Foreign Service we have to ask for this sum for unforeseen Missions.

Mr. W. Redmond

(9.57.) MR. W. REDMOND: Can the right hon. Gentleman give an instance of money being returned to the Treasury when voted for unforeseen Missions? I must say I feel inclined to congratulate myself on having got a good deal of satisfactory information from the right hon. Gentleman as to how the money was spent last year. He tells us they were arranging territorial lines with the French Government and that there was a Mission to Berlin and one to Rome. What an amount of time would be saved if the Government had the common sense to put the Missions on which the money was spent one year on the Votes of the year following! Can the right hon. Gentleman give us an instance of money being returned to the Treasury?

*(9.59.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: In the year 1887-8 £15,000 was voted and £6,500 spent. The surplus would be handed over to the Treasury or devoted to other purposes. It is, of course, impossible to say at the commencement of a year what the unforeseen contingencies for that year will be.

(10.0.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: This Vote must be strenuously resisted, seeing that it enables Her Majesty's Government to carry out such objectionable Missions as that to Rome last year without giving the House an opportunity of discussing them. There is nothing that involves the feelings of the people of this country more than a question of this kind, and I maintain that when the Government want to spend money in this way we should have Supplementary Estimates asked for. And now, to go alphabetically down the items of this Vote, I should like to say a word with regard to Egypt. I have made a great many speeches on the subject of Egypt, and the reason I have done so is because Her Majesty's Government are still occupying that country. I should like to know what policy Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue in the matter of this occupation. The House has been told over and over again that our occupation of Egypt is to be only a temporary one, but the longer we stay there the less the signs are of our coming away. It would seem at present as if we are to stop there permanently; and if the Government mean that, I think they should tell us so honestly. Her Majesty's Government will tell us that they must remain in Egypt until the country is fit to govern itself; but do they want it to be able to govern itself? Are they taking the necessary steps to render such a thing possible? They sent a very distinguished man—Lord Dufferin—to Egypt a short time ago to render the place capable of governing itself, and he laid down a certain line of policy with that object in view; but his plans have never been carried out. Lord Dufferin's Mission was a farce and a sham, as no attempt has ever been made to follow its conclusions. The financial administration of Egypt appears to be successful from the bondholders' point of view, but that success has only been secured at the expense of increasing the taxation of the country. There has not been the slightest real attempt made to make Egypt a self governing country, while the internal administration has been starved, the provision for education especially having been kept down to the lowest possible point. We have doubled the value of the bonds in Egypt no doubt, and the French and English bondholders have reason to praise us. But, again I ask, is that an advantage? We are often told that as long as we hold Egypt it will be an embarrassment to us in time of peace and an infinitely greater embarrassment in time of war. It involves jealousy and want of friendship on the part of the French, and what I should like to do is to patch up a decent Native Government, get together a good Native Army, and leave Egypt to take care of itself. I do not think the Prime Minister is right in saying that Orientals are not capable of carrying on a Constitutional Government. You have failed in Egypt because you have not tried, and in Turkey because the Turks were not willing. But great aptitude for Constitutional government has been shown. I should like to ask what is the present state of the negotiations as regards the loans, whether the French have considered the question of conversion more favourably, and whether Her Majesty's Government have agreed to the request of the French to consent to a new loan? I should also like the right hon. Gentleman to give us some explanation of the state of things in the country about Suakin, and to say what is the policy of the Government with regard to Suakin.

(10.12.) MR. W. REDMOND: I should like to ask whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the advisableness of commuting, to some extent, the sentence passed on Arabi Pasha? It has been represented to me, I believe with justice, that he is suffering very severely indeed from the climate of Ceylon. The Government, when I brought the subject forward some time ago, did not hold out any hope that the sentence would be remitted. I think that at this time of day they might with great propriety consider the advisableness of remitting the sentence, or, at all events, of allowing him to be consulted as to whether he would like to go to some other part of the world.

(10.13) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): There are three or four Votes other than those to which the attention of the Government has been directed and of which I think some notice ought to be taken. Over and over again we hear of the large salaries granted to German Princes who are brought over to obtain positions which they cannot possibly get at home. In these Votes we find large sums being paid to Ambassadors and Chargés d'Affaires in petty little States in Germany. The miserable little German Principality of Coburg has a Chargé d'Affaires who gets £500 a year and £200 a year besides for the premises he occupies. In Darmstadt, another impotent, obscure, and very small Principality, you have a Chargé d'Affaires who gets a salary of £1,050 besides £200 for rent. Compare these with the Kingdom of Saxony—a larger portion of the German Empire—and you find that the Secretary of Legation gets £750 a year with the sum of £200 for his rent. I think we ought to have some explanation of this matter. This seems to be a means of providing for the scions of noble houses something to do in places where nothing can be done. I think, Sir, that while there is such trouble at home it is a great and crying injustice to grant these large sums of money in the hole-and-corner way in which again and again it is sought to be done in the House of Commons. This Vote is put down for the first evening of the Session in the hope that Members would not attend. That is not the way in which the business of the House of Commons should be conducted, and I sincerely hope we shall have some explanation of the items I have referred to. There are so many blots in this Vote that it would take a very long time were we to go into them all. I pity Her Majesty's Government and the unfortunate Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, who has to assume all the responsibility with respect to these matters, knowing the miserable deficiencies and defects that are apparent in the Vote. I will, however, content myself with asking for an explanation of one other item. The British Medical Officer of Health at Constantinople gets £400 a year, and there is a note in the Estimates stating that that is merely an allowance made to the physician of the Embassy. I wish to know whether that position is open to competition, or is it in the gift of Members of the Government? To my mind, all these posts should be thrown open to competition, so that young men of merit may be able to reach the positions to which they are entitled by their worth.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I omitted to move the reduction of the Vote, and I wish to do so now.

THE CHAIRMAN: Several subsequent questions have been addressed to the right hon. Gentleman, and he will be unable to answer them if the hon. Member moves the reduction of a specific item now.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I hope the hon. Member will not think it necessary to move the reduction. It is a fact that the burden of taxation in Egypt has been reduced and that the revenue has increased from natural causes. The doubt which the hon. Member has expressed on the subject is the first suggestion I have heard for many weeks contrary to the general impression that there are indications of greatly increased prosperity among the people of Egypt. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), who recently returned from Egypt, has spoken of the indications of prosperity that he noticed, and surely his evidence may be accepted as that of a competent and impartial witness. The best proofs are the increased comfort of the people, the increase of revenue from diminished taxes, and the improvement in the system of public works, which brings more land into cultivation and enables the people to bear either an abnormally high Nile or an abnormally low Nile without serious damage. In spite of the heavy expenditure last year, there is a surplus of revenue over expenditure. It is much to be regretted that the conversion proposal has not been carried out, because it would have lightened the burdens of the people very considerably; but I hope arrangements will be come to by negotiation whereby the end will be attained. As to the question of the hon. Member for Cork (Dr. Tanner), these discussions may be indefinitely prolonged if Members who have not been present early in the evening come in and ask questions that have been already answered.

Dr. Tanner

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman pardon me for a moment? I heard only last night that this Vote was coming on to-day, and I travelled post-haste from Cork in consequence.

*(10.29.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: Well, I have already stated that the Government, pursuant to a pledge to reduce the small Missions in Germany, have not filled up the post in Stuttgart, and I think other positions when they become vacant will not be filled up. The doctor in Constantinople is undoubtedly not appointed by open competition. The medical officers are generally appointed in consultation with the Ambassador under whom they have to serve, and I think the Public Service does not suffer by the fact that these appointments are not put up to public competition.

(10.30.) DR. TANNER: I may explain that when I called attention to the medical member of the Legation I knew nothing whatever of the gentleman in question. I thought it would be for the interest of the Service to apply the principle which has elsewhere been much followed, of submitting the claims of members of the medical profession to examination rather than leaving them to interest.

(10.31.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): The hon. Gentleman near me (Sir G. Campbell) seems to have most strange information. The information I have received, and some of it from Egyptian sources, leaves no doubt that the condition of Egypt has improved immensely in the last few years; the income has increased by the natural increase of wealth and of population, and taxation has been remitted. If the French would agree upon the conversion which is proposed by Her Majesty's Government, still further benefits would accrue to the population of Egypt. I think that under these circumstances it is a little disappointing to find the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy making such statements as those we have just listened to.

(10.32.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I purposely avoided going into particulars. The habits and the condition of the people of Egypt are not to be appreciated by figures. I have formed my opinion upon careful study and personal observation, but I knew when I expressed that opinion that the only result would be expressions of opinion from this side or that. As regards the financial question, having spent a winter in Egypt lately, and having studied the question carefully from means of information kindly afforded me, I maintain most deliberately that the revenue has been increased, not by a natural rise, but by the imposition of increased taxation, although I admit that in some cases taxation has been remitted. Remissions have been on the smallest scale, while taxation has been imposed in direct contravention of the recommendations of the highest authorities. Lord Dufferin and Lord Northbrook recommended that the Land Tax should be remitted, and it was not remitted, and a Salt Tax and other taxes have been imposed. But I do not wish to detain the Committee with statistics. I maintain, however, that my opinion, arrived at after careful study of facts, cannot be contradicted by any expert. Additional burdens have been imposed though I admit the result has proved—the revenue being obtained—that the people have been able for the time to bear these burdens. There was another point I referred to—the state of affairs near Suakin, but I will revert to that on the Consular Vote.

(10.35.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): Until I heard the observations of the hon. Baronet the Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid), I was not disposed to quarrel with this item, but he makes clear a case against it; for if his information is correct—and I have no reason to doubt it—and we have been doing so much good to Egypt, then the inference is that that country should bear this expense, and we are not required to extend our philanthropy and benevolence further, but this £5,000 should be struck out of the Estimate. It is among the largest items of its kind, coming third after France and Germany. When we look at Sub-note B we are told that there is a further allowance of £1,000, so that the British taxpayer is called on to pay £6,000 on this account, a claim which is no longer justified. Members have wandered up and down these items, so that I scarcely know exactly what point we have reached; but there is an item in the Turkish Vote, and I may take this as a cognate subject upon which I should like information. I wonder what sort of a thing is an archivist. What is he or it? Why does Turkey want one; and if the Turks want one, why is it that other people do not? Is it simply a means of giving money to some one not giving his name? Also more information is wanted as to the items for chaplains and physicians in some cases and not in others. There are matters also that require elucidation in relation to unforeseen Missions; but, for the present, confining myself to this Egyptian item, I ask why we should vote this £6,000 on behalf of a people who, it appears, are well able to take care of themselves?

(10.38.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not contest the fact that the Egyptians are better off now than under the late Khedive; they may be better off without being well off. But our system is to enforce the payment of taxation, not to be spent in the country, but for the benefit of the owners of Egyptian bonds, who are practically all in Europe. A great deal too much is taken out of the country. It is not our business to look after the Egyptians or spend the money of the British taxpayer in order that they may be better off or well off. We went there many years ago under a specific pledge to Europe, and to France especially, that we did not go there to remain, but upon one excuse or another we have remained in absolute violation of our pledge. I have made continual complaints of this, and while the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in power, I must have divided the House some 30 or 40 times on this question, so that in no sense is it a Party question. But I do really think we ought to declare when we intend to leave the country now that we are practically told that Egypt is prosperous. If that is so, then we have fulfilled our purpose in going into Egypt and ought to leave the country. We are in an utterly false position towards the other European Powers, and especially towards France, so long as we remain in Egypt. There can be no warm feeling between the Governments of England and France so long as we remain there in absolute violation of our pledges. Now the hon. Baronet (Sir Julian Goldsmid) said in effect Egypt is a flourishing garden, and everybody there is sharing in the wealth and riches. Well, but only this morning I received a document, and I daresay the hon. Baronet received one also, which somewhat conflicts with that view of things. It was a circular from the Consul at Alexandria, and he asks for money because, he says, there is so much poverty in Alexandria—such a vast number of poor people for whom no employment can be provided. This is certainly in conflict with the statement that Egypt is in a prosperous condition. Allusion has been made to the exiles from Egypt—Arabi and his friends in Ceylon. I have frequently received communications from them, and several of them are most anxious to leave Ceylon. They were turned out of Egypt, and there was some sort of pledge given at their trial that they should be treated as political exiles, but in some curious way they are detained as prisoners in Ceylon. They are not allowed to leave; they cannot leave, because the allowance they have from the Egyptian Government would cease if they left Ceylon. Now, I do not think we ought to convert one of our Colonies into a gaol for the Egyptian Government. When we talk of the Egyptian Government, practically in a matter of this kind it does not exist. We know that practically it is only for the British Government to say the word and these people would be allowed to return to Egypt. It may be asked, why should the Egyptian Government make an allowance to these persons? The answer is because the Egyptian Government confiscated all their property under a system which in England is not recognised. These men have wives and children, and it is monstrous, because these men, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian would say, "rightly struggled to be free," that they, with their wives and families, should have their property confiscated and be deprived of the means of living. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will state that Her Majesty's Government will use their best offices to alleviate the fate of these unfortunate men. I received a letter from one of them only a week or two ago, in which he says they are suffering greatly from the climate, that his health is being injured, and that he is most anxious to be allowed, if not to go back to Egypt, to reside in some part of the dominions of the Sultan or in Cyprus, or, at any rate, to leave Ceylon. Will the right hon. Gentleman say that the best endeavours of Her Majesty's Government will be used to induce the Egyptian Government to agree either that these men shall be allowed to come back to Egypt, and that their allowance shall be continued, or that they shall be allowed to proceed to any part of the Sultan's dominions?

Mr. Labouchere

(10.47.) COLONEL NOLAN: There is a not unimportant question I wish to ask, and that is, what is the exact position of an "Agent" in the Diplomatic Service? He is not an Ambassador or a Chargé d'Affaires—these are well-known terms. But does he rank as a member of the Diplomatic Corps or as a Consul? I see also that our Representative in Bulgaria is also styled an Agent. It is a question of some importance, and upon the definition the gravest complications might arise. Is the Agent an accredited member of the Diplomatic Corps, and entitled to all the privileges of such a position? We know that the French and German War was precipitated by a fancied slight offered to an Ambassador, which, if offered to a Consul, would not have provoked such resentment. It has been asserted also that the Abyssinian War arose out of King Theodore's want of appreciation of the distinction between the positions of a Consul and a Chargé d'Affaires. Also I wish to know if the military attachés are put down in the Military Votes, and, if so, why, in regard to Russia, the military attaché is included in the Diplomatic Vote?

*(10.50.) SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : Certainly our Agent in Egypt is classed among our Diplomatic Representatives. It will be observed that he is so described also in Bulgaria and in Zanzibar. There are other cases, including that of Egypt, where our Representative is styled "Agent." Of course, he is also Consul General, and undoubtedly in Egypt it is a diplomatic position of high importance, and hardly second to any Mission in Europe. The position of Sir Evelyn Baring is not only extremely important, but he has made it a position highly creditable to himself. Sir E. Baring is head of the Consular Staff as well as our Diplomatic Agent, and he has agents at Cairo, Alexandria, Suakin, the Somali Coast, and other places; in fact, he holds the reins of our policy in Egypt in his hands. I am somewhat surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Waddy) should have raised the question as to the archivist. Of course, he is the officer who keeps the records of the Mission, who supplies precedents, makes researches into history whenever such are required for reference, and it is a duty of great importance. The question of chaplains was dealt with at an earlier period of the evening, and I need not refer to it again. The hon. Member for Northampton is perfectly consistent in his views with respect to Egypt. He saw that whatever might be the increased prosperity of the country too much is taken out of it, and undoubtedly it is a matter of great hindrance to the progress of that country that about 40 or 42 per cent. of the public revenue should be devoted to the payment of bondholders, but if we consider that only four years ago the country was unable to pay any interest on the debt, and that within the last two years Egypt has been able to re-pay the coupons and to meet the current interest, and that the Government have more than a million in reserve and a surplus on the present year, then it is evident that in spite of the tremendous strain the resources of the country are increasing, and that the burden practically is becoming less and less every year. There is no use in discussing whether our stay in Egypt is an element of disturbance in our European relations. No doubt it is a troublesome duty, and it was accepted unwillingly on this side of the House as well as on the other; but it is a duty which is being fulfilled in a manner which has surpassed all possible expectations. As for the exiles, I fancy that it was a happy case for Arabi and the others, that the British Government stepped in to procure exile for them in exchange for the execution which would otherwise probably have been inflicted upon them. They fared better by their detention in Ceylon than some of their predecessors, who, being exiled, yet never reached their place of exile. It is not, in the view of the Egyptian Government, desirable that these men should return to Egypt at present. It is said that the Egyptian Government is practically the British Government, but the British Government interfere as little as possible with the Egyptian administration. It is highly to the credit of the Khedive and his Ministers that they have lent themselves to reform and have availed themselves of the advice of the British Government.

(10.58.) MR. LABOUCHERE : I must protest against the view of the right hon. Gentleman. He says it is extremely likely that these men will suffer perpetual exile.

SIR J. FERGUSSON : No.

MR. LABOUCHERE : Well, it has extended over 10 years, and still the British Government hold out no hope of its termination. The right hon. Gentleman thinks that these men are extremely fortunate, and that under a former Government they would have been poisoned. According to the right hon. Gentleman, there are criminal conspirators in England and even in this House. Why not apply the same rule of mercy in Egypt as in this country? These men fought against a foreign enemy, and I regret exceedingly that Arabi was beaten in the battle. Arabi and his friends have been sent to Ceylon because they took one side in what was essentially an Egyptian question. The right hon. Gentleman says the Egyptian Government are not willing that they should return to Egypt, but does he mean to say the Egyptian Government would resist a view expressed by Her Majesty's Government that the exiles should be allowed to leave Ceylon and still retain their allowance? I do protest against turning an English colony into a perpetual political prison for men who have taken a certain side in Egyptian politics, and I think the right hon. Gentleman should undertake to use his best efforts to induce the Egyptian Government to grant the application of these exiles for permission to live elsewhere than in Ceylon. I think they should, if they removed, be allowed to retain their pensions. I ask now that an inquiry should be held as to whether these men wish to remain in Ceylon or whether they will give their parole not to return to Egypt if allowed to live elsewhere. I received a letter from one of them, the other day, stating that his health is endangered and that he is most anxious to be allowed to return to Egypt, or, at all events, to go into some part of the Sultan's dominions, still retaining his allowance.

*(11.3.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £300, the salary of the chaplain under the head of "Denmark." I think we should have further explanations on this Vote.

(11.3.) THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! In consequence of the way in which the first reduction was moved it is not competent to the hon. Member to move to reduce the Vote by this particular item.

*(11.4.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I may, perhaps, explain that the place where this chaplain is stationed is the resort of a large British seafaring population. The salary is only £85 a year, but the chaplain also receives an equivalent to subscriptions from residents, so that the total payment is £200 a year.

Mr. Labouchere

*(11.5.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: That explanation does not touch the point I wish to impress on the Committee. Many of us largely represent Nonconformists, and our constituents want to know the reasons for making these appointments. I ask the question in no spirit of opposition, but I think the right hon. Gentleman will admit that there is an entire absence of fairness in the way in which chaplains are distributed. Some first-class Embassies have no chaplains at all. There may be reasons why Denmark should have a chaplain, but I think it more important that there should be a chaplain at Havre. Now, we have in these kingdoms two Established Churches—the Established Church of England and the Established Church of Scotland. A large number of our sailors are Presbyterians; yet we never hear of a Presbyterian minister being appointed. I submit that these foreign chaplaincies should be abolished altogether, for I am sure no reasonable explanation can be given of the manner in which these appointments are distributed.

(11.7.) MR. W. REDMOND: I did hope the right hon. Gentleman would have replied to the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton, for he might, at any rate, have promised to make inquiry into the case of the Egyptian exiles in Ceylon, and have undertaken that doctors should investigate the complaint that their health is being injured by their enforced residence in the island. The right hon. Gentleman took great credit because these men were exiled instead of being killed, but if the climate is injurious to their health they will eventually be killed. I think the right hon. Gentleman was singularly unfortunate in the reasons he gave why we should be satisfied with the condition of Egyptian affairs. He told us the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had returned from Egypt satisfied with the condition of the country. If he has done so I cannot help at once jumping to the conclusion that something is radically wrong there. And it is not an unreasonable thing to do, for the right hon. Gentleman went to America, and there altogether upset every chance of arriving at a satisfactory arrangement of the Fishery dispute. He brought back with him totally erroneous ideas of American politics, and he was presented with an address of congratulation before it was discovered that his ideas were all wrong.

(11.10.) MR. WADDY: I propose to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000, in connection with the salary of the Agent for Egypt, and I do so for financial reasons. Looking down the list of salaries I see that £4,000 is the highest paid to an officer of this kind, and I think the sum paid to the agent for Egypt may reasonably be reduced from £5,000 to £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That a sum, not exceeding £306,909 be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Waddy.)

*(11.13.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I can assure the hon. Member I have not intentionally abstained from answering any question put to me. Other opportunities will arise for discussing Egyptian affairs. With regard to the position of Arabi and the other exiles in Ceylon, if the hon. Member for Northampton will give me the name of the person in Ceylon suffering in health it shall be inquired into. As to the Motion of the hon. Member for the Brigg division of Lincolnshire, I cannot agree to it, as, from the important duties of the Agent and the eminent services he renders, the salary of £5,000 is not too high.

(11.15.) COLONEL NOLAN: I think the right hon. Gentleman has misconceived the intention of the hon. Member for Northampton. He has told us the Government have undertaken the responsibility of keeping Arabi Pasha and his colleagues in exile, but seeing that these men have been in exile so many years, surely the time has come when it is possible to accept their personal guarantee that they will not attempt to disturb the peace of Egypt.

(11.18.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 149.—(Div. List No. 46.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(11.33.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: After Egypt comes the Equator, and after the Equator comes France, and the question that has arisen with that country in regard to the Newfoundland Fisheries. This is a very important subject, on which I think the Committee are entitled to some explanation. I do not wish to cast any imputation on Her Majesty's Government, nor do I suspect them of any desire to see them make bad blood with France; on the contrary, I believe Her Majesty's Government are inclined to do their best to settle this question in an equitable manner. My only doubt is as to whether Her Majesty's Government have sufficient firmness to settle this matter in the way in which it ought to be settled. The best temporary arrangement that could have been made was that which was arranged under the modus vivendi; but as soon as that arrangement was known, the people of Newfoundland denounced it, and threatened all sorts of terrible things if the modus vivendi were enforced, which might lead to serious difficulties with France. There can be no doubt that this has become a very burning question, and it is exceedingly desirable and necessary to ensure a good understanding between this country and France, that the matter should be permanently settled. I hope not only that Her Majesty's Government will insist on the modus vivendi, and enforce it for the time being, but that steps may be taken for putting an end to the dispute for all time. I would submit to Her Majesty's Government that this is pre-eminently a question for judicial arbitration, especially as it is one which might be the means of plunging this country into war, as the consequence of an outburst of feeling on the part of the people of the different countries whose interests are affected. If it were brought before something like a Court of Arbitration, by which all parties would be bound, the question might admit of an easy and satisfactory solution, and I want to know from Her Majesty's Government whether they intend to adopt such a course? No doubt the French and English Governments may have come to an arrangement satisfactory to themselves, but that is not enough. They have also to deal with the Newfoundland colony, and not only to carry the colony with them, but to satisfy the different sections of the colony, among whom violent prejudices exist in regard to what are claimed as French rights. The great advantage of arbitration would be that even it would satisfy all parties, we would be able to say, we have had a judicial decision, and the question has been settled fairly and with due reference to the interests of all parties. I was very pleased to see it stated in the Times newspaper that the French minister had said the only way of settling this question was by arbitration. The right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs shakes his head; therefore I suppose that was a mistake; but at any rate we ought to hear from the Government whether they are prepared to accept the proposal to allow the matter to be settled by arbitration. We had a remarkable instance of the feeling which animated the Newfoundland people in regard to the bait question. The Legislature of Newfoundland insisted on passing a very unfriendly Act, by which the French fishermen were deprived of the facilities for buying bait. That bait question was one of the principal matters on which the late elections turned, and the result was that the promoters of the Bait Act were defeated, because the great majority of the poorer people of Newfoundland found the French very good customers, and were desirous of being enabled to sell bait to them. I have in my hand a letter in which the writer speaks of the dreadful things that will be done if the British Government does not uphold the rights of Newfoundland, but there are a great many people in Newfoundland who would rather have the French there. At any rate there are two sides to the question. I hope the Government will assure us that they are not only determined to enforce the modus vivendi but that they are prepared to make a good solid effort to settle this question for good, if possible, by arbitration, so that an equitable, reasonable, and judicial arrangement may be arrived at.

(11.45.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman has in his speech pointed out some of the great difficulties which encompass this question, and which show the extreme necessity of caution in discussing this matter. I do not think Her Majesty's Government require to be shown that the subject should be handled with the greatest caution, and that, if possible, it should be brought to an early conclusion. We have done all we possibly can to accomplish that object, permanently, if possible, if not, temporarily. As to the modus vivendi, which the hon. Gentleman says has excited very strong feeling in Newfoundland, we still hope that it may be found practicable. The hon. Gentleman says he has seen the statement in a telegram that Her Majesty's Government are averse to arbitration. I do not think that is the case, and having read the Report of what took place in the French Chamber, in extenso, I think what the French Minister said is the very reverse of what the hon. Gentleman has stated. The French Minister said that there were probably some questions to be brought forward "on which we might be averse to arbitration," but on that and another point the British Government were probably willing to take arbitration. I think we should be very careful of the feelings of the people of Newfoundland, and, by moderation in insisting on a settlement, show that we appreciate their strong feeling. Anything which interferes with their industry necessarily must be unpopular with them. At the same time we have obligations under treaty, and if doubt has arisen as to the interpretation of that treaty, it is most desirable that it should be settled without the slightest risk of quarrel between the two great nations. But there are some points which we cannot refer to arbitration—they are our natural rights. But there are subsidiary points which could not have been foreseen when the treaties were framed, and as to which I trust and believe Her Majesty's Government would not be averse to arbitration. But if such an arbitration is to be successful it is evident that, in the first place, there must be concurrence among all the parties, and there must be agreement also as to the order of preference. These things are not easily done, but I hope they will be accomplished, if not otherwise, by arbitration. Ever since the Government has been in office, no stone has been left unturned to bring about an amicable settlement of this long-pending difference, and it is, at all events, a matter of great satisfaction to know that collisions have been avoided, the good feeling of the officers employed having mainly conducted to that result.

Sir G. Campbell

(11.50.) MR. W. REDMOND: I did not propose to intervene again, but I must be allowed to say that Her Majesty's Government did not properly or adequately consult the people of Newfoundland before they arrived at this modus vivendi, which has been condemned in the French Chamber and by public opinion, and about which there is a very strong feeling in Newfoundland. I could understand if Her Majesty's Government had been brought to this modus vivendi under pressure from France, their saying to the people of Newfoundland, "We have been obliged, through pressure of circumstances to concur with French opinions for the time being," and that would have been an argument in favour of the position of Her Majesty's Government with the people of Newfoundland. But the people of Newfoundland are able to say that Her Majesty's Government were not forced into this modus vivendi, which is distasteful to French opinion. They can say "French opinion is as much opposed to it as our own opinion here in Newfoundland." The whole difficulty lies in the fact that the people of Newfoundland were not consulted as to this modus vivendi, and I think it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to invite representatives of the colony concerned to a discussion of the question. I am perfectly certain that had the people of Newfoundland been asked to send delegates to discuss the modus vivendi they would have sent representatives who would have been consulted by Her Majesty's Government, and who would have been thoroughly informed as to what was necessary for the time being. Had that been done, the feeling of the people of Newfoundland would not have been nearly so strong in the matter. It only remains for Her Majesty's Government to bring about a settlement of the question as speedily as possible, and that can only be done by a formal invitation to the Government of Newfoundland to send delegates. I have asked that repeatedly of the right hon. Gentleman, and he has always replied, not that a formal invitation had been sent, but that the Government would be very glad indeed to see representatives of Newfoundland.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: May I remind the hon. Member that I stated the other night that we had formally and repeatedly requested the Premier of Newfoundland to come to this country, and that if he brought delegates with him we should be glad to receive them.

MR. W. REDMOND: I did not understand that to be the right hon. Gentleman's answer to the questions which I put, and it is not in accordance with my information. I only hope that when the Newfoundland delegates do arrive they will be thoroughly consulted; and I trust this will be a lesson to Her Majesty's Government not to enter into any engagement on behalf of responsible colonies of the Empire without first thoroughly, and in a satisfactory manner, consulting the chosen representatives of such colonies.

*(11.55.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I quite admit that it is necessary that the colony of Newfoundland should be consulted, but it seems to me that all parties might come to an arrangement by means of arbitration. What I do ask is that questions of interpretation of the treaty should be judicially decided by arbitration. Now, Sir, we have made considerable progress, and as there are numerous questions still remaining on this Vote, in regard to salaries and other matters for discussion, I move that you now report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am sorry I cannot consent to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. We have been discussing this Vote for eight hours, and surely, if there is to be any regard for proportion, eight hours are sufficient for the consideration of the Vote. I move that the Question be now put.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is, "That the Original Question be now put."

Dr. TANNER and Sir G. CAMPBELL were named as Tellers for the "Noes."

Dr. TANNER: Mr. Courtney, I did not speak on this occasion at all.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I heard the hon. Gentleman say "No."

DR. TANNER: I congratulate the Chairman on his acuteness of hearing. I decline to tell, Mr. Courtney.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member for Mid Cork says he did not challenge a Division, he is at liberty to decline to tell; but if, as I understand, he did challenge a Division, he is bound to tell.

DR. TANNER: I can assure the Chairman of Committees I made no statement whatsoever on the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

(12.2.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 39.—(Div. List, No. 47.)

Question put, "That the Original Question be now put."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 143, Noes 39.—(Div. List, No. 47.)

Question put accordingly, and agreed to.

It being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT (RE-COMMITTED) BILL. (No. 220.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*(12.20.) MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to move the Second Reading of the Clause which stands in my name. Under the Bill, as it stands, shipowners may be required to have their load-lines fixed, and they will have the choice either of a Surveyor appointed by the Committee of Lloyd's Register, or of one appointed by the Board of Trade. If there is reason to believe that the load-line fixed is not the best one, there are no means of getting it altered until modifications have been arrived at with the Board of Trade. The Bill is based on the recommendation of the Load Line Committee, who, in their Report, expressed an opinion in favour of the setting up of a Body of a more representative character than the Board of Trade to deal with the matter. In the Schedule I have attached to the Bill I have provided such an Authority as is aimed at in the Report of the Committee; but I am not absolutely wedded to it, and shall be willing to alter it in any way the House may think desirable.

New Clause—

"The registered owner of any ship shall have a right of appeal from the decision of the Board of Trade, or of any corporation, association, or committee appointed by the Board of Trade for the purpose of fixing the disc of any such ship as aforesaid, to a committee, which shall be appointed from time to time by the President of the Board of Trade in accordance with the schedule to this Act,"—(Mr. Baird,) —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(12.23.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I quite recognise the object of my hon. Friend in moving this clause, and entirely agree with him in the desire that the load-line should be fixed by some body of experts rather than by the Board of Trade. But the proposal of my hon. Friend is that, when the shipowner has chosen his own tribunal for the fixing of the load-line, if he is dissatisfied with the decision of that tribunal he should have an appeal to another tribunal. I hope my hon. Friend will not press this Amendment. If he will withdraw it, I will undertake on Report to obviate one of the objections he has raised as to the shortness of the term before which this Bill comes into effect. I will move to substitute six months for three. That will give a longer time for the formation of any such Association as is contemplated in the Bill, and will enable the shipowners on the north-west coast to form a Committee to fix a load-line for their ships.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported.

As amended, to be considered upon Wednesday.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 15th April, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

AMERICAN QUESTIONS DUTIES ON BRITISH CUTLERY.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the amount of the duty upon British cutlery and hardware imported into the United States; and, in the event of there being any truth in the Report that it is to be still further increased, if diplomatic efforts will be used to modify such intention in the direction of those so successfully employed by Germany when, upon a recent occasion, Spain thought of putting a prohibiting duty upon German goods?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): It would be impossible to state, within the limits of an answer in this House, what the duties on cutlery and hardware in the United States are. But particulars will be found in the Return of Foreign Import Duties laid before the House in 1885 (H. C., 178 of 1885). As regards contemplated additional duties, we are not in possession of detailed or official information. The introduction of the new Tariff Bill has been deferred for the present, and, under these circumstances, the Government do not propose to take any steps at the present moment.

LONDON TRAMWAYS.

MR. THOMAS HENRY BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, as portions of Tramways (in London) will, in the course of next year, become subject to the option of purchase reserved to Local Authorities under "The Tramways Act, 1870," and as the London County Council has passed a resolution in support of the proposal to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of that Act, and to consider and report as to the desirability of further legislation in the interests of the public with reference to tramways (notice relating to Orders of the Day, 9th May next), whether the Government will consent to the immediate appointment of the proposed Select Committee in order that the inquiry may commence without any delay?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Tramway legislation is, no doubt, of great importance to the London County Council, but it is of still greater importance to other Local Authorities, who have not, so far as I am aware, expressed any opinion with regard to it; and, under all the circumstances, I am not prepared to grant a Committee without debate.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the London County Council are of opinion that this question is so important that they have been carefully considering the whole matter, that they are prepared to give evidence if a Committee is appointed, and that the Tramway Companies themselves appreciate the necessity of the inquiry?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That may be very possible.

BELFAST SCHOOLS.

DR. FOX (King's County, Tullamore): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what was the total cost to the State per child in average attendance in the Belfast Model School for the year ending 31st March, 1889; what was the corresponding figure for the St. Enoch National Schools, Belfast; how many monitors or pupil teachers from the Belfast Model School have been appointed teachers in the Belfast National Schools during the past five years; how many in National Schools outside Belfast; and what are the corresponding numbers for the St. Enoch National Schools, Belfast, under the management of the Rev. Hugh Hanna, D.D.?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Commissioners of National Education report that the total cost to the State per child referred to in the first paragraph was £3 1s. 3d., or including charge on Board of Works Vote and cost of staff of residential pupil teachers, £4 0s. 8d. The corresponding figure for the St. Enoch National Schools was £1 15s. 7d. Two monitors and 27 pupil teachers were appointed teachers in the circumstances indicated in the third paragraph. In National Schools outside Belfast the numbers were three monitors and 33 pupil teachers. In the St. Enoch National Schools in Belfast eight monitors were so appointed. There are no pupil teachers employed there. In these schools outside Belfast none were appointed.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES ACT.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what proportion of the value of the sales which have taken place under "The Encumbered Estates Act, 1848," is estimated to relate to houses, and buildings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Registrar to the Land Judges reports that there are no means of supplying the information indicated in this question, but that, speaking generally, the house property sold was inconsiderable.

LAND PURCHASE RETURNS.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the Return Land Purchase (Ireland) (Names of Landowners), No. 81, of 1889, whether he can state, in reference to the particulars in the column headed Rental, what amount of the rental of £214,922 14s. 4d. consists of non-judicial rents, what amount consists of judicial rents fixed under the Act of 1881, and what amount consists of judicial rents revised under the Act of 1887; whether he will arrange that in the continuation of the above-named Return, to be presented on the Motion of the right hon. Member for Newcastle, the three classes of rents above alluded to will be separately set forth; and whether he will state the numbers of the above-mentioned three classes of tenants respectively subsisting in Ireland, up to the latest available date?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that it would not be practicable to make the distinction indicated in the first paragraph of the question without investigating every individual case, which would be a work of considerable labour. I may, however, point out that judicial rents were not revised under the Act of 1887. The enactment referred to solely provided for the temporary adjustment of such rents for the years 1887, 1888, and 1889. A reference to the monthly Return of proceedings of the Land Commission, which is regularly laid before Parliament, will show the number of cases in which judicial rents have been fixed. There is no record of the number of tenants who have not had judicial rents fixed.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

THE REV. J. BROWN, C.C.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Rev. J. Brown, C.C. of Ramsgrange, County Wexford, has received a communication from the Resident Magistrate of the district, informing him that he would be followed by the police if he did not refrain from holding meetings of the National League; and whether, in pursuance of this threat, it is true that a police constable followed Father Brown into the house of a dying woman; and, if so, whether the police acted in accordance with their instructions, and whether this part of the County Wexford is quite free from crime?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet been able to obtain the information which would enable me to answer the question.

MR. W. REDMOND: Are we to understand that a matter such as this can occur without the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is a question whether it did occur.

MR. W. REDMOND: I beg to give notice that I will repeat the question tomorrow.

THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the meeting of Fermanagh landlords held in Enniskillen, on Saturday, the 5th April, at which resolutions were passed unanimously, complaining of several of the provisions of the Land Purchase Bill; and whether the Government intend to take any action in regard to the Bill, in view of the attitude taken up by the Fermanagh landlords?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government will pursue the same course with regard to this Bill that has always been pursued with regard to measures submitted to Parliament—namely, to take advantage of arguments and expressions of opinion, from whatever quarter of the House they come, to make the measure as perfect as possible.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will criminal proceedings be taken against Lord Erne for describing the Bill as one for the expulsion of the English garrison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have seen the letter of Lord Erne, who is not, however, in the councils of the Government.

DISHORNING OF CATTLE.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland if the dishorning of cattle is an illegal operation in Ireland; and, if so, will he take steps to enforce the law, so as to prevent this cruelty being inflicted upon dumb animals?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The law on this subject is at present in a somewhat unsettled state. In England the Queen's Bench Division decided, in 1889, that the practice of dishorning cattle as proved before them was illegal under the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act. In Ireland, the Exchequer Division had previously, in the year 1884, come to the same conclusion. A contrary decision, however, had been pronounced by the Common Pleas Division in Ireland in the year 1885, on the evidence presented to the Court as to the character and effects of the practice, which evidence (as Lord Coleridge observed) was very different from that given in the English case; and in Scotland the Court of Session appear to have also decided in favour of the legality of the practice. The matter recently came before me officially. It appeared to me desirable that the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division in Ireland should be taken on the point, upon full and satisfactory evidence, and for that purpose I gave directions that the attention of the police should be called to the matter, with a view to instituting a prosecution if the practice were found to continue to exist in Ireland.

DR. FITZGERALD: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the subject on the Estimates, and move the reduction of the Vote.

THE LANDED ESTATES COURT.

MR. SEXTON, who had the following question on the Paper,—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table a Return of Irish Estates in the Landed Estates Court for sale, showing the location of each estate, the name of the landlord, the rateable valuation, the actual present rental, the highest offer made in each case in which there has been any offer of purchase, and the period for which each estate has been in the hands of the Court?—said: I will ask this question on Thursday, as I understand the right hon. Gentleman is not ready to answer it.

"THE CROWN V. RYE."

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Messrs. Roche and Butler, Resident Magistrates, adjourned the Court in the case of "the Crown v. Rye" at Crookstown, against the repeatedly expressed wish of three Local Justices, including Mr. Harold; whether the report is true that the adjournment was moved in order to secure the attendance of Corcoran, the man who was wounded, and that after the adjournment one of the Resident Magistrates proceeded to Corcoran's house and succeeded, without much difficulty, in bringing him into Court, when he swore that Rye fired twice wilfully at him; whether it has been now proved that District Inspector St. George had not summoned Corcoran to attend as a witness in this case, and did not, as alleged, procure a car to convey the wounded man to Court, a distance of three miles; and whether any notice will be taken of the delay to justice in this case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that it is the case that the Court was adjourned for a short time, with the object and with the result indicated in the second paragraph of the question, but that it is not the case that the adjournment was against the wishes of the Local Justices present, including the gentleman named. Corcoran was not summoned, he having been bound by recognizances to attend. There was no delay of justice beyond the interruption occasioned by Corcoran's reluctance to attend.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that Mr. Harold did not attend on the last occasion in consequence of being in the employment of Captain Rye?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on that point.

DR. TANNER: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the matter, and also to a breach of privilege of this House, which has occurred in connection with it.

THE PURCHASE OF LAND ACT, 1885.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many acres of land in Ireland have been purchased by the Irish Land Commission under Clause 5 of "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885;" what amount has been expended by the Land Commission in purchasing the same; how many acres have been sold by the Land Commission under the above clause, what amount has been realised for them, and what number of acres so purchased does the Commission still hold; what is the number of acres and purchase value of holdings resumed by the Land Commission from tenant purchasers under Clause 3; and how many of these have been re-sold to fresh purchasers, and at what price?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not been able to obtain a report on the subject, owing to the insufficiency of the notice given.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is the intention of the Government to print their Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Bill has been read a first time and printed, and will be circulated immediately.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

TARIFF OF RATES IN THE DOCK-YARDS.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will introduce into the Royal Dockyards a similar system to that in force in private yards of furnishing to all workmen engaged on piecework a schedule or tariff of rates for each description of such piecework, such rates having been fixed from time to time by the managers of the yards in conference with delegates selected by the workmen?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): War-ship work is now so complicated and varied that no simple scale of rates could be fixed. Every endeavour is now made to fix rates after practical trial of the wages that can be earned on the different jobs. It is not considered desirable that the rates paid for piecework should be made a matter of arrangement between the local officers and workmen at the dockyards; but the Local Authorities now have full power of revising the rates.

H.M.S. BARRACOUTA.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham), who had the following question on the Paper—To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the expression of regret by the Coroner's Jury in the recent Barracouta case at Sheerness—

"That the Admiralty had not carried out the recommendations of the jury in the Thistle explosion in 1869, by providing hospital accommodation for injured men at Sheerness, and thus caused the necessity of sending cases to Chatham;"

whether he is aware that there is already at Sheerness a military hospital which is never full, where cases of accident could be treated; and whether he will take immediate steps to put an end to the unnecessary suffering caused by the present arrangements?—said: At the request of the First Lord I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

THE NEW IRONCLADS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.); I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state the approximate aggregate weight of the Palliser bolts and nuts to be used in the new ironclads Renown, Repulse, Resolution, Revenge, Hood, Royal Sovereign, Royal Oak, and Ramilies?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The aggregate weight of fastenings to armour-plates in the case of the ships specified is, roughly, about 1,000 tons. It should, however, be understood that the armour bolts in question have the reduced shanks proposed by the late Sir William Palliser, but in other respects they are not made on his plan.

THE CASE OF J. DAVIES.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will inquire into the case of J. Davies, recently an operative in Pembroke Dockyard, mutilated for life in the discharge of his duty; if he will make inquiries as to the statement that, after this mutilation occurred, a guard was placed round the machinery; why this guard was not placed there previously if the machinery was dangerous; and if, as J. Davies is now incapable of any work, it would be possible in any way to provide for him?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The case of James Davies has been brought to my notice. This man's left hand was unfortunately injured in October, 1887, while he was oiling a machine in motion. The wheels in which his hand was caught are 6ft. above the ground, and were not considered dangerous; but, as this man happened to get injured, a guard was subsequently placed around them. It would be impossible to guard all machines, so that men could not by any mischance be injured by them. The gratuity granted to Davies was the highest possible under established regulations in the case of injuries short of total and complete disability, namely, a gratuity equal to the whole of a year's wages at the rate of pay received at the time of injury. These regulations are based upon the Superannuation Acts Amendment Act of 1887, and have been presented to Parliament in the form of a Treasury Warrant. Davies is still reported as capable of contributing to his own support to a small degree; but even if he were now totally unable to do any work, no further grant could be made to him out of any money voted by Parliament.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Will the noble Lord say whether machinery in dockyards is subject to the usual inspection?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, Sir, it is.

THE LATE GENERAL SIR WILLIAM JONES.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to the following paragraph in the Times, of the 11th April, in reference to the funeral of the distinguished veteran, General Sir William Jones, G.C.B.; and if he can explain the circumstances of this painful case—

"The deceased officer recently expressed an earnest desire to receive the last honours paid to a soldier, and intimated his wish to His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, who immediately communicated with the War Office. A military funeral was then sanctioned, and the necessary instructions to the troops now in Dublin appeared on Wednesday, in the garrison orders. The funeral was arranged to start yesterday morning from the late General's residence, Lansdown Lodge, and at the hour appointed a force of police was drawn up outside, and a number of people assembled to witness the ceremony. After a delay, however, it became evident that some hitch had taken place. It appeared that on the previous evening a telegram had been received from Lord Wolseley countermanding the military funeral. The remains were conveyed to Mount Jerome Cemetery."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Nothing is known in the War Office of any arrangements having been made by the General Officer commanding in Ireland, as stated by the Times. On the 8th inst. a telegram was received from the General Officer commanding in Ireland asking if a military funeral could be given to the late General Sir W. Jones, but as the officer was not at the time of his decease "on full pay, employed on the staff, or in the exercise of any military command," a reply was sent expressing regret that the regulations did not admit of a military funeral being granted.

SIR E. WATKIN: Is it the fact that a General Officer of distinction, although he may not have been in full employment at the time of his death, is not to have military honours paid to him? Is the statement in the Times true, that the Quartermaster-General has authority to prevent military honours being paid, although permission has been given by the War Office?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The right to grant a military funeral rests with the War Office, but this case did not come within the rules. The Adjutant-General has absolute power to deal with all such cases, and he adopted the ordinary rule laid down.

THE VOLUNTEER OPERATIONS.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that the absence of regular troops from the operations at Folkestone caused disappointment to the Volunteers, and if, as regular troops were allowed to co-operate with the Volunteers at Portsmouth, he would, considering the vicinity of Shorncliffe to Dover, take the necessary steps to procure the presence of regular troops to act with the Volunteers at Dover in future reviews?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Full discretion in these matters is left to the General Officer commanding the district. As the hon. Member wishes it, I will, with a view to the future, ascertain from the General Officer at Dover the reasons which led him to decide as he did.

IRELAND—CANTEEN SUPPLIES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether complaints have reached him that nearly all the regiments stationed in Ireland obtain, or are compelled to get, most of their canteen and other supplies from the London Army and Navy Co-operative Stores, and that this occurs in consequence of a few officers of the regiments and districts in question being more or less interested in these Stores; and whether it is competent for any officer, being a member or shareholder in the Army and Navy Co-operative Stores, and holding a responsible command either in Ireland or the English provinces, to promote the pecuniary advancement of the Stores against and over the claims of local traders?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No complaints on this subject have reached me. Regimental canteens are under the management of Committees, which act independently of the Secretary of State for War. The members of these Committees deal for their stores where they can get them best and at the cheapest rate.

DR. TANNER: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that, as a matter of fact, the major part of these canteens are supplied from the Army and Navy Stores?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; I am not aware of that.

DR. TANNER: If I substantiate the assertion, and show that a certain number of canteens are so supplied, will the right hon. Gentleman promise to deal with the matter?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I cannot undertake to do that. Most of the regiments deal entirely with local tradesmen. All of them do so largely, but I am not prepared to lay down compulsory regulations.

DR. TANNER: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that complaints have been made in this House on several occasions that gentlemen who have left the Service spend their time in touting for the Stores?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not aware of it, although, of course, it may have been said.

RATING OF VOLUNTEER DRILL HALLS.

MR. JAMES STEVENSON (South Shields): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to the circumstance that summonses have been issued and are now pending before the South Shields magistrates, against the Commanding Officer of the Artillery and Rifle Volunteers in that town, for payment of Poor Rate on their respective drill halls; whether he is aware that this is the first time that the Poor Law Authorities have sought to enforce a claim for Poor Rate on these drill halls; and whether he can give any protection in the circumstances against what is practically a new tax on the Volunteer Service in respect of buildings provided by the Volunteers for their own purposes and without any profit from their use?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): I understand that proceedings have been instituted in South Shields for the recovery of Poor Rates which have been assessed on Volunteer drill halls. The question as to the liability of these premises to be assessed is a question of law which must be left to the decision of the Court. The Local Government Board have no power whatever to protect the Volunteer Service from assessment to local rates for premises occupied by them when the premises are legally liable to such rates.

THE CENSUS OF 1891.

MR. WOODALL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what arrangements are being made for the taking of the Census of 1891; and whether the authority of Parliament will be required, and, in the event of legislation being necessary, when is it intended to introduce Bills for the purpose?

MR. LONG: Legislation will be required for the taking of the Census of 1891. A Committee has been appointed to inquire as to the expediency of making any changes in the mode in which the Census has been taken and other matters in connection with the Census. The Report of the Committee has not yet been received, but as soon as it has been made the arrangements for the next Census will be considered by Her Majesty's Government, and the preparation of the necessary measure on the subject will be proceeded with.

PROFESSOR RUTHERFORD AND VIVISECTION.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to a letter in the Scottish Leader for 27th January, 1890, containing allegations of cruelty against Professor Rutherford in experimenting upon a living dog at the Edinburgh Medical Schools, which would involve infringement of the Act of Parliament 39 and 40 Vic. c. 77; whether Professor Rutherford has reported these experiments to the Inspector, or if inquiry has been made by the Inspector respecting them; if the Home Secretary will lay upon the Table full particulars of the same, together with any Reports made to him by the Inspector, or his deputy, with reference to this particular case, or to other cases of alleged infringement of the Act; if the experiments referred to were performed under Certificate C, in conformity with the Act, by whom such certificate was signed; whether this certificate releases the holder from compliance with Sub-section 3 of the proviso to Section 3 of the Act; and whether such certificate, being held in addition to a licence, is granted for a single experiment or limited series of experiments, or is granted for an unlimited number of experiments and extends over a period of months or years?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention was called to the letter in question. The only allegation in that letter which called for inquiry on my part was that the dog was not killed after the lecture, but kept for other purposes. The Inspector inquired into this, and reported to me that no dogs or other animals used by Professor Rutherford under Certificate C in illustration of his lectures has been allowed to recover from the full effect of the anæsthetic before being killed. An operator under Certificate C is not required to furnish Reports of his experiments. I am not, therefore, able to lay particulars upon the Table of the House. The experiments were under Certificate C, which was signed by the President of the Royal College of Physicians, Edinburgh, and it does not release the holder from the provisions of the Act referred to. Such certificate runs with the licence and continue valid as long as the licence is renewed. The certificate in question was granted in the year 1882.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, having regard to the increasing discontent among all ranks of the Constabulary at the continued non-fulfilment by successive Governments of the promise to deal with the question of their superannuation, he can now state if it is the intention of the Government to deal with the matter, or to leave it to each jurisdiction to promote a private Bill for its own Force; and, in such latter case, what will be the position of the Metropolitan Police?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session dealing with the question of superannuation both in the Metropolitan and the Provincial Forces.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government have decided to refer the Public Trustee Bill and the Trust Companies Bill to a Select Committee, with power to take evidence, or to a Grand Committee?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Public Trustee Bill will be referred to the Grand Committee on Law.

UNITED STATES TARIFF BILL.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is a fact that the Ways and Means Committee of the United States Government have arrived at an agreement regarding the Sugar Schedule, whereby a reduction of revenue upon sugar imported into the United States of from 30 to 35 million dollars per annum is reported; and, if not, whether he can state the exact amount of the proposed reduction, if any, and any further particulars with reference to the question?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have no information as to any proposed reduction of the duty of sugar imported into the United States. They have ascertained from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington that the new Tariff Bill has been postponed owing to the death of a member. The changes proposed in the Bill have not been made public.

THE WEST INDIAN MAIL CONTRACT.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the statement which appeared in the Morning Post of 31st March last, to the effect that the new contract between the Post Office and the Royal Mail Company for the conveyance of the West Indian Mails, though not signed, is virtually concluded, and will come into force in June next, is correct; whether he has received any memorials from the Colony in favour of the contract being granted to the Royal Mail Company; and whether it is the intention of the Government to bring the contract, before being closed, under the notice of Parliament; and, if not, whether he will state the particulars of the new contract, especially with regard to the maximum time to be occupied on the voyages?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): A tender of the Royal Mail Company has been accepted for the conveyance of West India Mails from the 1st of July next, when the present contract expires. The contract is now in preparation, and will, in the usual course, be submitted to Parliament for approval, with a statement as to its terms. I hope it will be possible so to submit the new contract before the date appointed for its commencement. Before accepting this tender Her Majesty's Government elicited the opinions of the West India colonies, which, equally with this country, are interested in the services and contribute to its support, and ascertained that they were almost unanimous in desiring that the new contract should be given to the Royal Mail Company.

CABLE BETWEEN HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA, AND BERMUDA.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the cause of the delay in laying the cable, contracted for by Her Majesty's Government with a private company, between Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Bermuda; and, when may the public expect that the cable will be in operation?

*MR. JACKSON: Under the power given to the Treasury by Section 4 of the contract with the International Cable Company, which was approved by the House of Commons on May 9 last, the time allowed for laying the cable has been extended to Midsummer next, so as to avoid the risks attending any attempt to lay the cable during the winter months. I am not able to state the precise date when the cable will be available for traffic. No doubt the company will do all in its power to complete at the earliest date, because the subsidy does not become payable until the cable is in working order.

THE SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the fact that about 200 men of the Upper Division of Clerks in the Savings Bank Department of the General Post Office, whose length of service averages from 15 to 20 years, have been reduced to the Lower Division of the Civil Service; whether these 200 men have been ordered to give a daily attendance of seven hours instead of six, on and from the 16th instant, at a rate of remuneration for the additional hour which is about one half, and in some cases one third, of the amount paid for each of the other six hours, being, in fact, no more than that now given to Junior Clerks of the Lower Division; have both these Orders received the sanction of the Treasury; and, has the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown been taken upon the question whether these Orders, involving an alteration of status, interfere with the legal rights of the persons affected?

*MR. RAIKES: I have to point out that there are no Upper Division Clerks in the Savings Bank, and also that there are no longer any Lower Division Clerks. The question of assimilating "the old establishment" of the Savings Bank to the new organisation, emanating from the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, has presented much difficulty, and, after giving the subject the most anxious attention, Her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion that the best way of meeting this difficulty is to nominate officers of the Second and Third Classes to the New Second Division, thereby letting them secure the very considerable pecuniary advantages which are afforded by the Order in Council of March 21st last. I have, accordingly, given effect to this decision, and am satisfied that substantial benefit has been conferred on the officers in question, and that no legal rights have been interfered with. The hon. Member will, I think, agree with me in the views I have expressed when he has examined the full bearing of the change.

THE MADRAS SLAVE TRADE.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the following statement, which has appeared in several papers:—

"Information has been received in London which leaves no doubt of the extent of the horrible traffic described as 'the Madras slave trade,' the existence of which has hitherto been only suspected. At a trial at Rangoon one witness, a Madragese girl, declared that she had been forcibly put on board a steamer at Negapatam, taken to Rangoon, and sold for 80 rupees. Another girl, who was seized as she was proceeding to join her husband, was taken to a house, kept a close prisoner for three days, and then sold for 90 rupees. In fact, sufficient evidence was given to show that, although Rangoon is supposed to have an ample police force, the importation and selling of girls goes on systematically;"

and whether the evidence given at this trial has been brought before the notice of the Indian Government; and, if not, whether he will cause inquiries to be made in Madras and in Rangoon as to the facts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has seen the statements referred to, and also that the man who committed the offences mentioned has been convicted, and sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. The Governments of Madras and Burma have had their attention directed for many years past to the migration from Madras to Rangoon, and to the necessity for carefully watching it. The law against offences of the kind mentioned in the question is strong, and will be vigorously enforced.

CUSTOMS—DUTIES ON VIOLINS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary of the Treasury if he would now state under what authority a violin (consigned from Paris to Mr. D. Lawrie, of Glasgow, at the Midland Grand Hotel, St. Pancras), dated 1696, and purporting to be the work of Antonius Stradivarius, of Cremona, was on the 25th March detained by the Customs Authorities at Dover; if it is true, as stated by the station master at Dover in explanation, that its detention was due to the fact that in consequence of violins, represented as the work of classic makers, having been imported, consignees of such instruments are now required to state whether the imported article is for private use or sale; and, if for sale, to prove the accuracy of the date and name of the label before the instruments are given up by the Customs; whether the fact of an old violin having passed the Customs is to be taken as a Government certificate of the genuineness of its date and signature; and if the regulation is intended to protect purchasers of violins against imposition, why an exception is made in the case of violins declared to be for private use, but which may subsequently be sold?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The violin in question, the value of which was declared to be £80, was imported from France, and was found upon examination to be marked "Antonius Stradivarius Cremonensis Faciebat, Anno 1696," and was detained under Sections 3 (Sub-section 1 b) and 16 (Sub-section 1) of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. The violin was at once delivered on the facts being reported to the Board, although the value was declared at £80, and not £800, as stated in the hon. Member's former question. The fact of any violin having passed the Customs is no guarantee of the accuracy of the description which it may bear, the action of the Department, in the absence of specific information, being confined to inscriptions obviously misleading. It is assumed in the case of a violin imported for private use that the purchaser has satisfied himself as to the genuine character or otherwise of the article; but should it subsequently become an object of trade after passing the Customs, if it infringes the provisions of the Act, the person selling it would be liable to the penalties involved.

THE ESTIMATES.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend to take any steps to realise the expectation held out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to the Estimates, in the discussion on the subject on 30th April, 1889, when he used the following words:—

"I trust the Government may be able at an early date, possibly next Session, again to submit proposals to remove what all on both sides of the House consider to be the present unsatisfactory state of things?"

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be very glad, indeed, if it was in my power to make proposals to the House to improve the conditions under which Estimates are considered and voted by the House. But the Government have been as yet unable to devise any plan in substitution for the present system which would secure the general support of the House, without which it would be most undesirable to introduce any changes.

Dr. Cameron

DESTITUTION IN EAST LONDON.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to a paragraph which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette of yesterday evening to the effect that on Saturday the East London Coroner had before him the case of a man who had dropped dead at the feet of his paymaster and whose death the doctor said was from starvation; and whether the right hon. Gentleman can inform the House whether other cases of a like lamentable nature have been reported as having occurred at the East-end; and whether it will be possible to do something to organise labour in that quarter so that such cases may not occur in future?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman has not given me any notice whatever of the question. I do not complain of that, but I am sure he will see—and the House will see—that a demand upon the Government to organise labour without any notice whatever is one which the Government cannot undertake to deal with. I am not aware of any measures which any Government could take which would prevent such a sad and sorrowful occurrence as that to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question whether information of other cases of a like kind have reached the Government.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No such information has reached Her Majesty's Government. These matters are dealt with, as a rule, by the Local Authorities, who have ample means of dealing with them.

THE CREWE MURDER.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to give notice that on the Vote for the salary of the Home Secretary, or upon the next Vote on Account, I will challenge the reply which the Home Secretary gave last evening with regard to the case of Richard Davies and will take the opinion of the House upon the subject.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Francis Tress Barry, Esq., for New Windsor.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEES OF SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Reports of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means may be entered upon at any hour, though opposed, and the Proceedings thereon shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House, except of Standing Order No. 5."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.8.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I rise to a point of order as to the form in which this Motion is made. When a similar Motion was made by the President of the Board of Trade, in the absence of the First Lord of the Treasury, last year, there were some words at the end of the Motion which have now been dropped out. Those words were—"But after such proceedings are disposed of no opposed business shall be taken." I wish to ask whether, if the Resolution is passed in its present shape, it would be possible to take any opposed business after the Reports of Supply and Ways and Means have been disposed of?

(4.9.) MR. SPEAKER: It is quite true that the words quoted by the hon. Gentleman were in the Resolution of last year, but I am clearly of opinion that they are not necessary. The words of the Standing Order would come into operation, and the business of the Sitting would be dealt with according to the Rules applicable to measures taken after 12 o'clock.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Then, I gather from your ruling that last year something was passed which was not necessary?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not know that the words were unnecessary, but they were surplusage.

(4.10.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I would suggest an Amendment in the nature of a compromise. As the Resolution stands, the right hon. Gentleman could bring on Report of Supply and have discussions upon it at any time of the night. I would suggest that after the words, "The proceedings thereon shall not be interrupted," we should insert, "If entered upon before 12 o'clock." By stopping the discussion which might be before the House a few minutes before 12, we could proceed at once with the Reports of Supply and of Ways and Means.

Amendment proposed, after the words "That the," to insert the words "Proceedings on the."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.12.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not think the proposal of the hon. Gentleman can be accepted. The hon. Gentleman proposes that we should enter upon the consideration of the Report of Supply any time before 12, and go on to any time after. I should prefer to adhere to the Rule adopted in successive Sessions. If the proposal of the hon. Gentleman were adopted, it might be necessary to ask the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees to apply the Closure; and it is possible that there might be two or three Divisions, with the result that we should waste half an hour or three-quarters of an hour and not arrive at Report of Supply. In these circumstances, I must ask the House to adopt the Rule which has been in force during the last two or three Sessions. I trust that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman will not be pressed, because it must be negatived, and that, again, would occupy the time of the House.

(4.15.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I think it is a very questionable kind of enjoyment which the right hon. Gentleman is good enough to give the House the facility of acquiring. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Motion has frequently been made in previous Sessions, but I doubt very much whether the right hon. Gentleman can show a precedent for making a Motion of this kind so early in the Session. Nothing has happened in the present Session which renders this exceptional haste on the part of the right hon. Gentleman reasonable or to be expected. There is evidence forthcoming of a kind which the right hon. Gentleman would be the last person to question the force of—that this Session the House has been exceptionally expeditious in the performance of its work, and that it has been performed in an exceptionally satisfactory way. [Mr. W. H. SMITH shook his head.] The right hon. Gentleman appears to question that statement; but the right hon. Gentleman will not question the authority of the Chairman of Ways and Means. My right hon. Friend told his constituents the other day that the progress of business in the present Session has been very great, and that there has been a remarkable amount of work in Supply before Easter this year. Looking at the past my right hon. Friend thought that the business of Supply this Session will not occupy a larger amount of time than it ought to occupy, and that, so far, the House of Commons has discharged its business well. It is rather surprising, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to make this Motion in view of the exceptionally satisfactory despatch of business by the House. I do not think there is any great force in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman to the Amendment of my hon. Friend; but at least there ought to be a very clear and full understanding that on occasions when the right hon. Gentleman is asked to provide a full opportunity for discussing upon Report questions that have been inadequately dealt with in the proceedings in Committee, a large interpretation should be given to such an undertaking.

(4.20.) Mr. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I wish to point out that a similar Motion was brought forward last year, and that Morning Sittings immediately after Easter appear to be becoming a regular Parliamentary custom. I had expected, however, on the present occasion that the First Lord of the Treasury would have said something in support of his proposal. No information has been given to the House as to the condition of Supply, or what obstacles have been met with in getting through Report of Supply as well as Supply itself. It is the common knowledge of the House that Supply is well advanced this Session. A similar Motion was passed on April 30 last year, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated then that 34 Votes in Supply had been got in 12 Sittings. But this Session the Government have got 52 Votes in Supply in eight Sittings. On February 25, 16 Supplementary Votes were presented to the House, and on that day all the Votes were obtained, the Report of the 16 Votes being taken next day without discussion of any kind. On February 27 the two remaining Supplementary Votes were taken, and the Report was obtained the next night after 12 o'clock without discussion. On March 17 the First Lord of the Admiralty got 16 Navy Votes in one Sitting—the expedition was supposed to be due to the fact that it was St. Patrick's Day, and that there were no Irish Members present—and the Report of 15 out of 16 of those Votes was got on Wednesday, March 19, after half-past 5 o'clock without any discussion. Practically, therefore, the Government are in a more favourable position as to Supply than they were last year, or than they have been for several years.

Mr. J. Morley

*(4.23.) Mr. J. S. GATHORNE-HARDY (Kent, Medway): Hon. Members opposite seem to have forgotten that a few weeks ago the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan) brought forward a Motion dealing with the Sittings of the House, which was nearly carried, and the discussion on which showed that there was a disposition prevalent among hon. Members to put up with some sacrifices early in the Session in order to get away earlier in the autumn. It, therefore, seems to me to be absurd that hon. Gentlemen, having supported that Resolution, should now offer objections to this mild form of coercion which is sought to be put upon the House. The experience gained from this Motion in former years is, that it puts an end to obstruction on Report of Supply. If Report of Supply is brought forward before 12 o'clock it is generally talked out, while if it is brought on after midnight the general feeling of hon. Members has been that they wished to get home to bed, and hence those questions only have been discussed which needed discussion. I hope that the Government will stick to their guns, and I am sure they will be supported.

(4.25.) Mr. SEXTON: I think the hon. Gentleman scarcely understands the point at issue. The Amendment of my hon. Friend really proposes that if the Report of Supply is taken before 12 o'clock it should not be talked out. A good deal has been said as to the progress made in Supply on St. Patrick's Day in the absence of the Irish Members. It is true that on that day a good many Irish Members were absent from the House; but it should be remembered that the Votes taken were English Votes, in which the sons of St. Patrick had no direct concern. Therefore, the benign influence of St. Patrick is a myth, and the Prime Minister was quite in error in attributing the progress made to the absence of the Irish Members. The First Lord of the Treasury has made out no case for his Motion. He referred to the proceedings of the House in the last three years, but I fail to see what that has to do with the matter. I think the House has treated the Government exceedingly well. They have obtained a Vote on Account for a period unusually long; they have almost gone through Class 1, and they have made some progress in Class 5. I think my hon. Friend is entitled, in a case of this kind, to ask from the Government some guarantee that only urgent business will be taken after 12 o'clock. Supply is in a very forward condition, and it is not the case that the Government have been unduly embarrassed in regard to Report of Supply. I am not aware of any circumstances that have arisen this Session to entitle the Government to anticipate obstruction of Report of Supply. If Report of Supply happens at any time to be urgent, why should not the Government bring it forward, say at 11 o'clock? It is no reply to say that three Divisions would be taken. I do not believe that would be so; but, even if it were, three Divisions would not occupy all the time between 11 and 12 o'clock. If the Motion be carried the Government will be able to put down Report of Supply whenever they please; and inasmuch as other business, such as a Scotch Endowment debate, may be taken first, we may be called upon to discuss Votes on Report at 1 o'clock in the morning or later. There is a growing tendency in the House to defer discussions on Votes until the Report stage; and, that being so, I would ask is it fair or expedient to pass a Rule under which the Government will be able to take Report of Supply at such an hour as will render adequate debate impossible and prevent the communication of the substance of the debate to the public? I think my hon. Friend has made a reasonable proposal, and one which, if adopted, will tend to facilitate rather than obstruct Supply.

(4.33.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I wish to give the House the reasons why I intend to support the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Labouchere.) I do not think any Government ought to have power to bring on Report of Supply at any time it chooses. I understand that, after what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) is willing to give a guarantee that Report of Supply will not be brought on at too late an hour. I think if my right hon. Friend will say it shall not be brought on in general circumstances after half-past 12 the House will be quite satisfied. Members on this side of the House are just as much interested as Gentlemen opposite in having this matter properly discussed, and no Party feeling ought to enter into the matter at all. It seems to me that there is nothing so detrimental to public business as to have important questions discussed on Report of Supply at an hour when many Members cannot attend. I think the hon. Member for Northampton has approached the question in a reasonable spirit, and I hope my right hon. Friend will deal with it in a similar spirit. I believe that Gentlemen in all parts of the House have the greatest confidence in his conduct of public business, and if he will only give a guarantee that Report of Supply will not be brought on at an unreasonable hour I am sure the hon. Member for Northampton will withdraw his Amendment.

*(4.34.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only speak by permission of the House, but I hope I may be allowed to say a few words in answer to what has fallen from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck). I have not the slightest hesitation in giving the House an assurance that Report of Supply will not be brought on at an unreasonable hour. My Motion has not been made with the intention of enabling us to take an unreasonable course. On the contrary, I think I have a right to appeal to what took place last Session in order to prove that we have no desire to act unreasonably. If ever a question of importance has been deferred until Report, an arrangement has been made which has been satisfactory to the House as a whole, although I admit it may not have pleased individual Members. I assure the House it will be my object, under such circumstances, in the future to make such an arrangement as will suit the general convenience of the House. My only desire is that business should not be obstructed, as it may be by a single Member under present circumstances. With this assurance, I hope the House will assent to the Motion.

(4.35.) Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): As I understand, the right hon. Gentleman has just given a guarantee, and I need not assure him that his word will be accepted at once. The right hon. Gentleman, however, has not replied to the request that he would favourably consider any suggestion from this side of the House in favour of the postponement of any particular matter of importance arising on Report. I hope the House understands perfectly well what we are asked by the right hon. Gentleman to do. We are asked to reverse all those reforms in the hours of the House carried four or five years ago in the expectation that the period of prolonged vigils, which were of such a torturing character in previous years, had been put an end to for ever. We find that is not the case, and two months after the commencement of the Session we are asked to go back to the old system of either all-night Sittings or half-night Sittings. I have had experience of all-night Sittings, and I do not wish to repeat it. The right hon. Gentleman, of course, has gone through similar experiences—in fact, we have gone through them together—and I congratulate him on the excellent health and spirits with which he has emerged from them. The hon. Gentleman who represents one of the Divisions of Kent said that in voting for the Motion his object was to shorten the Session and give us an opportunity for an early vacation—a thing we all desire. Well, those who supported the Motion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow the other day can consistently support the Amendment of my hon. Friend to-day; for the result of that proposal of the leader of the House, if carried, will be to give us both longer

Mr. W. H. Smith

Sittings and a longer Session. If I thought the proposal would have the effect of shortening the Session I should be found in the Lobby supporting it; but I am convinced that its effect will be not only to prolong our Sittings, but to prolong the Session. I am afraid, also, that its effect will be to lengthen our discussions in Supply, because if hon. Members find that they will have no adequate opportunity on Report of raising questions left in an unfinished state in Committee of Supply they will be tempted to prolong the discussions on that stage. Although I have known many occasions on which Report of Supply was a matter which could be passed over with brief discussion, or no discussion at all, I have known other occasions on which, owing to fresh information having been received on certain subjects subsequent to the debate in Supply, long and important discussions have occurred. It was, for instance, on the Report stage of Supply that my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) succeeded in getting the Clangorey prisoners released from their unjust imprisonment; and I remember many other occasions on which debate on Report has brought about important results. Then, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury why he proposes this Resolution at this period of the Session? It may be that at a later period we shall find ourselves in the midst of a prolonged discussion on the Tithes Bill or the Irish Land Purchase Bill, and it would be time enough for the right hon. Gentleman to demand further facilities for the consideration of Government business when he finds himself in difficulties in regard to such measures. If he had made his Motion, say, a month hence, if the progress of business was so slow as to justify it, we, at any rate, should have raised no opposition to it.

(4.45.) THE CHAIRMAN of WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word as to the Amendment before the Committee. If I understood the hon. Member for Northampton's interruption aright, he suggested to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that it would be quite sufficient for his purpose if the Division, on whatever subject might be before the House, were taken at 10 minutes to 12, so as to enable Report of Supply to come on soon after 12. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) thinks it would be reasonable to provide that half-past 12 should be the time after which Report of Supply should not be taken. I would point out that the Report of Supply is necessarily an Order of the Day, and the operation of this proposal will be confined to Mondays and Thursdays. If any kind of discussion is anticipated, it will only be necessary for an hon. Member to say "I object" when previous Orders are called on, and Report of Supply will then be reached at a reasonable time after 12. It is practically impossible that the Report of Supply can be postponed beyond a quarter-past 12. If Report be preceded by other Government Orders at the top of the Paper, the debate is interrupted at 12 o'clock, and hon. Members have only to say "I object" to the preceding Orders, and we reach Report, which comes next.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should not think of objecting to these Bills in order to get to Report.

MR. COURTNEY: Well, others would. Speaking from experience, every one knows how easy it is to rush through the Orders in order that the Report of Supply may begin early. With reference to the point of the hon. Member for the Scotland Division, no doubt if the First Lord of the Treasury receives a strong, or even a considerable representation, that the report of a particular Vote is likely to occupy a considerable time, he will make special arrangements, and then the object of the Amendment will be met.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have not the slightest hesitation in giving the assurance referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, and asked for by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool. I am only doing what has been the practice for many years past of all those who have held the position I now occupy. If there is any subject on which the House, or an important section of it, really feels that further debate is required, undoubtedly the leader of the House has always deemed it to be his duty to make provision accordingly, and I shall certainly do so.

Question put, and negatived.

Main Question put.

(4.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 194; Noes 102.—(Div. List, No. 48.)

Resolved, That the Reports of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means may be entered upon at any hour, though opposed, and the proceedings thereon shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House, except of Standing Order No. 5.

*(5.3.) MR. W. H. SMITH: In moving the other Motion which stands in my name, I may perhaps be allowed to say that although it is the case that considerable progress has been made in Supply, the number of Votes obtained does not exceed the number voted last year at the same date. The progress made has not been so considerable as hon. Members suppose. The Vote on Account this year has been obtained at the same time as was that of last year, and unless some further progress is made with Supply, the House will undoubtedly have reason to complain. Last year I asked the House for Tuesdays on the 10th of March, and for Fridays on the 30th of April.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That on and after Tuesday, April 22, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at 2 of the clock, and that the provisions of Standing Order No. 56 be extended to the morning sitting on those days."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(5.5.) MR. SEXTON: I noticed this morning in the Times newspaper, which has lately taken upon itself the function of director of the business of this House, the suggestion in a leading article that the proceedings on the Land Purchase Bill next week ought to be taken de die in diem. I understand that this Motion is made with the intention of providing Morning Sittings for the purpose of Supply. ["No, no!"] Then, I should desire some information as to what is intended to be done at the Morning Sittings. Do the Government intend to take Supply or the Land Purchase Bill on Tuesday and Friday mornings?

*(5.6.) MR. W. H. SMITH: That question has not been considered by the Government. If the hon. Gentleman will ask a question on Thursday on the subject I shall be glad to reply.

(5.6.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I think that last year the Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays were asked for solely for Supply. If such Sittings are to be taken without reference to Supply, certainly I shall vote against that proposal. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that Standing Orders become of very little avail if at a certain period in each year the Minister in charge suspends them for the benefit of the Government. You might as well have said in your Standing Orders that they were only intended to apply up to Easter, and we should have understood you. The position of private Members is getting absolutely ridiculous. There have been only four occasions in the present Session on which private Members have had any nights at all. If the business of Parliament is to be only Government business, let it be so understood; but do not let it be used against private Members that they are responsible for a destructive policy only, and that they never introduce constructive legislation, when the Government put it out of their power to do so. I claim for private Members that their position should not be made a sham, and if the Government compel us much more than we do to discuss their Votes the blame rests on them, because they deprive private Members of the opportunities which the practice and procedure of Parliament were intended to afford.

(5.10.) MR. J. E. ELLIS: I understood the object of this Motion, as defined by the First Lord of the Treasury, was that one Sitting should be taken for the purpose of Supply, but, from the right hon. Gentleman's answer to the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) it is evident that the Government have not yet made up their minds as to what they will do with the times they are about to take—that, indeed, they have not considered what they are going to do with the mornings they ask for. That the First Lord should come down to the House and ask for the time of private Members without giving the slightest reason why the request should be complied with is most extraordinary. I, as a private Member, protest against the intolerable uncertainty in which we find ourselves. In consequence of the uncertainty as to the state of business, private Members are unable to make any engagement or to answer any letter in respect to any future appointment. I am one of those who think there is a great waste of time in the House. I consider that time is wasted in other ways than by speaking. I think that when the First Lord of the Treasury moves a Vote of this kind by a simple nod of the head and without a word of reasonable explanation why he takes away the time of private Members, he conduces greatly to waste of time, and does not facilitate the progress of business. Then there is another fruitful source of waste of time, and that is, unwise persistence with business at unreasonable periods, and which the Government ought to know cannot pass. Several instances of this occurred last Session. The Tithes Bill was introduced on the 7th of June, and we all remember the confusion and chaos which prevailed in consequence, with the result that the House did not get up until the 30th August. The leader of the House, addressing his neighbours in Oxfordshire the other day, said that his title to hold his present position is owing to the fact that he is a man of business. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will so order the business of the House that the time of the House will not be wasted. I hope that private Members will not have their Friday nights interfered with, but that these will be secured to us for the discussion of questions of public importance. If the Motion before the House is carried I trust it will be taken as a pledge that the Government will do what it can to bring about a much earlier rising of the House than that which occurred last year.

*(5.18.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): Allow me to remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that it was always the practice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to take Morning Sittings at this period of the year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) will recollect that a great part of the Irish Church Bill, 20 years ago, was taken at Morning Sittings. I certainly think it is unreasonable on the part of hon. Gentlemen to object to the present proposal of the Government.

*(5.19.) MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (Londonderry): We must press the First Lord of the Treasury for a distinct answer to the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast. How can we say whether we are inclined to give up two days of the week unless we know what use is to be made of them? It seems to me most extraordinary that the Government should ask for Tuesday and Friday mornings and not have made up their minds as to what business they will take on those occasions. We wish to discuss the Irish Land Purchase Bill fairly, and at reasonable length. We certainly do not want it to be cut up into shreds and patches—one patch snipped off at one Morning Sitting and another patch at another Morning Sitting. Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays are usually taken for the business of Supply, and what we now want is an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that, except on the occasion of a real emergency, the Morning Sittings he asks for will be devoted to Supply, and to Supply alone. If the right hon. Gentleman will not give us such an assurance, I shall be bound to move, as an Amendment, to add after the words “two o'clock,” the words “for the business of Supply.”

*(5.22.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I suppose we private Members must give way on this occasion, but I should like to point out that if anybody are the sufferers it is the private Members sitting on this side of the House. Hon. Gentlemen opposite can and do talk as much as they please, but we, who wish to see the business of the House carried on, have not much chance of doing so. As we have to give up our mornings on Tuesdays and Fridays, I think we may fairly ask that the Government should feel it their duty to make a House when we re-assemble on Tuesdays and Fridays at 9 o'clock.

(5.23.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I think that the private Members will be the gainers rather than the losers by the adoption of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Derry says that Morning Sittings ought to be confined to Supply, but I do not understand the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman in that sense. In theory we have private Members' days on Tuesdays and Fridays, but in practice we have not. There are two important Bills before the House this Session—the Land Purchase Bill and the Tithes Bill. No sooner will those Bills get into Committee than the right hon. Gentleman will ask for facilities, and will take the whole of Tuesday as well as the whole of Friday, consequently private Members will be entirely shut out. If, however, we accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, he will not ask for further facilities, but will leave us in the enjoyment of the Tuesday and Friday evenings. [Mr. W. H. SMITH signified dissent.] What, have I been deceived by the right hon. Gentleman? Have I been induced to support the right hon. Gentleman under a delusion? I imagined this was to be a settlement of the whole question. I thought that during the rest of the Session, except perhaps in the last two weeks, we were to have Tuesday and Friday evenings. If the right hon. Gentleman says that this is only one bite at the cherry, and that he will take the whole of the Tuesdays and Fridays if he wants them, I do not see how we can vote with him. There must be a bargain on both sides.

*(5.26.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis) made a complaint as to the management of the business. I would be exceedingly glad if the hon. Member could give us any assistance in arranging the proceedings of the House so that the course of business may be forecast with reasonable certainty. I would also be exceedingly grateful if the hon. Member would render the Government that assistance which he appears to think may be rendered by some one, whereby the time of the House may be saved. No doubt, if the time of the House were arranged on strictly business principles, a good deal more work might be done, but there is an ancient privilege of Members of the House which no Member of the Government has either the power or the desire to interfere with, namely, the liberty of speech of hon. Members. So long as that liberty is indulged in with the freedom and want of responsibility shown by some Members, I am afraid no Member of the House in my position can lay down any rule or make any proposal to the House which will entirely obviate the loss of time and unbusinesslike results which occasionally follow. It is not the intention of the Government to proceed with the discussion of so important a measure as the Irish Land Purchase Bill in the patchwork fashion suggested by the hon. Member for Derry. In asking the House for Morning Sittings, the Government have before them the necessities of Supply. Last year and the year before, however, we declined to bind ourselves not to take any other business which it might be desirable to deal with, and we must take the same course now, although our principal object is to discuss Supply on the days we ask for. I should be only too glad if the House should consider the Bills before it in such a business like way as to make the de die in diem prosecution of any measure unnecessary, but if towards the end of the Session the same course should be followed as was pursued at an earlier period, when a debate in which no interest was taken was continued day after day, then the Government must ask for the facilities which were given last Session and have been given in the past. The object of the present Motion is in accordance with precedents Parliament has sanctioned, and the practice under it will be precisely similar to that adopted last Session.

(5.32.) MR. JOHN MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman has, after all, given the House no reason why we should take this unprecedented course in a Session when the progress of business has been extraordinarily satisfactory. It really comes to this, as the hon. Member for Northampton has said, that we might just as well come to an understanding that the Standing Orders should apply only up to Easter, and that afterwards they should be abrogated. What the right hon. Gentleman has said as to the difficulty of making an exact division of business of course we all understand, but with business in the present advanced state that the right hon. Gentleman should make this extraordinary demand is a course against which I and those around me feel bound to protest in the strongest manner. I think we have a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman to make this one concession. He says he cannot assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for Derry that Supply only should be taken on Tuesdays and Fridays until the end of the Session, and, of course, we can understand why he should not agree to that; but the Government might meet the wish of the House—for I believe it is the wish of the greater part of the House—by consenting to make Supply the business on Tuesdays and Fridays until Whitsuntide. That, at all events, might be done, and would meet many objections. If you, contrary to precedent, take these Morning Sittings before Whitsuntide, I think, at least, you might give an undertaking that until Whitsuntide they shall be devoted to the business of Supply.

Mr. W. H. Smith

(5.37.) MR. G. A. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Penryn and Falmouth): I am sorry to trouble the House, but my right hon. Friend has not answered the appeal of my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington as to the Government making a House on Friday evenings. It is a question that has been before the right hon. Gentleman before. As my right hon. Friend knows, when Lord Palmerston was leader of this House, from the time he entered it at 4 o'clock he seldom left it until the House rose. Lord Beaconsfield, too, was in constant attendance and rarely went home to dinner. Now, 9 o'clock, as has been pointed out, is an extremely difficult time for Members to return, but not more so for Members of the Government. The Government have not more to do now than in times past, and they have more accommodation provided within these walls than previous Governments have had, and it is not too much to ask that they shall be in their places at 9 o'clock. It is upon record that predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman have admitted the moral obligation of Members of the Government to make a House at 9 o'clock, especially on Fridays. The Members of the Government, I believe, muster about 30, and I do not think that it is unreasonable to ask that some 15 or 20 of these should consider that to assist in making a House is part of their duty. They receive considerable salaries, and it is no great addition to their duties to sit on that Bench at 9 o'clock on Friday evenings. I hope the First Lord will favourably consider this suggestion. He must remember the opinion of his old leader, and how vexed the late Lord Beaconsfield used to be whenever the House was counted. I have myself received, and so no doubt has the right hon. Gentleman, reminders that it was necessary I should be in my place. No statesman ever sat in this House who more desired to respect the rights of private Members than the late Lord Beaconsfield, and I hope that spirit may still continue to animate his successors in the leadership of the House.

*(5.40.) MR. W. H. SMITH: If I may be allowed to make a reply it must be to the effect that, so far as we can, we will assist in making a House on Friday. As for the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, we will do our best to secure a House for him, and I can say no more than that. But I do not know that if any private Member is unable to secure a quorum for the consideration of a Motion he desires to submit, it is the duty of the Government to make and keep a House. I would remind the House that twice during the Session the House has been counted out on Tuesdays, and we are really asking for time therefore that private Members do not greatly require. I am sorry that I am not able to give the undertaking asked for by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. We may have to ask the House to provide from day to day for the ordinary Government business taken on Mondays and Thursdays. We shall proceed as in previous Sessions, and of this I do not think the House can complain, that, unless the House shall otherwise order, we shall sit at 2 o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays, and we propose this to facilitate the progress of Supply. The House has the power to otherwise order, if it sees fit, in reference to any special measure. I wish again to say that we reserve to ourselves the right we have exercised in the past of dealing with financial business, and of dealing with any measures of urgency on Tuesdays and Fridays, in fact to forward the business of the Government in any way.

MR. SEXTON: Have the Government so far made up their minds as to say whether Supply will be taken on Tuesday and Friday next week, and the Land Purchase Bill on Monday and Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot make any engagement just now.

(5.43.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): In consequence of the extremely unsatisfactory reply in reference to proceeding with important Irish business, I think it becomes necessary to move an Amendment to the Motion by adding after the words "two o'clock" the words "for the business of Supply." The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that it is a very serious inconvenience to Irish Members not to know what is intended to be done in regard to the Land Purchase Bill. The right hon. Gentleman will not give my hon. Friend the information he desires; but, I think, in view of the importance of the matter to us, the right hon. Gentleman might stretch a point and decide now. In view of the attitude taken up by the right hon. Gentleman I must insist on the Amendment if we have nothing definite as to the intention with regard to the Land Purchase Bill.

Amendment proposed, after the word "clock," to insert the words "for the business of Supply."—(Mr. W. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the words be there inserted."

*(5.45.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only repeat what I said in answer to the hon. Member for Derry, that we shall not proceed with the Second Reading of the Land Purchase Bill at a Morning Sitting.

MR. SEXTON: Then I take it as a definite pledge that the Bill will not be taken at a Morning Sitting?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Second Reading debate will not be proceeded with during a Morning Sitting.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Then the debate will begin on Monday, and be resumed again on Thursday next week?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must reserve the right to move that the Land Purchase Bill shall take precedence of all other business, if it should be necessary to come to an arrangement of that kind.

MR. SEXTON: At what stage, and how soon?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That will be on Monday. I reserve the power to propose a Motion, if we think it necessary to do so; but I hope that the Government may come to some understanding with hon. Members as to the debate on the Land Bill, so as to render that unnecessary.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Well, it is not very plain. It is as yet uncertain whether the Second Reading debate will be taken next week or not.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It must be so until we arrive at an understanding as to the termination of the debate. I hope we shall come to an understanding and make an arrangement that will be generally satisfactory.

(5.47.) MR. SEXTON: I must submit that the right hon. Gentleman does not treat us with that consideration and candour we have a right to expect. He was first asked to confine Supply to Morning Sittings, and he replied that it was not fair to require him to enter into a binding engagement. He was then asked to give an engagement for the time between now and Whitsuntide, and he refused to give an engagement to this limited extent. From his reply to my question we infer that he has not yet made up his mind as to proceeding day by day with the Land Purchase Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman, by various forms of language, endeavoured to convey that the operative motive of the Government in this Motion is to proceed with Supply. Well, if that is the object, why decline to give us an engagement that for next week Morning Sittings shall be used for Supply? Have some 80 Members of this House no right to be informed what day it is proposed to proceed with the Land Purchase Bill, to enable us to communicate with our Party as to attendance here to take part in a Division? Why, it is but the most ordinary view of the rights of Members that we should be informed now whether the debate opened on Monday is to be resumed on Thursday, or when. Only on such information can we make arrangements for attendance, and as a Party we may claim such facilities.

*(5.48.) MR. BARTLEY: I think we may claim to know something about the 22nd. I look at it from a private Member's point of view, having the first Motion on that day. It is reasonable we should know what is intended. I do not wish to do anything unfriendly to the Government, but I must press for a definite answer.

*(5.48.) MR. W. H. SMITH: If it is the desire of the House, I will say at once that the Morning Sitting next Tuesday shall be for Supply, but I trust by that time it may be possible to arrive at an understanding as to the course of the debate on the Land Purchase Bill.

(5.49.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I object very strongly to the Standing Orders being suspended in this fashion. The Rules are framed upon the principle that they shall apply to all ordinary circumstances; and no matter how often you make the exception when you take facilities for Government business, you proceed contrary to the principle and spirit of the Standing Orders, and on each occasion you do so especial reason is shown for it. Though there are precedents, still it is an exceptional thing to do, and not the slightest reason for it has been given in the present instance. Two important Bills only are mentioned or suggested as likely to be brought forward for our careful consideration. No hint is given of any other measure of importance being submitted to Parliament, and of these two one of them is of such an obnoxious and prejudicial a character that it is not unfair to call it a purely Party measure of a most objectionable character—I mean the Land Purchase Bill. I am confirmed in that conviction by the inarticulate interruptions from the other side. The other Bill deals with a matter of deep importance, upon which the Government last Session could not make up their minds, and their proposals met with such little favour that, on your ruling, Sir, they were forced to withdraw the malformation into which the Bill had grown. With these two Bills before us we are called upon to grant special facilities for Supply. I earnestly hope that the House will divide against the Motion, unless we are assured that the House will rise the earlier because of it. What is the object of the Motion? Are there some other Bills to be introduced at the last moment, as was the case last year—little surprises of an objectionable character, of which we knew nothing until three weeks or a month before the time when the House was expected to rise? If there is nothing of this sort intended why begin so unprecedentedly early in the Session to obtain extra facilities for Supply? We are establishing a precedent which, year by year, will be improved upon.

Mr. W. H. Smith.

(5.51.) MR. W. REDMOND: A pledge having been reluctantly given that next week the Land Bill shall not be taken on Tuesday, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put.

(5.52.) The House divided:—Ayes 191; Noes 109.—(Div. List, No. 49.)

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, 22nd April, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet on Tuesday and Friday at Two of the clock, and that the provisions of Standing Order No. 56 be extended to the Morning Sitting on those days.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AMENDMENT ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton, Bill to amend the seventy-eighth section of "The Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton, Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, and Mr. Beaufoy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 243.]

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN ACT (1889) AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hozier, Bill to amend, as far as Scotland is concerned, "The Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Act, 1889," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hozier, Mr. Baird, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Leng, Mr. Charles Parker, and Mr. James Smith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 224.]

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHISTS.

*(6.7.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I do not think I need make any excuse for bringing forward what I consider to be the just grievances under which telegraphists are suffering at the present moment. I have no political or Party object in bringing forward the Motion with which I intend to conclude my speech, and I, therefore, hope the Government will allow the vote to be taken as a non-Party one. The grievances have been of long standing, not only in the central office, but in the provinces, and they extend also to Scotland and Ireland. Both males and females complain bitterly of the conditions under which they perform their work. That work has increased enormously since the introduction of the Fawcett scheme in 1881, and as the work has increased the grievances have increased also. At the end of last Session I gave notice of my intention to bring this matter forward, and, therefore, it cannot be said that I have taken the Postmaster General by surprise; he must, indeed, have expected some such course as this would be taken after the numerous questions which have been addressed to him, and the avalanche of petitions forwarded to him, both from the central offices and from provincial telegraphists. The answers of the Postmaster General to questions on the subject have either been a decided negative or else the right hon. Gentleman has stated that the matters complained of are under consideration. How many years they are to remain under consideration I know not, but perhaps the result of this Motion may be to expedite their consideration. I am afraid I must say at once that the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman has been rather that of an unsympathetic non possumus to all questions which were asked. I myself have been one of the victims who have been unable to get any very direct replies to the questions I have put. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman has been cramped by what is called officialism. In that case, if the present Motion is passed the right hon. Gentleman's hands will be strengthened, and he will be able to redress the grievances which have been brought under his attention. Those grievances may be summarised under four heads—(1) the hours of duty; (2) the question of pay and salaries; (3) the question of classification and promotion; (4) the very burning question of meal-times. As regards the hours of labour, it seems to me that this is a difficult matter to be dealt with by anyone who does not possess an intimate acquaintance with what is going on in the offices. There is a complicated system of regular and irregular work, and of overtime; and the principle upon which this is carried out seems to be that of extracting the largest possible amount of work out of each individual at the least possible cost to the country. I should like first to allude to the Fawcett scheme of 1881 in regard to the hours of labour. It was laid down in that scheme that, as a rule, there should be 16 hours' work for two days' work, and that was to be divided so as not to give more than 11 hours on any particular day. I contend that that scheme has not been adhered to. There have been weeks, particularly in the central office, when the hours of work have been 10 daily. That means 20 hours in two days, instead of 16 hours, under the Fawcett scheme. It is, no doubt, said that this has been compensated in the succeeding week, when there have been only 36 hours of work, or six hours a day. I maintain, however, that is no compensation. This irregularity of hours is a great hardship to those who are working in the telegraph office. It does not appear to me to be a difficult matter to reorganise the office so that the work should be more regular. As regards overtime, I find that during the summer of 1889, for certainly a fortnight, the telegraphists were worked something like 196 hours. That made 98 hours during a working week, including regular hours and overtime. I contend that those hours are too long for any public servant, and, considering that the question of the hours of labour is coming prominently before this country, and other countries, I think it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to set a good example to other employers, and to say that by them, at all events, long hours of labour will not be tolerated. I am told that a clerk has been mildly censured for having worked 14 hours in one day, but working too long hours is the fault of the employer and not of the employed. It may be said that men are not compelled to work overtime. I am unable to admit that the overtime work is completely voluntary. Under the system which prevails a man who volunteers to work overtime can be kept at it until it is convenient for those in charge to release him. A man may volunteer for two or three hours' extra work, but once he volunteers he may have to work for many more hours than he wishes. The men are called upon for overtime at a moment's notice, and in 1888, during the summer, it was frequently the case that men were on continuous duty for 16 hours, with only half an hour for dinner. Last summer there were many cases of 14 hours' continuous duty, and one clerk was suspended for refusing to do overtime, though he pleaded ill-health as an excuse. Yet, in face of this, we are told that overtime is voluntary. I should like to know if it is true that clerks, after having done duty from 10 p.m. to 5 a.m. have been compelled to come on duty again at 10 in the morning and work till eight in the evening; or, in all, 17 hours. Last year I asked the Postmaster General to state what is the greatest number of hours any individual clerk is called upon to work, and the right hon. Gentleman replied—

"The number of hours in one day during which a telegraphist may be kept on duty is governed by the exigencies of the Service."

This debate will give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of qualifying that answer. As long as I have the honour of sitting in this House I intend to be studiously moderate in my language, but I confess that strong language rises to my lips when I receive such an answer as that. We take great care that animals are not driven to death, and that men who do such things shall be prosecuted and punished. It is not a question of the exigencies of the Public Service how long our servants shall work, and I, therefore, hope the Postmaster General will either withdraw or modify that statement. As to annual leave, the telegraphists are asking for one calendar month's leave for those who have served 10 years, and three weeks' leave for those who have served less than 10 years. This seems to me to be a very moderate demand, and I think it is in accordance with what Mr. Fawcett intended, for, in a letter to the Treasury, he said he was considering a scheme, the effect of which would be to give one month's leave to men who now had only three weeks, and three weeks to those who had only a fortnight. That shows the spirit in which Mr. Fawcett approached the matter, and I hope that this grievance will be speedily redressed. It ought to be remembered that the telegraphists have no Bank holidays, and work on Sunday. For my own part, I wish that there was no Sunday labour; but admitting that it was necessary for a certain number of telegrams to be sent on Sunday, Sunday labour should be limited as far as possible, and should be paid as full overtime. I find that in the provinces, prior to the Fawcett scheme, the clerks had to do eight hours' work, without extra pay, every fifth Sunday; now they have to do it every fourth Sunday. Now, I come to the question of salaries. The highest officials are, of course, well paid, and deserve to be, for they do hard duty. Since 1880 the pay of superintendents has risen from £300 to £400, while the pay of assistant superintendents has risen from £210 to £300. I am told that a new scheme, last was night, posted at the Liverpool office which will give increased salaries, but I know nothing of the details. Before 1881 the maximum pay of the senior clerks was £160 a year; now it is only £190, a rise quite disproportionate to that of the assistant superintendents, who are next above the senior clerks. Moreover, senior clerks are in many cases doing the work of assistant superintendents. I hold that in such cases the clerks should receive promotion and a higher salary. In a Circular issued by the Post Office to attract youths into the Telegraph Service the prospect of rising to a salary of £190 per annum is offered. But if a block in promotion takes place, as is frequently the case, the clerks have no hope of attaining the £190. The telegraphists ask that all overtime should be paid for equally on the basis of the rate and a quarter, and they object to the deduction from pay during absence on sick leave. Then I come to the question of pensions. At present, before a clerk is eligible for a pension, every day he is absent through sickness is deducted, although his salary has been reduced by that absence; while nothing is said about the overtime he may have worked. Again, there is the question of promotion. In the provinces the advance is very slow. Take, for instance, the Cork Branch. The maximum in the second class is £98 per annum, and it takes 15 years to arrive at that maximum, even if a man is lucky. At the present moment there are three clerks there who, although they have been over 18 years in the service, are waiting for promotion. During the last six years there have only been nine promotions into the first class, in which the maximum is 50s. a week; and there has only been one promotion since 1881. In the provinces, too, Sunday labour is unpaid for, while the London telegraphists are insufficiently paid for it. Then, again, although the work has increased, the different classes of clerks have not increased in the same ratio; and I contend that they ought to be enlarged to permit of speedier promotion to the maximum of £190 a year. As it is, some clerks may secure their promotion in seven or eight years, while others may have to wait for 18 years, though all have equal qualifications and length of service. I hope that something will be promised in connection with this matter of classification. And now I come to the question of meal-times. This may appear to be a small matter, but it is a matter of vital importance, because it affects the health of those whom we employ. There is at present no cessation of work for meals during the turns between 2 p.m. and 10 p.m., 3 p.m. and 11 p.m., 5 p.m. and 2 a.m., and 8 p.m. and 4 a.m. Sometimes, of course, the clerks may have spare moments, but very often their work is continuous. I will refer to a letter sent to the Controller on this subject by a member of the Telegraphic Staff, in which the writer asked that, as he was on duty from 2 p.m. until 10 p.m., he might be allowed an interval for dinner. He said he had to leave home at 1 p.m., and, therefore, was compelled to have a meal at the latest by half past 12, and, with the exception of the two slices of bread and butter supplied by the Post Office between 5 and 6 p.m., and which had to be eaten while the operator was working—he had no opportunity of getting any food until he left the office. The answer to that was,—“I see no reason for departing from the general rule.” I think it is time that these matters were laid before the House, in spite of the Amendment of the hon. Baronet opposite. Men have actually been punished, I am told, for having partaken of food during these hours. There was a case at the end of last year where two men who had two extra hours duty were punished for delaying their work by talking while taking their suppers. They denied the talking, but, even if they did talk while taking their food, there was not very much harm in it. Other clerks have been punished by transference to another staff, which, to many of them, is a punishment. I must also mention the case of the submarine telegraph clerks who lately waited on the Postmaster General. They have a just grievance, which, I believe, has been promised consideration. I find that there are certain vacancies in the Central Telegraph Office, and I should like to know whether estimates intended for clerks in the central office have been given to the Submarine Telegraph clerks. I imagine there must have been a mistake, because I do not believe the Postmaster General would do such a thing intentionally. I will not detain the House by going into further grievances; I have referred to the strongest of them. I may be told that the matter is still under consideration. I shall not consider that a satisfactory answer, and I shall certainly take a Division if that should be the only answer I receive. I may receive a distinct negative, which, of course, would necessitate a Division. I may be told that there are great difficulties as regards the financial question, and, having served many years in the Foreign Office, I know what those difficulties are, and how the Treasury insist on economy. I am quite well aware that it is not easy to obtain the assent of the Treasury to a proposal which involves an increase of expenditure. I was told, last year, by the Postmaster General that he had not consulted the Treasury.

Earl Compton

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): On what subject?

*EARL COMPTON: On the subject of the increase of the salaries of the telegraph clerks. The Fawcett scheme of 1881, I find, was supposed to have cost the country something like £67,000 down, and £250,000 per year. I should like to know whether the improvements promised under the Fawcett scheme have been carried out. We contend not. Then we are told that there is an annual deficit. But that is owing to the high price paid for the telegraphs, and is not the fault of the telegraph clerks, who should not be overworked at inadequate salaries in order to make up that deficit. I consider that Mr. Scudamore's price was a great deal too high; and to tell the clerks that once the deficit is paid off then the question of salaries will be considered, is to say that the present generation of clerks are to receive small salaries, and be overworked, in order that a future generation of clerks may have larger salaries and less work. Then I am told that Civil servants have no business whatever to combine or agitate to get their grievances redressed. Sir, the ventilation of grievances is one of the most healthy things we can have. It is a safety valve, and if anybody tries to drive discontentment beneath the surface harm must inevitably ensue. There have been no underhand manoeuvres. Petition after Petition has been properly signed and sent up in the last two or three years, and the subject has been discussed in the Press. But in a Treasury Letter, in answer to Mr. Fawcett, objection was taken to organised agitation being brought to bear upon the House of Commons. The Treasury Letter said—

“My Lords reserve to themselves the power of directing that the execution of the terms of the agreement be suspended in any post office of which the members are henceforth known to be taking part in extra-official agitations.”

I call that a monstrous doctrine, and it means that these men are to do nothing beyond simply appealing to the heads of their Departments, or, that if they go beyond, that they are to be punished. That is a paragraph which should be expunged as speedily as possible from the Letter of Her Majesty's Treasury. It appears to me that is pretty much the doctrine on which the Postmaster General acted with regard to Cardiff. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Cardiff is by ill-health prevented from being present, but it is his intention to bring the case of the Cardiff telegraph clerks before the House before the close of the Session. That case has been mentioned in the public Press; and though repeated representations were made by the Cardiff telegraph clerks, it was not until their case was taken up by the Western Mail that it received attention. A new Postmaster and staff were sent to Cardiff, and eight men were punished for this extra-official agitation. They were removed from Cardiff, which was a punishment to them, because the only reason given for their removal is that they took part in this agitation, which they deny. I hope we shall lay down at once the good rule that men may combine and agitate if they choose to do so in a legal way, whether they be Civil servants or not. I think I have laid before the House the facts. There is a stagnation of promotion and an inadequate scale of pay, and other grievances for which I ask a speedy remedy. The hardships are of a most harassing character, how harassing may be gathered from the detailed Superannuation Report, from which it appears that in 1885-6 50 per cent. of the clerks who retired did so from physical and nervous affections. Telegraph clerks undergo great bodily as well as mental fatigue. At an early age, in order to qualify them for higher positions, which in many cases are never open to them, they are expected to know something of electrical science and to be acquainted with the French and German languages, besides being good geographers, of which there are few nowadays. The duties of telegraph clerks are becoming harder. The Postmaster General knows that cipher and code telegrams are increasing enormously in number. If a word is sent wrong or a number omitted, it might mean ruin to the individual or disaster to a large number of the general public. How well the work is done I need not inform the House. Newspaper reports, commercial business, and many of the relations of life, depend upon the accurate and faithful work of the telegraph clerks, who are a deserving body of public servants. I leave with confidence this Motion in the hands of the House of Commons, who represent the public, whom it is the aim and object of every telegraph clerk to serve faithfully and well, and who only ask for justice to be done as regards their grievances. I have very great pleasure in moving the Resolution which stands in my name.
Earl Compton

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the present position of Telegraphists in London and elsewhere is unsatisfactory, and their just grievances require redress."—(Earl Compton.)

* (6.45). BARON F. DE ROTHSCHILD (Aylesbury): My noble Friend who has moved this Resolution has entered so clearly and minutely into the subject that I will only trespass on the time of the House for a few moments in seconding his proposal. The Government might object to this Motion upon two grounds—the first being political, and the other financial. They might consider it inexpedient that private Members should lend themselves to agitation on the part of the Civil servants of the Crown, when this agitation is directed against the superior officials. I might compare this case with that of one of the great merchants in the City employing a considerable number of clerks. Supposing he were to underpay those clerks, they would naturally agitate for an increase of wages. In so doing they might come to some friend of theirs and ask him to lay their case before the merchant who employs them; but the merchant is in a very different position from that of a Minister of the Crown, because the clerks do the private work of the merchant, and it is to the interest of the merchant to see that that work is well carried out, and, consequently, that his clerks should be well paid for doing so. The Postmaster General may well say it is no business of ours to interfere between the Civil servants of the Crown and himself, but here I would venture to ask him whether those Civil servants are not quite as much our servants as they are those of the Postmaster General. The telegrams they have to send day and night are our telegrams, and is it, therefore, to our interest that the clerks who send them should be placed in such a position as will safeguard our interests. I might here cite an incident which, although at first sight may appear trivial, but is nevertheless to the point. It happened only the other day that a racing gentleman sent a telegram to Newmarket to ask a member of the ring to back a horse called Semolina, but instead of sending the name Semolina the telegraph clerks sent the name of another horse, Signorina, who did not win, and the consequence was that the gentleman who had thus been made to back it lost his money. There can be no doubt that if the telegraph clerks were to be better paid there will naturally be a demand for much more money, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to provide for in his Budget; but it seems to me that one of the chief sources of the national income is the money derived from the Inland Service, and inasmuch as there is a considerable increase in the Returns from the Telegraph Service it seems only right that a proportion of that increase should be given to those who are instrumental in producing it. When we are told that the telegraph clerks have no right to agitate, I would point out that this is no new agitation. In point of fact, it began something like 20 years ago, namely, in the year 1870, when it led to a strike which took place in the year 1872. That strike was only settled by an enormous expenditure. For my part, I hope that those difficulties will be adjusted without a strike on the part of the telegraph clerks, although at the present time it would appear that strikes are pretty much the order of the day. I would, therefore, put it to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General that he should offer some positive assurance to my noble Friend that he will in due time, and after careful consideration, lay before the House some kind of scheme that will do substantial justice to the interests of all parties, and so obviate the existing difficulty. Without troubling the House any further, I have only to express a hope that we shall hear from the Postmaster General, not an evasive answer to the case we have put forward, but a reply that will prove satisfactory to all who take an interest in this question.

(6.55.) MR. RAIKES: I cannot enter upon what I have to say without, in the first place, congratulating the noble Lord (Earl Compton) on the moderate tone of his speech and upon the scrupulous accuracy of his statements. If it were necessary that this Motion should have been made at all, I do not think it could have been brought before the House in a better way than that which the noble Lord had adopted; but, at the same time, I regret to have to say that, in my opinion, the time the noble Lord has selected for bringing forward this question has not been well chosen. A reformer is often told that he is either too early or too late in moving; but this Motion is both too early and too late. The noble Lord has been too early because he has brought forward this subject at a time when the Government have not had an opportunity of arriving at any conclusion with regard to the proposal it embodies, while he has raised a number of small points of detail which are at the present moment occupying the attention of the Department. The noble Lord has ranged the grievances of the telegraph clerks under four heads, namely, those which relate to the hours of duty, those relating to the rates of pay and allowances, those affecting classification and promotion, and those concerning the amount of leave. But I must complain that no official communication has been made to me with regard to the grievances of the London telegraph clerks before this Motion was brought forward in this House, a course which I think is altogether unprecedented. I can scarcely understand how the noble Lord opposite, who has evidently taken up this subject most conscientiously, could have reconciled it with his duty to have brought forward this Motion without having previously given the Department an opportunity of investigating the grievances which he alleges to exist.

EARL COMPTON: I beg pardon. I certainly understood that a Petition had been presented from the London telegraph clerks to the Postmaster General on the subject. The Petition which I hold in my hand does not, however, appear to bear a date.

MR. RAIKES: The only communication I have received from the London Central Telegraph Office was a request made to me three days ago, some weeks after the noble Lord gave notice of this Motion, that I should receive a deputation which would present a Memorial to me; in answer to which request I have directed a reply to be sent appointing a day in the course of next week, when I hope to receive that deputation and to hear what those who compose it have to say. I am, of course, aware that there has been a Petition flying about the country for some months past, which I have seen unofficially in the newspapers; but I may remark that the last persons to whom the grievances referred to in that Petition were made known were the official superiors of the Department. The first Petition on the subject that I have seen from the provincial offices was one from Newcastle, which was presented on February 28 in this year, and this was followed by a great number of other Petitions in identical terms from other offices. It was on March 4, four days after that Petition reached me, that I came to the conclusion that whilst it was not in my power to entertain or to recommend to the consideration of the Treasury several of the points that we raised by that document, yet that with regard to the other points I would take steps to secure their consideration by the immediate appointment of the best Departmental Committee I could select, upon which I would invite the representation of the Treasury with a view of considering the points put before me in order that I might see how far it is possible to go in meeting the grievances complained of. That Committee have now been sitting between a fortnight and three weeks, and they have not yet, of course, been able to deal with the intricate matters to be considered so as to enable them to arrive at any conclusion. But I am sure the noble Lord will agree that no time has been lost in the endeavour to probe to the utmost these grievances of which the telegraphists have complained. Now, there were nine points alleged in the Newcastle Petition, and in Petitions that have reached me since from other places; and upon four of these points I felt that I should not be acting fairly by the men if I allowed myself to hold out false hopes that it was at all likely these demands would be conceded. The first question upon which I felt it was impossible to encourage the Memorialists—was in regard to the request for the abolition of classification, and I think that the noble Lord, and those who think with him, are really hardly as careful as they should be in forming their conclusions if they encourage members of the Civil Service to think that what has been from the outset a cardinal principle of Civil Service, is likely to be modified in the case of telegraphists or any other particular branch of the Postal Service. I am assured by those most competent to form a judgment on the subject that the abolition of classification in the Telegraph Service would entail an addition to the expenditure of not less than £990,000 a year at the maximum—that is to say, an additional million—including changes that would have to be made in the Postal Service, for Members must see that we must place the two branches on the same footing as Mr. Fawcett placed them. There would be a claim for equality it would be impossible to disregard. If the position of the one branch is immensely improved, it will be impossible to refuse consideration of demands, though founded on very insufficient grounds from the other branch, which, up to the present time, has occupied its position with reasonable contentment, and has made no such claim. This demand is the largest, but there are others which I could not hold out any hope would be conceded. The second demand which cannot be entertained is the demand concerning the annual increment of the pay of junior officers. At present the increment is 1s. 6d. in the weekly wages, and the Petitioners are anxious that it should be raised to 2s. Those who support this demand need to be reminded that these telegraphists entered the service of the State on well-understood and recognised conditions. In their Petitions they gravely state that they are prevented from performing what they call “the duties of manhood,” because their pay is so poor. What they mean is that they are not able to enter the state of matrimony eight or nine years before an ordinary member of the middle class would think of undertaking the burden of a family. Of course, I should be very glad if all these deserving men, excellent servants of the State, were receiving much larger incomes, just as I should be very glad if any hon. Member in this House were enjoying double his present income. But the Government must consider what are the terms on which these telegraphists entered the service of the State, and it is a little hard that after these people have entreated to be admitted to the Service, we should be told that those terms, after they have been freely accepted, are inadequate and insufficient—nay, almost savage and barbarous in their results. Those who take up this question are hardly treating the State fairly. It is easy to throw stones at the State, but the duties of the Government are not confined to the manifestation of pure benevolence towards individuals. There are five points as to which I have informed the Newcastle Petitioners that I shall be glad to obtain the best advice available, and see if anything can be done in regard to them. These five points do not include the burning “dinner” question, which arises in London only; but I shall be glad to consider whether I can include in the purview of the Departmental Committee any fresh point of that kind raised by the London Memorialists as soon as I shall have seen their Petition. It is impossible to pledge myself as to what points may be submitted to the Departmental Committee until I have the Memorial before me.

EARL COMPTON: I cannot quite understand the right hon. Gentleman's reply on this matter. I am distinctly informed that the particular Petition to which reference has already been made, and many other Petitions, have been sent in the last three or four years to the right hon. Gentleman from the Central Telegraph Office. There was also a document setting forth the views of the senior male and female clerks of the first and second class in the Telegraph Department. I cannot believe that all these have escaped the right hon. Gentleman's notice.

MR. RAIKES: Of course, there have been previous Petitions in former years presented to myself and my predecessors in office. In fact, I may say that few months ever pass without the presentation of some Petition or Memorial from the Telegraph Staff. But I am referring now to the Memorial, which, I understand, is ready for presentation, which has not yet reached me, and which I only know of because I have been asked to receive a deputation, who propose to present the Memorial.

EARL COMPTON: I did not allude to that. I referred to the Petitions showered upon the right hon. Gentleman himself and his predecessors as to these grievances. They all contain the same prayer.

*MR. RAIKES: The noble Lord refers to previous Petitions, and I to a particular Petition. There is another point the noble Lord has alluded to just now to which I must call attention. A printed pamphlet, purporting to present the case of the senior and junior telegraphists in the Central Office, was said to have been brought to the notice of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service. Will it be believed that the first opportunity I have had of seeing that document was this very morning, when it reached me through the post? It was supposed in the Department that some statement was made to the Civil Service Commission, and we feel that we should like to have an opportunity of studying it. I have been unable before to obtain a copy of that Memorial, and I have not, of course, been able to give it any consideration. In fact, it has been sprung upon the Department at the last moment.

*EARL COMPTON: It is in the same spirit, and contains precisely the same points as have been raised in all the previous Petitions.

*MR. RAIKES: The noble Lord referred to it just now as if I must have seen it, but I had not until this morning. It is likely that there would be a family resemblance between this and previous Memorials, for they all contain demands for more money and less work. The precise contents of the document, however, are not yet known to me. In the Report of the Royal Commission there is no indication of the contents of the pamphlet, and, as far as I know, there is no proof of the statement that the Royal Commissioners received it; they certainly have expressed no opinion upon it. It is part of the series of spring guns, man-traps, and sudden surprises which make this subject one so difficult to deal with. I will now tell the House what are the five points which I have referred to the Departmental Committee. The first is as to the sufficiency of present wages. The demand of the Petitioners is for a maximum of £200. I felt it right to inform the Memorialists that I could not hold out the hope of granting this, but I would consider how far the present rate is sufficient; the second is the request of the Petitioners that all overtime should be paid for at the rate of one and a quarter; the third is the demand that all Sunday work should be paid for as overtime; the fourth is the demand that sorting clerks and telegraphists of 10 years' or less service should receive three weeks' annual leave, and that those of more than 10 years' service should have one month; and the fifth is the request that full pay should be allowed during absence from duty through sickness. All these points are being sifted by the most competent tribunal I could appoint, and upon it I have a gentleman representing the Treasury. I think it extremely desirable, if possible, that I should be fortified with a unanimous Report of the Committee before requesting the Treasury to take any action. I had decided, before these questions were raised in the agitated form in which they have recently been presented to the public, that there were three principal requirements of the Service which merited special consideration. The most important of these concerns the position of the superior officers of the Telegraph Department. The noble Lord has referred to what he has heard from Liverpool this morning. Only a fortnight ago I obtained the sanction of the Treasury to a considerable improvement in the position of these officers at Liverpool. The consequence is that about 40 promotions have been made on the Telegraph Staff of that office. There are now one Chief Superintendent rising from £400 to £500 by increments of £20 a year; one Superintendent from £310 to £400 by £15 a year; four Assistant Superintendents of the first class rising from £260 to £310 by annual increments of £10; eight of the second class from £200 to £260 by annual increases of £10; one Assistant Female Supervisor rising from £80 to £105 by £5 a year. Liverpool is the largest and most important provincial office; but it is intended to take Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham, and other large towns in order. Careful inquiry will be instituted, not in any slap-dash fashion, or with a mania for uniformity, to ascertain the needs of the different offices; but Liverpool is as yet the only place where a change has been given effect to. I trust it will be seen that, although I have not been able to give any countenance to the proposal for the abolition of classification, which would in effect be the abolition of promotion by merit, I have not been slack in giving effect to the real requirements of the Service, and that in advance of the demands made upon me. I sympathise with the case brought forward by the noble Lord with regard to the hours of duty. But I am obliged, as the head of any Department would be, to consider first the exigencies of the Service. Reasonable care will, of course, be taken to prevent cases of hardship. It would be a scandal if the servants of the State were exposed to hardships which might easily be prevented. But, as everybody knows, the Telegraph Service is necessarily exposed to great fluctuations, in which occasional cases of hardship are inevitable. And I am sure that it will not be believed that the Department is indifferent to the hardships inflicted upon individuals. I can assure the noble Lord that everything shall be done which I can do to diminish any undue pressure. I regard the passage quoted from Mr. Fawcett's scheme as the recognised principle of the Department, that two days' work should not exceed 16 hours, and that no day should exceed 11 hours. The Secretary to the Treasury can bear witness to the importunity with which I have urged additions to the staff. But these questions are complicated by the considerations to which the noble Lord has very fairly referred, namely, that the men who are complaining of overwork are not extremely in favour of additions to the force, because it diminishes their opportunities of adding to their salaries by overtime. The noble Lord would be surprised if he knew how great has been the increase of the staff during the last few years. As regards the dinner hour in London, I do not see any great hardship if men whose hours are from 2 to 10 are requested to dine before they come on duty. They are allowed time for refreshment between 5 and 6, and it is enough if these men, who can hardly expect a life of luxury, are enabled to enjoy reasonable comfort. I admit the exceptional character of the Submarine staff, who have special claims on the consideration of the Department. They were handed over to the Government, which had but an imperfect knowledge of their position in their former employment. I have had the pleasure of meeting a deputation of these clerks, and have told them that though I cannot promise the large gratuities to their widows which the companies granted, yet I hope to improve their position. Then the noble Lord referred to the Cardiff branch of the subject, and upon this I in no way wish to shirk discussion. The claims put forward on this point are, I think, about the most nonsensical with which I have become acquainted. But the hon. Member who has special charge of this part of the subject is not now in his place, and I think it would be unfair to him to attempt now to make a general statement on this branch, and for the moment I pass over it. The only other matter I need refer to is the Circular issued from the Treasury under the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. The responsibility for that Circular rests with right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and the quotation which has been made from it to-night is the first I have ever heard of. Whilst I think that the language used in that Minute is of rather too uncompromising and peremptory a character, I cannot but think that it would be a bad thing for the Civil Service if its members were constantly to be bringing their grievances before Parliament. I believe that in the great Republic across the water, which we are always being called upon to imitate, every inhabitant of the district of Columbia is disfranchised. Although that would be a very drastic measure to apply in any other country in the world—and we must remember that Washington is only an official centre—it shows that American politicians recognise the danger which arises in cases like the present. I hope that after the statement which I have been able to make this evening the House will recognise the claim of every Government that it shall not interfere with matters of Departmental administration, except where it thinks fit to censure the Minister in charge. So long as a Minister occupies his position at the head of a Department he ought to be allowed to conduct it in his own way. I venture to hope that the House will leave questions of this sort in the hands of those who are directly and primarily responsible for them, in the belief that the grievances of the servants of any Department are not likely to lack careful consideration and, I believe, just and fair treatment.

Earl Compton

(7.32.) SIR A. BORTHWICK (Kensington, S.): I will only detain the House a few moments while I explain the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper, namely—

“That this House, while anxious that all public servants should receive fair and adequate remuneration, regrets the increasing tendency to invoke the direct interposition of Parliament between the Executive Government and the Civil Service ”

That Amendment is fully justified by the speeches which have been delivered this evening, especially that of the noble Lord. The noble Lord, indeed, has assumed that I put my Amendment on the Paper in some spirit of hostility to the telegraphists. That is in no way the case. I yield neither to the noble Lord nor any other Member in my admiration for the general body of public servants, or my appreciation of their merits, and of the way in which they perform their duties. So much is that the case that I have taken on several occasions the course of inquiring carefully into a grievance, and bringing it before the notice of the legitimate authority; and whenever I have done that, I have generally succeeded in having the grievance redressed. My objection to the Motion lies in its enormous breadth. The noble Lord assumes that the present position of the telegraphists is unsatisfactory, and that their grievances are just and require redress. I should have sympathised most cordially with him if he had adduced any one distinct grievance, but, instead of that, when the noble Lord came to speak on the grievances, they ranged over every possible matter of duty, pay, classification, promotion, bread and butter, and matrimony. The object of my Amendment is to declare that the House is not competent to deal with so many subjects at once; and we have now heard it fully explained by the Postmaster General how not only should we have been wrong in dealing with those subjects, but that, after spending last night in every kind of cheeseparing over the Estimates, we should now be voting away £1,000,000 of public money if we supported the noble Lord. The answer of the Postmaster General seems so satisfactory that I can hardly doubt that the noble Lord will withdraw his Motion. For my own part, any sentimental difficulty in opposing the Motion has been entirely obviated by the clear and masterly statement of the Postmaster General, and I shall, therefore, instead of moving my Amendment, support the Government in giving a direct negative to the noble Lord's Motion.

*(7.36.) MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): In the absence of the hon. Member for Cardiff I conceive it to be my duty to call attention to what took place in Cardiff last August. Certain telegraphists complained of the length of hours they had to work, and went on to state some of their grievances, and the consequence was that six new postal clerks and eight ordinary clerks, together with a Postmaster, were added to the staff. A letter was written to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, complaining that the clerks had been punished for simply complaining that they had not been paid for overtime, and the right hon. Gentleman admitted that they had been so punished by removal to other places. Public attention was first called to the matter in the Western Mail, which was a strong supporter of the Government. The excitement in the matter had been intense, and the Mayor and other influential people had taken great interest in the question, feeling that the clerks had been very badly used. I hold in my hand a telegram asking me to call the attention of the House to the moderate requests of the hard workers in the Cardiff office. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that while they were on sick leave, under the certificate of a Government doctor, one-third, at least, of their pay was deducted. These men, too, have to work eight or 10 hours without any chance of getting food, which is a far worse position than that of a sailor, soldier, miner, or even a prisoner in his cell. I think arrangements might be made by which some of the grievances might be remedied.

SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, South): I only intend to say a few words. I am extremely glad to have heard the fair speech of the Postmaster General and the concessions which he has promised. The officers for whom the appeal has been made are, as we all know, a body of most efficient and meritorious men, who have always done their work with great zeal for the Public Service. There is a great difficulty in ascertaining whether the rates of pay in such offices, where special knowledge is required, really represent a fair remuneration, and, therefore, it is very necessary that whenever there are grievances they should be well formulated in order that the Department may inquire fully how far they are just or unjust. The Postmaster General has told us that he has already appointed a Departmental Committee to inquire into the alleged grievances, and I think my hon. Friend would be well advised if he takes this concession in the spirit in which it has been offered and to accept the inquiry which I am sure, with my knowledge of Departmental inquiries, will be fair and just to the Telegraph Service, and if he does not press this Motion to a Division until, at least, he finds what is the result of the inquiry.

(7.45.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh): I only desire to say that the dissatisfaction which exists amongst the telegraph clerks of this country is very considerably shared by the telegraph operators throughout Ireland. I have received communications from telegraph operators in many parts of Ireland, expressing the hope that Irish Members will co-operate with the noble Lord in his endeavour to obtain the redress of their grievances, and I am convinced that if the noble Lord goes to a Division he will be followed by the majority of the Irish Members. It seems to me that the demands of the telegraph operators are perfectly reasonable, and that the statement of the Postmaster General is anything but satisfactory. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman appeared to me to assume a tone of antagonism all through his speech to the complaints of the telegraphists. Irish Members have no desire that any but real grievances should be put forward, and some of the grievances enumerated by the noble Lord are undoubted. For instance, it must be impossible for the Postmaster General to explain how it is right and proper that the telegraph clerk in London receives pay for operating on Sunday, while the telegraph operator in Ireland receives no pay for Sunday labour. I will not go into other matters, but simply add that many people in Ireland are completely at one with the noble Lord, and that I hope he will go to a Division.

(7.47.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I sincerely trust the noble Lord will go to a Division. Several Irish Members have come from Ireland specially to support the noble Lord in the Division Lobby. I have come here now, at considerable inconvenience, to support the just claims of the telegraphists. Nowhere can you find a more efficient class of men than the telegraph operators in Cork. Sunday after Sunday these men are kept at work in consequence of the nefarious administration of Her Majesty's Government. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, I say there is infamous misgovernment in Ireland; and the major portion of the messages sent across the wires in Ireland on Sunday relate to the suppression of public meeting in Ireland, and to everything that is antagonistic to the popular opinion of the country. We think that when these men are doing Her Majesty's work they should be paid. It is disgraceful the way these men are treated, and I want some definite assurance from the Postmaster General that their grievances will be redressed unless this is given; and if the noble Lord withdraws his Motion I hope some of our friends on the Opposition side of the House will, at any rate, put Her Majesty's Government to the trouble of a Division.

(7.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 142.—(Div. List, No. 50.)

FIARS COURTS IN SCOTLAND.

(8.3.) MR. M. J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to move—

"That it is desirable that the constitution and proceedings of Fiars Courts in Scotland should be reformed so as to obtain a better and more uniform system of striking corn and other averages than at present prevails; and that other agricultural produce should be included in the prices struck by the Fiars juries, especially meat and dairy produce, with a view to annually collect and publish the same in an efficient form."

It is of great importance that there should be a just, intelligible, and fixed procedure for ascertaining the money to be paid by commutation. The modes of striking fiars are different, inconsistent, and contradictory, and their process is loose, inefficient, and incorrect. I may explain to the House that under the old Act of Parliament fiars were struck on nine articles, namely, wheat, barley, bere, oats, peas, beans, rye, oatmeal, and malt. Some of these are obsolete, and I should like to substitute for bere and rye, for instance, meat, cheese, wool, and potatoes. Let me very briefly put the House in possession of the origin of this question, because there can be no doubt that many hon. Members are unacquainted with either the origin or the practice of fiars. The word "fiars" is derived from the French word feurs. The old definition of striking the fiars is—

"The ascertaining and fixing by judicial authority the average prices of the different kinds of grain in each county, of a specific crop and year, and the prices thus held to be legally ascertained and determined become the rule and rate of payment in all transactions where money is substituted for grain at fiars prices."

It was deemed important several hundred years ago to ascertain in a legal manner the value of victuals, rents, and feu duties, payable to the Crown. At one time the value was ascertainable by the Sheriff of the Court of Exchequer, and at another period—in Reformation times—it was ascertainable in the Commissary and Consistorial Courts. One old statute bearing on the subject was one relating to the stipend of the clergy. It was passed in 1584. But there was even a statute passed in 1564. In those early days no jury had to be summoned, but the Sheriff was the sole arbiter on the evidence given by the witnesses, and many are inclined to resort to that tribunal at the present day. The Act of Sederunt, which regulated the procedure of Fiars Courts, was passed in 1723. Some may object to that Act as not being a regular Act of Parliament. Mr. Erskine says of such Acts that they "Are not law in the strict sense of the word, because they are not created by the supreme power, but the obligatory force is as strong as if they had the express sanction of Parliament."

Under the Act of Sederunt 15 men serve on the jury, by whom the prices are struck. Eight of these are heritors or proprietors, and they have to meet between the 4th and the 20th of February. One objection to this system is that the time of year at which the prices are taken is most inopportune, because between the 1st of November and the 20th of February it is difficult to say that any good grain will find its way into the market. In that period farmers only rush bad grain, or grain that will not keep well, into the market. Then, again, it is very near Candlemas rent time, and that operates in the getting rid of the grain which the farmer may be compelled to sell in order to pay his rent. In that way, therefore, the clergy, who depend on this system for their stipends, get the worst average. The evil might be avoided by the period being made as late as April or May, and then the greater part of the grain will be sold, and in consequence a fairer average taken. I may say, in passing, that the two parties whose interests are most at stake in this matter are, first of all, the tenant farmer, and next the clergy. The system operates very harshly on the stipends of parish ministers. It is impossible that they can feel satisfied, because in many counties only one fiar is struck, and they are entitled by the 48th of George III. to have the stipend paid on the highest fiar. When only one fiar is struck in the county it is impossible to say that that is the highest average of the price of corn in the county. Again, in some counties it is practically impossible to get together as many as eight heritors to form a jury. Many proprietors at that period of the year have left their Northern homes and come South. It would be better, in my opinion, to have a new arrangement respecting the jury, and one which would not give the proprietors an overwhelming majority on the jury. There is a great grievance felt as to the mode in which witnesses are summoned. They are brought from all parts of the country, and very often have very little to say. They stand about, practically, all the day idle. The producer gives an account of the grain on his farm. The dealer is called, and his evidence is welcomed because he can speak of many transactions, and very often gives his views of the same class of grain as the producer has just given evidence of.

Mr. M. J. Stewart

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 16th April, 1890.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.—(No. 6.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Before I proceed with my argument in favour of the Second Reading of this Bill, I should like to say how unworthy I feel to occupy this position in the presence of hon. Members who have taken up the question for years past, and how I feel my inability to do it justice. It is identically the same Bill as the measure which has been introduced on three occasions, in 1887 by the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxfordshire (Sir B. Samuelson), in 1888 by the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth), and in 1889 by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson). I think I may say that I speak for the textile manufacturers at all events, and for manufacturers generally throughout England. The Chambers of Commerce have unanimously petitioned the House in favour of the measure, and Resolutions in its favour have also been passed at the Trades Union Congress. I believe I shall be able to show the House that it is a Bill which affects not merely the employers of labour, but the industrial classes throughout the country generally. The grievance complained of is that gradually—owing to successive legal decisions—the interpretation of the Rating Law has been considerably altered, with the result that one by one owners and users of machinery have been attacked all over the country by the Rating Authorities, until in self-defence they feel themselves obliged to appeal to Parliament for redress. In Scotland the same attack has been made, but effectually resisted, and no machinery in Scotland has ever been rated, or is now attempted to be rated. I think, therefore, that I shall have the solid support on this occasion of the Scotch Members in passing this Declaratory Bill, which only proposes to leave the law in England precisely on all fours with what it is at present, and has always been, in Scotland. I might rest our demand solely upon the Report of the Committee of this House which sat in 1887, but I am afraid that it is my duty to go a little more into detail. I am quite aware that the leading lawyers have been arguing the question before the Courts for many years, but I would ask the House not to attach too much weight to the views they have taken in regard to the interpretation of the law, but rather, as the House of Commons is above all the Courts, to put the law on such a footing that in future the Judges will be able to interpret it in accordance with the common sense of the community. First of all, let me ask what is the Rating Law under which local rates are levied in this country? They are levied under the 43rd Elizabeth, c. 2, which directs the overseers "to collect rates from land, houses, and coal mines." That is one reason why it is proposed coal mines should be exempted from the operation of the present Bill, namely, that they are the one industry specially included in the first Act dealing with the question. Other Acts were, 13 and 14 Charles II., c. 12, "An Act for the Better relief of the Poor," the 6th and 7th William IV., c. 96, known as the Parochial Assessment Act, and by which "rent" was made the test of rateable value. Since then we have had a Declaratory Act, 3 & 4 Victoria, c. 89, renewed annually since 1840, by which—

"Overseers have been prohibited from taxing any inhabitants of the township or parish in respect of any profits arising from stock-in-trade or other property."

This Declaratory Act states in the Preamble that it is an Act to exempt from liability to be rated, to the relief of the poor, stock-in-trade and other property, and it further instructs the Overseers

"That it shall not be lawful for them to rate people upon such stock-in-trade and profits in future."

This is the Rating Law—and upon that Rating Law the rating has been conducted since 1840, and the owners of machinery have till recent years been able to watch with comparative indifference attempts made to widen the area of rating. It was not until recent years that any encouragement was given to Rating Authorities to rate the machinery and appliances of ordinary manufactures. This brings me to the story of the decisions of the Courts. The first and second cases quoted before the Committee were, prior to the Act of 1840, passed in consequence of these and similar attempts to rate personalty. It was in 1769 a question of rating a room containing cotton machinery driven by a small water wheel, the whole premises being rented for 36 guineas a year, came before the Courts, when the Judges ruled that there was attachment to the hereditament, and the whole, being one entire rent, was rateable. The second case occurred in 1836—in re Guest—in regard to iron machinery used in iron works, when the decision was,—

“That all real property must be rated according to its actual value, combined with the machinery attached to it.”

Four years later the declaratory Act, 3 & 4 Victoria, was passed. In 1849, in the case of the Southampton Dock Company, Lord Campbell based his decision entirely upon the question of attachment.

“This is a rate upon the buildings to which these machines are attached,” &c.

In the case of the North Staffordshire Railway in 1860, a step appears to have been taken in the direction of straining the law a little further, and it was decided that certain things should be regarded as irremovable—articles attached to the freehold were clearly rateable—and such things as turntables and weighing-machines standing on foundations specially built for them. The decision in this case was—

“Where things, though capable of being removed, are yet so far attached that they were intended to remain permanently connected with the purposes of the undertaking,” should be taken to be things liable to increase the rateable value of the property. So far it will be seen that attachment was the point which governed all these rulings. The hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire (Mr. S. Hill), in his evidence before the Select Committee, admitted that up to 1860 attachment was the test; and that in the case of “Walmsley v. Milne,” hay-cutters, corn-cutters, and grindstones, the two first were held to be rateable, but the latter was not. After that year (said the hon. Member) a series of cases arose connected with different articles—as, for instance, the looms of a mill, which were discussed in a technical way, and Baron Parke held, in “Hallewell v. Eastwood,” that—

Mr. Winterbotham

“Before machines became attached they were mere chattels.”

That is the principle of the present Bill. From 1849 to 1886 the question of attachment was looked upon as the ratio of rateable value, and then the Courts (said the hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire) began to return to less technical rules. I altogether disagree with the hon. Gentleman, and my contention is that by all these earlier decisions it is only anything that is part of the mill and attached to it that could be rated; and in a case heard in 1866 before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Justice Lush, and Mr. Justice Blackburn, it was laid down

“That whenever a thing became so far a part of the premises that it would pass by demise, it was capable of being rated.”

In this case of a gas works, the retorts, steam engines, and gas purifiers were instanced,

“Because, without them, the premises would be worthless for the purposes for which they were erected.”

I come now to 1878, when it was that the first decision was given which seriously alarmed manufacturers. Up to the shipbuilding case “Lang v. Bishop Wearmouth,” and the case of the Tyne Boiler Company, there had been no such attempt to attach the tools and the machines of manufacturers; and it was in the Bishop Wearmouth case that Lord Cockburn for the first time introduced a new principle. He said that certain machinery was essentially necessary for shipbuilding premises, and must be taken as intended to remain permanently attached to them as “Long as the premises were applied to shipbuilding purposes.”

These were new and most dangerous words. No one would dream of the retorts and purifiers of a gas works changing hands with the premises—the retorts and purifiers are the gas works, but it is quite different in the case of shipbuilding works. In the latter case all the personalty might be sold off, and the yard and sheds let to another tenant, who might introduce entirely different machinery of a more modern character, or more suitable to the tenant's means and trade. In 1885 the decision in the Tyne Boiler case was given, and it has been productive of infinite trouble and annoyance to manufacturers generally, as well as having been a great source of profit to the legal profession. The words of the Judges in the case differ slightly, but none of them vary very much. The Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, whose judgment has been so often quoted, held that things which were on the premises were liable to be rated when they were there for the purpose of making, and did make, the premises fit to carry on a particular trade. If this be so, what becomes of our old friends annexation, attachment, or adaptability? All these requirements are gone, and the pure naked thing remains that, wherever machinery is on premises, and makes the premises fit for the purposes for which they are being used, it is liable to be rated! If this principle holds good, why not rate the books in a barrister's chambers because they are on premises for the purpose of being used for the business of a barrister. The hon. Member for Staffordshire demurred to that view, because he said that the business of a barrister could be carried on anywhere; but I should like to know, if he took his books to chambers in Whitechapel, how many clients would follow him? There is not a single trade or profession—even a bootmaker's or a barber's shop—which this decision of Lord Esher would not sweep into the rating net! The declaratory Act of 1840 says that no personalty shall be rated, and no one will doubt that machinery is personalty. Certainly the manufacturers object to have their personalty rated unless you are going to rate personalty everywhere. Lord Justice Lindley, one of the Judges who tried the Tyne Boiler case, gave a Judgment less sweeping than that of Lord Esher, and his remarks show that there was some difference of opinion upon the point. He said—

"That nothing was included in the nature of machinery which would be mere loose machinery and which would not pass to a tenant to whom the works were demised."

That is the same point we lay down in this Bill, but the Judgment quoted is always that of Lord Esher and not of Lord Justice Lindley. Our Bill leaves it perfectly clear that everything in the mill, for the purpose of making it a mill, as distinguished from a warehouse, is rateable; but that everything put in by the tenant or occupier for the purpose of carrying on a particular trade is not rateable. In his evidence before the Select Committee the hon. Member for Staffordshire said—

"He did not apprehend from the decision in the Tyne Boiler case that any movable machinery could be rated;"

but Mr. Myers, of Preston (Questions 575 to 578), and Mr. Marshall (726), two experienced valuers for rating purposes, took an entirely different view, holding that under the Tyne Boiler decision all machinery could be rated. Mr. Marshall added (730) that to act upon this decision would "more than double" the rating of mills. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, before the Select Committee, said—

"That it was necessary to look to the mode in which machinery was annexed." (Question 67.)

If the machines were not annexed, and were without a special foundation, then they were merely chattels and were not rateable. But that is the principle of our Bill. The hon. Member went on to say that if machines were there for the carrying on of the works, they must be regarded as part of the realty, and as such were liable to be rated. Of course all machinery, all appliances, and all tools would be on premises for the carrying on of the works, for what other purpose could it be there? The hon. Member was asked whether, apart altogether from the question, whether the machinery was attached to the building it would not be rateable simply because it formed part of the essential means of carrying on a particular business, and his answer was—

"I think not: the machinery must be connected with the building, and specially adapted to the business carried on in it."

In question 113, he was asked—

"I think we may take it to be your opinion that there should be some adaptation of the premises as an essential element in the matter?"

And the answer was, "Certainly." He went on to say—

"Both conditions are necessary and must co-exist."

In reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for Manchester, he said (I refer to Questions 75, 76, and 77)

"The new spinning mules were put in the mill for the purpose of the works being carried on in the way they were being carried on;"

and yet he declares, in Answer 79, that they should not be rateable! The opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman at that time was that the two conditions I have referred to should be co-existent, and in reply to 296 he declares that one without the other is not enough. And if I can show him—as I can—that one of those two conditions has been entirely dropped, in a subsequent case, I claim the fulfilment of the promise he made before the Committee, namely, that if the Rating Authorities did act in that manner, he would re-consider his judgment as to the necessity of the Declaratory Act. I have alluded to annexation and adaptability of the premises to the machinery and the machinery to the premises. This has all been dropped, legal hair-splitting having brushed it all away. What I desire to bring out is the uncertainty of the law as it at present stands. How can business men make their arrangements with the law in this uncertain state? If at this moment I had to erect a mill giving employment to 500 or 600 hands, I should assuredly think twice or thrice before doing so in England. I should consider whether it would not be advisable to cross the border. The law in Scotland is clear and understandable. No machinery is rated there; and after the decision of Lord Fraser, I think no attempt will be made to rate it. Well, is such a state of things good for the English operatives or manufacturers? Across the Channel, in countries under the Code Napoléon, premises used for industrial purposes are specially exempted from rating. The Bill does not propose this; it would be most unfair to do so; but what I want to point out is, that those great industries on which the well-being of the working classes of this country so much depend are far better circumstanced in Scotland and on the Continent than in England. I cannot help thinking that I have said enough, as regards the legal decisions, to show that the state of the law is irregular and uncertain, and requires alteration. I point out, further, as proving this irregularity in practice, that lace-making machinery is not rated at Nottingham, whilst it is rated at Chard, and that machinery is rated at Sheffield, Huddersfield, and Sunderland, which is entirely exempted at Kidderminster and three-fourths of Manchester. Before the Select Committee Mr. Dalglish described the system of rating practised, and my own experience bears out his testimony. Machinery is not rated at anything like its value, but a compromise is effected. A rate is decided upon by the Rating Authority, and the manufacturer is threatened that if he does not pay, legal proceedings will be instituted. He pays his £300 or £400 extra rating rather than fight, and the Assessment Committee is satisfied. Sometimes, if he is a strong man, he refuses to pay, and threatens in his turn to fight a battle in the Law Courts, and then he is often left alone. But, in the case of the small manufacturer, usually when he is threatened with an action he pays without further resistance. This witness says—

Mr. Winterbotham

"The appeals have been very few. There have been hundreds and hundreds of cases of appeal to the Assessment Committee, but those have only been friendly arrangements," &c.

Evidence was given before the Committee showing that machinery is often valued at such a low sum as will not justify the manufacturer in going to the cost and risk of an appeal. The Birmingham people are a law unto themselves. The Birmingham system is not to rate movable machinery, but to rate everything, fixed and movable, at 50s. per horse-power. That is a very rough-and-ready way of arriving at a result, but it is exceedingly unequal in its operation. A witness from Birmingham was asked before the Committee whether the machinery was rated on the nominal or the real horse-power, and he replied that the rating was on the nominal power, and that, as everyone knows, is, in modern engines, very different to the real horse-power, which may be double or more. The witness was asked why the Birmingham people started the idea of 50s. per horse-power, and he said it was on a Judgment of Lord Denman's in 1837. Their system really means that one manufacturer might have expensive delicate lace or jewellery machinery, and another manufacturer a brick-making machine, the former representing a value of £20,000, and the latter a value of £200, and yet both be rated on the horse-power! I come now to the latest case of all—the Chard case—being tried in the Appeal Court this day. In that case the Rating Authorities were represented by Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., who is well-known to many Members of this House. It was a particularly hard case. I have already said that Nottingham lace machinery is not rated at Nottingham. The people in this case had moved down into a country district from Nottingham. Everyone will agree that it is a great blessing for a country district to have employment for the women and children, and that the taking of a disused mill confers enormous benefit by giving the women and young people a chance of obtaining employment, and thus diminishing the general sum of pauperism. Mr. Castle was called in, and valued the building at £4,300, the fixed machinery at £1,500, and the lace machinery at £23,226, so that if the rating had been conducted in accordance with that valuation, the mill would have been rated at five times the value of the hereditament, or at £29,000 instead of £5,800. Mr. Balfour Browne, in opening the case, said the question was not whether the machinery was rateable, because clearly it was not, but whether the machinery should be taken into account in fixing the value of the buildings and manufactory. He argued that the factory was no good for the purpose intended without the machinery. Why did he not go a step further and say it was no good without the material? I do not see where the line is to be drawn. The Chairman of Quarter Sessions was afraid he smelt a rat with regard to agricultural machinery. It occurred to him that if lace machines were necessary for carrying on a lace factory, ploughs and harrows were necessary for agricultural operations. He, therefore, asked whether the value of a farm-shed would be enhanced if ploughs and harrows were put in it. Mr. Balfour Browne replied No, because the shed was only for the purpose of holding something used on the farm, "whilst the lace factory would be bought and sold as a lace factory with all the machinery in it." That is not correct. Nine-tenths of the textile factories of England are, without any structural alterations whatever, just as well fitted to manufacture silk as cotton, cotton as wool, and wool as hemp. Mr. Castle, in cross-examination, explaining how he had valued the mill, made a very singular slip. He said this was the first case of any importance he had taken since the Tyne Boiler case, but in recent times he had included similar machinery in his valuation, "unless stopped by the Assessment Committee." That is what I believe is the fact, that Assessment Committees, in the great majority of cases throughout the country, have refused to allow that to be done. As to the general practice being in conformity with our Bill, the evidence was overwhelming. Mr. Thomas Leng, the Controller of Rating in Lancashire districts, stated so. (201, 212, 274, 275.) Mr. Myles Preston distinctly said so (360 to 366, 372, 373), and so did Mr. Marshall (685-6, &c.) In fact, the evidence on the point was almost unanimous. As to the enormous increase of assessment which would ensue if the Tyne boiler case were carried out logically the evidence again was clear. One witness says (Q. 220) it would drive certain trades out of the country altogether, and that it would raise the assessment of cotton mills by 125 per cent., so that a cotton mill now rated at £3,000 would be rated at £7,500. Mr. Marshall says "(729, 730) it would more than double the rating;" and Mr. Leng, Mr. Myers, and Mr. Marshall all agreed that they would have to alter their system of rating altogether if the Tyne Boiler decision was to be carried out. Mr. Marshall (634 to 936), and Mr. Myers (634, 635), admitted that, in logical sequence, agricultural implements would have to be rated. Now, Sir, manufacturers demand nothing but justice. They demand that the law shall be as it always has been here, and as it is in Scotland. But they tell you, frankly, that if you are going to rate chattels they will insist on the same principle being applied to every bit of personalty throughout the country. Then, Sir, I come to that glorious Scotch decision. It sweeps away all the flimsy pretences under which manufacturers' tools and implements have been rated in this country. The case is that of the North-British Railway Company, and Lord Fraser delivered a most righteous judgment, in which he knocked on the head the contention that the precedent set in the English cases was good law and should be followed, and said that the only machinery that could be taken into account was that which was so fixed that it could not be detached without destruction to itself and injury and destruction to the building. I have shown the House that the first principle of the Rating Acts is to avoid taxing personalty. The personalty of the trader, what is it but the implements of his trade, his tools, and his machines. If you tax them you will have to tax all personalty alike. You will also have to withdraw the millions you now give as contributions from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local taxation, because those aids are given as the contribution from personalty, and because of local taxation being levied on realty. You will also destroy the last argument so often used (rightly or wrongly) in defence of the differential Death Duties. Now, what is the opposition to this Bill? We are opposed, of course, by overseers, who naturally want to make the net as wide as they can, and to screw up the assessments where they can. There are some landowners, no doubt, and some Railway Directors, but not all, as the hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. J. Bolton) has written to me expressing regret that he cannot come to support the Bill this afternoon. There may be among our opponents some lawyers who think it a good thing to leave the law in its present unsettled state, so as to cause a plentiful crop of litigation. I do not think the House will take the same view. Then we have the usual counsels of procrastination. There is, on the Notice Paper, a Motion by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage), which is nothing but a Motion of procrastination. But this is too serious a matter for delay. The traders of the country refuse to wait. We shall be happy to entertain any suggestions for amendment. We hope the Government will not oppose us, and we will gladly accept from them any Amendments which do not affect the principle of the Bill; but procrastinate we will not. If you wish for a new system of taxation let wealth be taxed, and not industry. Tax the honey when the bees have made it—but do not stop the making of the honey by taxing the bees. Tax the golden egg when it is laid, if you like, but do not kill the goose that lays it. I appeal to the House to pass the Bill. The traders of this country look with the greatest interest to what the House will do in this matter; for my own part, though a manufacturer, I would not have taken part in forwarding this legislation if I did not believe that the interests of labour were more bound up in it than even those of the manufacturers. Any extra tax on industry must rebound on the wages of the employed. It is true that the division of profits, as between capital and labour, are often unfair. But that is not the question here. The question is whether, if you handicap the earnings of manufacturers, you will not diminish the earnings of all classes engaged. Any tax on industry, I repeat, must re-act on wages. You cannot leave industry too free, and I appeal to the House to remove this special taxation from the manufacturing interests of the country, and to give fair play at a time when many of them are subject to severe competition. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Winterbotham

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Winterbotham.)

*(1.35.) SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I am quite sure the House must recognise the very great ability and clearness with which the arguments in support of this Bill have been stated by my hon. Friend who has just sat down, and I should not have intervened in the debate except for two reasons. In the first place, I was a member of the Committee which considered, a few years ago, what was practically the same Bill as the one now before the House; and in the second place, the Bill refers to a subject and to circumstances which are of vital importance and interest to the great industries of this country, especially those in the North of England. I will endeavour to summarise, in as short a manner as I can, the main arguments why legislation seems to be necessary, and will say at once that this Bill is an honest attempt, after very careful consideration, to provide a remedy for what we think is a grievance. At the same time, I am quite sure that the majority, if not all of those who support the Bill, and who have framed and considered it, are perfectly prepared to consider any suggestions or Amendments which may be made consistent with the principles which form the basis of the measure. I admit it is a most complicated and difficult question, and I doubt whether any Bill could be framed which would cover the whole of the question of rating. Therefore, it is quite possible that whatever Act is passed by this House there will be certain exceptions to be made. Already there are exceptions in the general law of rating, as, for instance, in the case of gas and water works and other industries, and so there may have to be other exceptions. The three reasons which influenced those who have supported the Bill are these: In the first place, the uncertainty of the law with regard to rating; secondly, the gross inequalities which exist throughout the country in the administration of this law—inequalities due very much, no doubt, to the uncertainty of the law—and, in the third place, the gradual, and, I think I may say, insidious extensions which have been made of recent years to the law as it stands, based upon judicial decisions. Whether these decisions support the extensions or not may be an open question, but at any rate they have been made, and the time has arrived when some effort must be made to put this question on a clear and equal footing. The evidence before the Committee fully proved the uncertainty of the law. We had before us a considerable number of experts, who are supposed to have studied what the law is, and yet it will be found by anyone who takes the trouble to read the evidence, that no two of the witnesses agreed as to what the principle of the law was. I will only give three specimens of these differences of opinion.

In the first place, we had placed before us the judicial decision in the Bishop Wearmouth case. The form of that decision was this:—

“That in estimating the ratable value of premises used as a manufactory, machinery and plant placed therein for the purpose of making them fit as premises for such machinery are to be taken into account as enhancing the value of the hereditaments, although they are not physically attached to the premises.”

Whatever that judgment really means in the estimation of Rating Authorities, it means that all machinery, of whatever character, whether it be small or large, must be rated, and we know that certain Rating Authorities have taken that as their text, and acted thereon. Then we come to the valuable opinion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill). He did not back up this view of the law. He took another principle, namely, that there must be adaptation in the premises in which the machine stands, or some connection with them and the machine, before that machine can be rated. But he went so far as to say that, even if an ordinary floor be altered from wood to concrete for the purpose of a single machine, a machine, which otherwise would not be rated, then became rateable, although not attached in any way, and still movable. I do not think this is a principle which can be supported by common-sense, even though it may be supported by law. In many cases within my own knowledge it is quite common in fireproof factories to put a wooden floor in order that the spinning mules—which he distinctly said in his evidence were not rateable—may be attached to that floor. In that case we should have not an adaptation of the building such as I think the hon. and learned Gentleman had in his mind, yet one which on his principle would render these mules liable to be rated. Then they had a third definition of the law given to the Committee, principally by Mr. Edmunds, the London and North-Western rating agent. He adopted a very simple principle. He did not go into the question of whether or not a building was adapted to the machinery, but said that if a machine was not driven by any motive power it was not rateable, but if it was so driven that moment it became rateable. That is another interpretation of the law which is put before the Rating Authorities, who have therefore to grope about amongst these various interpretations. One of the most important reasons for some action on the part of the House is this absolute uncertainty of the law. The hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire tried to convince the Committee that there had not been any change in the law, and that it was perfectly well understood; but while he may theoretically make out his case, practically, when we have to deal with the thousand and one circumstances in which the industries of the country are placed, we shall find there is not any satisfactory rule for the Rating Authorities to go by, and that they are bewildered by the many judicial and other decisions which have been given. The consequence is that there is an enormous inequality throughout the country in the mode in which these assessments are made. The case of Scotland has been alluded to by my hon. Friend opposite, and I would just emphasise the statement that in Scotland there is no uncertainty whatever with regard to the law. It was certain even before the judgment of Lord Fraser. There is no difficulty, because they deal with this question solely with reference to what is or is not heritable. The learned Judge said the law of Scotland was that the lands and heritages to be assessed included all machinery fixed or attached to them; but that it must be fixed in such a manner that it could not be detached from the building without destruction to itself or injury or destruction to the building. That is a principle with which the Bill is thoroughly in harmony, although it may appear to be a slight extension. There may be heavy machines in addition to engine boilers and shafting, which if removed might destroy or disturb the buildings, and in such cases my own impression is that it would be perfectly fair to rate them. If words could be devised in Committee on this Bill which would give that additional extension I, for one, would be very glad to accept them. But I believe that the cases to which it would apply would be very few indeed throughout the country. I have found amongst my notes a quotation which I have not verified from the Irish Act 23 Vic., c. 43—

Sir W. Houldsworth

"In making the valuation of any mill or manufactory or building erected or used for any such purpose the Commissioner of Valuation shall in each case value the water or other motive power thereof, but shall not take into account the value of any machinery therein, save only such as shall be erected or used for the production of motive power."

That is precisely the Bill before the House. We have therefore a clear law in Scotland and Ireland. What we want is that England also should have a clear law and more equality in the mode of making assessments throughout the country. At present the law is strained, and decisions have been given which the Rating Authorities are bound to use. We want the extensions of the law by these decisions to be stopped. I know that it is said that Lord Esher's decision does not go as far as some of the Rating Authorities contend; but it is quite evident that it means one of two things. Either it means structural fitness, in which case heavy machines on a concrete floor will not be rateable, or it means that all machines that are necessary for the trade which is being carried on will be rated. If the latter is the law then I think it is obvious it must go very much further and include the furniture of furnished houses as well as the machinery of certain industries, because the question really is this—are premises to be treated and rated as furnished or unfurnished? If Lord Esher's decision is taken in the larger sense we are treating manufactories as furnished buildings. There is no doubt that a very great change has taken place owing to this decision, and therefore it is not too early for us to call upon the House to put a stop to the great inequalities which will take place if it is acted upon. In the case of Manchester the Rating Authorities have refused to change their system or to adopt the recent decisions; but the Chorlton Union, which is really a part of Manchester, have felt bound—and nobody can blame them—to adopt those decisions. There are, therefore, two Rating Authorities in one place acting on diametrically opposite principles, and competitors in the same industries are treated on principles entirely different. This is not merely the question of a few pounds. It means a difference of twice or thrice the amount, and, as in the Chard case, even five times the amount of the assessment. These unequal burdens on competitors are manifestly unfair. Very strong evidence was given by all the Rating Authorities that they entirely disapprove these new decisions, and they have delayed putting them into operation. But that cannot go on very much longer. They are bound to the whole of the ratepayers to follow the declared law, and the Select Committee was told that they are only waiting to see what is the fate of this Bill before deciding how they will act. If this Bill is thrown out then there is no doubt these Authorities will take immediate action, and there will be a complete revolution in the system of rating throughout the country. There will probably be an immense amount of litigation unless settlements are made, simply by deciding upon a money value which those who are assessed will accept. This will not be a settlement upon principle; and a more unsatisfactory mode cannot be found than that of negotiations of this character between occupiers and the Assessing Authorities. I trust, therefore, that the Government will accept the Second Reading of the Bill. On every ground they ought to do so. I think they will clearly see the urgent call for legislation. The promoters of the Bill are not so absolutely enamoured of their own work that they believe no improvement can be made. I would be glad if, after the Second Reading, a sufficient time were given before going into Committee, so that the Amendments might be carefully considered. I am sorry the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) is unable to be present; because as far back as June, 1878, the right hon. Gentleman, who was not then a Member of the Government, called attention to this subject, and he used these words—

"There was no doubt that machinery not attached to the freehold was subject to rating in some places and not in others, whilst by a recent decision of the High Court of Justice (the Bishop Wearmouth case) all machinery, even though it be not taxed, was liable to be rated. By the law a man would be liable to be assessed not on rent alone, but on the valuation of all his machinery."

In reply to Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Selater

Booth, then President of the Local Government Board, said the question of rating was not germane to the Bill then before the House, but he would be very glad to settle the question of the rating of machinery, as well as of coal mines and of schools, and such questions should find their place in a new Rating Bill, which he should not be reluctant to introduce if he found it possible. So there was a promise from a Conservative Government in 1878 that they would look into the matter and deal with it. We have waited for 12 years, the grievance is getting worse, and cases of complaint are arising throughout the whole country. I do trust the Government will give their support and sympathy to this attempt at legislation. I do not believe, after the inquiry made by the Committee, and the consideration they gave to the Bill, that it would be possible for a Government Bill to depart very far from the lines of the measure now before us, though I do not say that it may not be improved by Amendments. I commend the Bill to the consideration of the House, and urge the House to consider it as an attempt to deal with a serious grievance, which ought to find a remedy in legislation.

*(2.20.) Mr. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I rise to move the Amendment which stands in my name, and I have to thank the hon. Member for South Birmingham (Mr. Williams) for allowing me precedence on this occasion, and for his promise to second my Motion. I should not have taken any part in this debate if it had not been for the statement, widely spread, that this Bill has in its support the authority of the Select Committee of 1887. I demur very strongly to that statement. It is quite true, as I will show, that the Bill of 1887, introduced by the hon. Baronet the Member for Banbury (Sir Bernhard Samuelson), was amended by that Committee, but it was not until quite the end of the proceedings of the Committee, and after they had passed Resolutions not in consonance with the Amendments to the Bill. I quite agree with the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division (Mr. Winterbotham) it is most desirable that this question, and many other questions connected with assessment and rating, should be dealt with, but what I object to is this question in connection with machinery being taken apart, while other questions are left untouched. We have been told of a promise of a Rating Bill made 12 years ago, and after this long period the promise remains unfulfilled, but if this Bill passes this Session, it will tend still further to defer the fulfilment of that promise. I object to losing the leverage that this question of the rating of machinery gives us. I have always considered—I am not going into the subject now—that the real solution of the whole rating question was that a revised property and income tax assessment should be taken as the basis of all rates, and I believe it will eventually come to that. But I do object to dealing with the question in this fragmentary manner. This Bill has the support of the hon. Member for Cirencester, but it is a curious fact that he is the only Member out of the six who back it who was not a Member of that Committee. I am quite ready to admit, with him, that the whole question of rating is unsatisfactory, but that was exactly the point that was taken up by the Committee in 1887, when they, having heard all the witnesses, sitting for nearly two months, and having adjourned for over six weeks to consider their Report, came to an unanimous decision to pass three Resolutions, the first of which, generally stated, was to the effect that the state of the law was unsatisfactory, and especially with regard to the rating of machinery; and then they went on to declare, in the words of my Amendment, that they believed the Bill afforded a basis for an equitable system of assessment in cases of industries depending mainly upon fixed motive power; and then the Committee expressed the opinion that the difficulties of defining a satisfactory principle of valuation for the purpose of assessment generally were so great as to render it desirable that the matter should be dealt with as part of a comprehensive scheme of local taxation. Now, that was the opinion of the Select Committee, and it was not until a fortnight after, and that when but a few Members were present, all more or less interested in the Bill under discussion, and by a majority of two, they decided, instead of reporting the Bill without Amendments, that they would take up the Bill and amend it. It was amended, and sent down to the House, more or less, in its present shape. I, therefore, say the Bill has no authority from that Select Committee whatsoever, and that is only the expression of the opinion of a minority of the majority, for only six voted for the Bill in its amended shape out of a Committee of 13. I believe if it had been understood in June that this measure was to have been dealt with in Committee, it would have come down here in a very different shape. But we—many of us—believed that the Resolutions passed were passed in absolute good faith; and that the Committee were convinced, not so much on the distinct legal decisions given from time to time, as that there would be the greatest difficulty in dealing with this question alone, apart from the general question of rating. This Bill must stand upon its own merits and not on the authority of that Committee. The whole system of rating is an anomaly, and the method of valuation differs in districts in the same county, and why, I ask, should machinery alone be dealt with? We are told that overseers are only waiting for guidance in regard to machinery; but they are waiting for guidance just as much upon other subjects besides machinery. We are told the Bill is, more or less, identical with the Bill of 1887, and that was founded on the fear of increased assessments arising out of the decision on the Tyne Boiler Works case, confirmed by the Queen's Bench. We have also had the Chard case quoted, and the opinion of Mr. Balfour Browne. I prefer to take the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, and the other learned Judges. The Master of the Rolls distinctly repudiated the idea that at any time there was a right to limit the machinery rateable to either "fixed," "attached," or "annexed." He said—

Mr. Heneage

"Things which are on the premises, all which are there for the purpose of making and make them (i.e. the premises) fit as premises for the particular purpose for which they are used, ought to be taken into account."

We have been told that the other learned Judge (Lord Justice Lindley) did not go so far as the Master of the Rolls, but we heard nothing at all about Lord Justice Lopes. He concurred in the decision and declared it was founded on "good sense" and "good law." We are fortunate, I think, in having good sense and good law going hand in hand in this matter. There is one point upon which this Bill differs from the Bill of 1887, and that is in the preamble. The preamble in the Bill of 1887—I am speaking from recollection, I have not the Bill before me—referred most distinctly to the Statute of Queen Elizabeth for the relief of the poor, by which all property locally situated and producing profit was made rateable in each parish, and, therefore, it was admitted that machinery ought to be taxed on the same principle as land, coal mines, and other property, under that Act. At that time, it should be remembered, agriculture bore the whole burden of local taxation, for it was the only industry of the country, but as soon as coal mining became a great industry, mines were taxed. In 1769, on a decision in "King v. Hogg," a house and machine rented together were adjudged to be rated together. In 1836 ironworks and machinery were adjudged to be rated to their actual value by a decision in the case "King v. Guest." Again, in 1848 in the case "Queen v. Southampton," machinery, though movable, was adjudged to be rateable if so far attached as to be appendages essential to its working, and increasing the value of the premises. These are examples of legal decisions based on the Statute of Elizabeth, that property should pay according to its ability. There was another case decided in 1866, "Queen v. Lee," in which gasworks were concerned, and the rateability of machinery which would pass to a new tenant, and was necessary for the production of gas, was declared to be judged, not by the degree of annexation, but whether it was part of the premises. I think it will be found, also, that in the case of a ship-yard, "Lavy v. Weirmouth," 1878, a steam hammer and certain tools were held to be rateable on the same principle as in the decision of "Queen v. Lee." What was the decision of Justice Lush in the case "Queen v. Lee?" In "Reg. v. Lee" Mr. Justice Lush said—

"I apprehend that the premises to be rated are to be taken as they are, with all their fixtures and appliances, by which the owner has adapted them to a particular use, and which would pass as part of the premises by a demise of them to a tenant."

Chief Justice Cockburn concurred that the machinery should be essential to the adaptation of the premises to a particular use. Therefore, I venture to say that in all these judgments the question raised has been whether there was any machinery which brought in profit to its owner, and where it was adapted for the particular business of that owner it has always been held that it was liable to be rated. I recollect the hon. Member for the Kingswinford Division of Staffordshire stating before the Select Committee that, in his opinion, the law was not altered in any way by these decisions. I think he went somewhat further, and said the Bill would not restrict the amount of machinery at present rateably assessed. It is my opinion, however, that the Bill will restrict the machinery which is, and has been for a long time, assessed to the rates, and unless this is its purpose I cannot understand why it has been introduced. As the law now stands, I hold that the dicta of the Judges has been perfectly consistent, and I am bound to say that if, instead of taking certain answers given in evidence by the valuers before the Committee, the whole tenour of their remarks is considered, you will find that they are more or less in agreement with the decisions of the Judges. The evidence of Mr. Myers has been alluded to; but the sum total of it all is that when he valued a general principle was laid down in regard to machinery that, whether it was attached or not, if it was specially adapted for the business it was liable to rating. The question of standing for the machinery forms a vital part of the Bill. The word you have to watch in it is "fixed," or, as a witness before the Committee put it, "bolted down." The Committee were informed that a great quantity of most valuable machinery is not bolted down or fixed at all, but it stands by its own weight on specially prepared beds. We have been told that the present law leads to much litigation, but this Bill, if passed, will lead to a great deal more, for it will raise many fresh difficulties. I repeat that the Judges, and the Rating Authorities, are all more or less in agreement as to the law, and the real difficulty in the matter is that there is a difference of action among those whose business it is to make the assessment. What did Mr. Marshall say? He defines rateable machinery as machinery bolted down, and when pressed he included 'cranes and machinery walled in. As to the Tyne case, all he said was that the decision went a little further than the Bishop of Wearmouth case. All the valuers called before the Committee seemed at first much frightened at the decision in the Tyne case, but their fears soon disappeared. The agent of the London and North-Western Railway Company straightforwardly told the Committee he did not consider that the decisions in either the Tyne boiler case or the Bishop Wearmouth case had extended the rateable assessment of machinery. This was the opinion of a man well versed in rating questions in half the counties of England. Therefore, I repeat that the Judges and Rating Authorities are more or less in agreement as to the law; the real difficulty is the difference of action amongst those whose business it is to make the assessment. Is there not just as much difference of opinion and action in regard to other matters than machinery that came under the cognisance of the Assessment Authorities? What we want is a comprehensive Valuation Bill, which would settle these matters once for all, whereas the effect of the Bill now proposed would be to delay the introduction of such a measure. I contend, also, that this Bill is strongly opposed to the tendency of modern legislation, which has been to extend rather than to restrict the area of rating. In recent years the principle has been extended in many directions to mines, sporting rights, underwood, lunatic asylums, Crown lands, and advertising walls, and why should the House now retrace its steps in respect to one subject alone, and relieve from rating that which has hitherto been subject to it? Moreover, it must be borne in mind that others will have to pay the rates from which the owners of machinery are sought to be relieved. Upon whose shoulders will they fall? Are the small ratepayers in the country, the agricultural labourers, or the small shopkeepers in the towns better able to bear them than the large manufacturer? I object altogether to this rating being taken off the manufacturer by this partial Bill, without knowing exactly on what other shoulders it will fall. I think the Select Committee were perfectly right when, after many weeks' consideration of the evidence brought before them, they decided that the question was one to be dealt with, not in a fragmentary way, but by a comprehensive Bill of local taxation, and I hope the debate, if it has no other effect, will hasten the introduction by the Government of the Valuation Bill which they have distinctly promised. I should like to know how hon. Members who voted for that Resolution in the Committee can justify their support of the Bill on this occasion, seeing that it only partially alters the law, and does not deal with the main question. I certainly think the present Bill is unnecessary, mischievous, and unjust to the smaller ratepayers in the country and in the towns, and that it would greatly militate against the chances of that reform in valuation assessment which taxation reformers have desired for many years. For these reasons I object to the Second Reading of the Bill, and I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, and which embodies the decision unanimously arrived at by the Committee.

Mr. Heneage

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, whilst believing that the Bill affords a basis for an equitable system of assessment in cases of industries depending mainly upon fixed motive power, is of opinion that the difficulties of defining a satisfactory principle of valuation for the purpose of assessment generally are so great as to render it desirable that the matter should be dealt with as part of a comprehensive scheme of local taxation,"—(Mr. Heneage),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(2.43.) MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): I had given notice to move the rejection of the Bill, but when I learned that the right hon. Member for Grimsby had been a Member of the Select Committee on the subject I felt no difficulty in giving way to him and contenting myself with seconding the Amendment. The hon. Member for East Gloucestershire has, in a very effective speech, described at great length the anomalies of the present system; but the task was unnecessary, and I think he was a little killing the slain, for certainly no hon. Member in any part of the House will deny that great anomalies do exist. Nor does any one say that those anomalies should not be remedied, and that there should not be uniformity throughout the Kingdom in relation to this question of rating. But this Bill seeks to give uniformity in the wrong direction. It is, in my opinion, a Bill for the relief of manufacturers, without any consideration whatever for those who will suffer if that relief is granted. It has been said that the decisions which have been given in relation to the subject are steps in the wrong direction, and that it is proposed by the Bill to remedy this. It has also been said that the decisions are doubtful; but, having read the decision in the Tyne Boiler case, I confess that it seems to me to be perfectly clear and to afford ground for practical action. Some reference has been made to the judgment delivered by Lord Justice Lindley in that case, and the hon. Member seems to think that that judgment does not altogether coincide with the judgment previously delivered by the Master of the Rolls. But Lord Justice Lindley, towards the end of his Judgment, said—

"It seems to me that the true test is that which the Master of the Rolls endeavoured to lay down."

So you have a clear meaning in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and Lord Justice Lindley agrees with it, and places his authority behind it. This question has been argued technically in the House already, and I should like to argue it practically. The hon. Member for the Cirencester Division said the effect of the decision in the Tyne Boiler case would be to double the rating of mills, and, further on in the course of his speech, he cited the Chard case, and showed to what an enormous extent the rating of a particular mill there would be raised in the event of this decision being pressed to its logical outcome. I admit that; but the hon. Member left altogether out of sight the relief which would be afforded to the other ratepayers, and this is the most important element to be taken into consideration. The present Bill proposes to exempt from rating all machinery, except fixed motive power, and I am told that under its provisions shafts, wheels, and drums will be exempted. How would such a provision affect the great city, a division of which I have the honour to represent. It would undoubtedly diminish the present rating value of Birmingham to the extent of £25,000 or £30,000. Something has been said of the practice adopted in Birmingham. Well, I am not careful to defend that practice. But it does not profess to be an accurate system. The plan adopted there is an arrangement or compromise, which has been acted upon without dispute, as between the Rating Authority and the manufacturers whose machinery is rated. Undoubtedly the system has been productive of good practical results. Each nominal horse-power is taken at £2 10s. per horse per annum, and that is believed to include the value of the fixed or unfixed or removable machinery which is worked from the engine so rated. It is believed that the system has worked fairly well in the interests of all concerned. If, by passing this Bill, the rating value of Birmingham is reduced by £25,000 or £30,000 the burden will, of course, fall upon the shopkeepers and householders. This means that a sum of about £8,000, now paid in the rates by the manufacturers of Birmingham, will be levied on the other contributors to the rates. I maintain that that is a step entirely in the wrong direction, and, if adopted, it would inevitably lead to an increase of rents to small occupiers. By the introduction of machinery you make employment more scarce, yet you are asked to exempt from rates that machinery, and to put heavier burdens on the people, who find it more difficult to get employment because of the use of the machinery. I believe the result in the case of Birmingham would be to throw an extra 1½d. rate on the already overweighted shopkeepers, and, on their behalf, I protest against the proposal. The Motion which I have put on the Paper is directed against the principle of the Bill, which, I think, is a wrong principle. In my opinion it is a principle which a Radical House of Commons would not be disposed to accept. In the United States of America not only house property and rent, but also chattels are rated, and unquestionably the tendency of things is in that direction here. If this Bill passes something will be done to contradict the principle, and, therefore, I hope the House will accept the Amendment moved by my right hon. Friend.

*(258.) MR. MOWBRAY (Lancashire, Prestwich): As a member of the Select Committee, I desire to say a few words in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby. It is perfectly true, as he has told us, that a Resolution was passed in the Committee to the effect that it was desirable that this matter should be dealt with as a comprehensive scheme. But another Resolution was also carried with equal unanimity to the effect that it was clear that the system acted upon by valuers varied in different parts of the country, and they recommended fresh legislation on the subject. The Committee also unanimously passed a Resolution that, in the meantime, it was desirable that the Rating Authorities should not depart from their present system. The system of assessment has since that been materially altered by the valuers and Rating Authorities, and, therefore, apart from anything else, we are justified in pressing the importance of this subject upon the House. Although we voted for the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby in 1887, yet in 1890 we are no nearer a comprehensive solution of the question than we were in 1887. Judging from the favourable cheers with which the speeches of hon. Members have been received to-day, in favour of the Bill, I venture to think that the feeling of the House is against an Amendment of the procrastinating character moved by the right hon. Gentleman. The only point which the House has to consider is this. We are not asking for any special exemption of machinery from liability to rating. We are only asking in this Bill, that the principle which is believed by the majority of valuers to govern rating shall be declared by this House to be the law of the land. It is not a preposterous proposition that it is the duty of this House to make the law of the land clear and intelligible. In spite of the very able arguments and evidence of the hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire, the Rating Authorities are still in very much doubt as to what are the true principles to be deduced from the decisions of the Judges. This Bill lays down clear and definite directions, which no Rating Authority will have very much difficulty in putting into force. We have been told that the law has not been altered by recent decisions. I am perfectly ready to admit that, if you like, but I say that the practice will be altered, and in support of that, I refer to the evidence given before the Committee of the House of Commons by Mr. Myers, of Preston. Asked whether, in the Bishop Wearmouth case, looms had not been considered furniture, he replied—

Mr. Powell Williams

"Yes, I quite agree with that.

"From that you would judge that they did not intend to include looms, would you not?"

"Yes, certainly."

So much for the law laid down in the Bishop Wearmouth case.

"But your opinion is, is it not, that under the Tyne boiler case they would be bound to include looms?"

What is his answer to that?—

"Yes.

"And all similar machines?"

"Yes, and all similar machines—mules, carding machines, would all have to come in."

Then he was asked by the hon. Member for Stirlingshire whether, if the decision in the boiler case were carried out, it would not require that everything should be included—

"Yes; that is my belief."

That is exactly the evidence which was given by almost every witness who came before the Committee. Whether the law has been altered or not does not matter, because there is no doubt whatever that the views of the people who act under that law have been altered, and that is what we have to deal with. The Rating Authorities are altering their principle of assessment, and what will be the result? That we shall have heavy and expensive appeals, at great cost to the Rating Authorities, and at great cost to the people upon whom these new rates are placed. It is our duty as Representatives of the constituencies to do what we can to prevent this accession of costs, and to put the law upon a plain and intelligible footing, and that, I believe, is done by the Bill before the House. One word with regard to what has been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham. I do not want to go into the system of rating in Birmingham, beyond saying that it seems that Birmingham has made a law of its own, which is not laid down by the learned Judges. It is not the law as enforced in other parts of the country. Although Birmingham may be perfectly well satisfied with the Law of Rating as it at present exists, I venture to remind the hon. Gentleman that his constituents will find their position very materially altered in many cases if the decision in the Tyne Boiler case is put into operation. With regard to what he said about throwing on the general ratepayers of Birmingham a burden now borne by manufacturing industries, I do not know how far that may be true of Birmingham, but as regards industries in other parts of the country, the practice has not, up to now, been to rate machinery in the way in which it will be rated in future if this Tyne Boiler case is carried out. The change, if it is made, will press very heavily, not only upon the manufacturing industries, but upon the working classes who are employed in those industries. You may say what you like with regard to diminishing the rates of other people; but if you put this additional 125 per cent. on to the mills of Lancashire, you will go far to impose a burden which the industry is unable to bear. I would remind the House that if you put a burden of that kind upon a particular industry the tendency will inevitably be to drive the trade over the border or into foreign countries. If you stop the mills of Lancashire you will not only take money out of the pockets of the wealthy classes of that region, but you will deprive working men of their labour and drive them to the workhouse, where they will be a greater burden to the other ratepayers than anything that would fall upon them by reason of any definition of the law such as this Bill proposes. I venture to trust that the House will not be misled by the arguments which have been adduced to it, and that it will support the Second Reading of this Bill.

*(3.12.) MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton): Sir, the constituency which I have the honour to represent is one especially interested in this question. I have been asked to represent the feelings of large manufacturers, and I desire to say a few words in relation to the Bill which has been introduced by my hon. Friend. We are not discussing the abolition of a tax. There has been hitherto a comparatively uniform practice throughout the country, and the rating of premises devoted to manufacturing industries has hitherto been on a certain fixed principle. That principle has been recently interfered with, and certain alterations have been made during the last three or four years. And there has arisen in the minds of manufacturers generally throughout the country that eventually all machinery employed for manufacturing purposes is henceforth to be taxed in the same way as machines that are fixed. It is thought that system will be followed after the decision in the Tyne Boiler case. In my own constituency the chief industry is that of engineering and machine making, although there are some textile manufacturers in that district. Owing to the decision in the Tyne Boiler case this new practice is beginning to spread very rapidly; it is becoming the actual fact with regard to the industry with which I am connected, namely, that everything connected with the premises in which these manufactures are carried on, even to the smallest tool fixed to the bench, or lying on the bench, is already taxed by the assessors of that district. And they hold that the justification of that course is to be found in the decision in the Tyne Boiler case. If that is to be the interpretation of the law, I would ask any sensible man where are we to stop? What industry will escape from this terrible enactment, which, I venture to say, has nothing whatever to do with the wealth or poverty of the manufacturers, but simply is a question of justice. The industries of this country are not carried on solely for the benefit of certain gentlemen who call themselves employers or manufacturers. They are carried on for the benefit of the whole country, and the working classes are more intimately connected with those industries than perhaps any other class of the community. Take my own works, in the town of Salford, which is practically one with Manchester. I have a pretty considerable engineering establishment in Salford, and I pursue my business with perfect immunity from all those taxes. But at Openshaw, only two or three miles away, my competitors are taxed down to the smallest machine tools. This is a gross injustice which would not be tolerated for a moment were there not some strange ambiguity about the law which neither Judges, assessors, or valuers understand. It is evident to those who have read the Report of the Committee that confusion becomes worse confounded as the witnesses are examined at greater and greater length. If you want to get at the state of confusion in which the Committee found itself you have only to refer to the Resolution which my hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) has brought under our notice. I do urgently appeal to the House to take this matter into consideration as quickly as possible. The prevalent custom throughout the country is that premises for manufacturing purposes shall be valued according to the purposes for which it is intended. An exception, owing to the uncertainty of the law, is the case of the works to which I have alluded at Openshaw. Those works are taxed to the smallest machine, and yet, during the next three months, the whole of the machinery could be sold by auction and adapted to the purposes of some other business or manufacture, thus showing that the walls, and roofs, and windows, with engine power, are alone absolutely essential to the carrying on of any particular trade in those premises. Indeed, it is almost impossible to conceive a case, except such as a gas works or some such industry, where a special kind of structure has to be incorporated with the machinery, where this observation does not apply. Empty any one of the cotton mills of Lancashire of its looms and spindles, and it would be capable of being used for some other purpose. I have a large building, which was formerly used as a woollen mill in my own works, and it is most admirably adapted, without the slightest alteration, to the purposes of a machine shop. You see, consequently, how we get landed in serious difficulties when we consider that the value of certain premises is enhanced simply because of the character of the machinery which it contains. I should like, for a moment, to allude to what has been said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby in relation to the question of relieving wealthy manufacturers and capitalists, at the cost of other ratepayers, who are well able to take care of themselves and who have always plenty of money. In my opinion the history of the manufactures of this country proves the very opposite of this; at any rate, in the North of England, with which I am acquainted, the manufacturers pursue their business with the desire to maintain their industry and give their employés the largest amount of work at the highest rate of wages they can possibly pay. The whole history of the industries of Lancashire and Yorkshire goes to show that employers feel the greatest pride in the continual promotion of the interests of their workpeople, so as to enable them to live in better houses, and, as far as possible, to attain a greater amount of happiness in their everyday life. But, if owing to the peculiar interpretation put upon the law, the manufacturers are to be subjected to a greater burden than heretofore — a burden which, perhaps, may not be imposed on competitors, say, in an adjoining county — then I say that such a course is unjust, and contrary to the true spirit of the law; and that, whatever may be the prosperity of the individual manufacturer, or body of manufacturers, they have a right to see, and are bound to see, that such legislation is passed as will make the burdens imposed on the industries of this country just and uniform, and as will remove such inequalities as are now complained of. The only desire of the manufacturers, whether engaged in the production of textile fabrics, the manufacture of iron, the bleaching of calico, or in any other industry, is to do equal justice to all. If this House declares that all implements and tools shall be taxed we shall have no complaint to make; but, at the present moment, that is not the case. The case of Birmingham is not in any way a representative one. There they absolutely traverse the law, and say they have nothing to do with valuing machinery, boilers, or engines, but simply take engines of a certain horse-power, on which 50s. per annum has to be paid. The practice of Birmingham is not in conformity with the law, and does not affect the state of things in operation elsewhere, under which, over an area of probably five square miles, we have some manufacturers taxed to the uttermost extent, while others in the same locality are entirely exempt. This Bill will in no way interfere with the entire question of valuation being dealt with at a subsequent period; but we say that, in the meantime, the grievance to which attention is being called to a certain extent paralyses the industry of the North of England. I trust, therefore, the House will take the matter into its serious consideration to-day, and consent to the Second Reading of this Bill. When the Bill gets into Committee the House can impose such safeguards as will prevent various interests which have hitherto been protected from being injuriously affected by the operation of the measure. As the matter stands at present it is quite clear that there is danger that the industries of the North will be interfered with in a manner wholly inimical to their best interests, and the House is now asked to hasten to alleviate an evil which has already given rise to the greatest discontent.

Mr. Mather

*(3.25.) MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham): Sir, I represent a town which, almost more than any other, is affected by this Bill, and I, therefore, feel it necessary to ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly state the opinion of the Nottingham manufacturers in regard to this question. This is a subject of vital importance to the trade of Nottingham. The trade of that place is already sufficiently handicapped by foreign competition, although their movable machines—used in the lace and hosiery trades—are at present not rated; but if this Bill is not passed, and it is rendered liable to this rating of machinery, the trade of Nottingham will be driven out entirely. I would point out that, instead of this Bill bringing hardship upon the working men, the extra burdens that will otherwise be imposed will assuredly have the effect I have stated, and the result will be that the working men of Nottingham and the thousands of girls employed in the factories, will lose their present employment, while ruin and suffering will be brought home to them and their families. The case of Birmingham has been alluded to, but we do not want to follow the lead of Birmingham in this matter. Birmingham is very good with regard to Imperial matters, but we are not inclined to follow it in the matter of rating, as to which it seems to be altogether an anomaly. The Nottingham Chamber of Commerce supports this Bill. A few weeks ago I attended a meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, held in London, and at that meeting a resolution was proposed in favour of this measure. That resolution was carried without a single dissentient voice. What, I ask, will be the result if the House refuses to pass this Bill? Where will the line be drawn in future? At sewing machines perhaps? But there are different kinds of "sewing" machines. There are the sowing and mowing machines used in agriculture, and I would warn hon. Members representing agricultural constituencies that if movable machines come to be rated, it will soon be their turn to have burdens imposed on the scientific implements of agriculture. This Bill is merely a defining Bill—a settling Bill—and contains no innovation or alteration of the law as formerly interpreted. It simply proposes the adoption of the old principle that what is fixed to the premises shall be rated, but that what is removable shall not be rated. We want this matter settled without any further delay, and, for my part, I have great pleasure in voting for the Second Reading of this Bill.

*(3.28.) MR. STAVELEY HILL (Kingswinford): I do not intend to enter on a long speech in answer to the hon. Member for Cirencester (Mr. Winterbotham), still less, to use his own expression, do I intend "to wallow in any legal discussion." I desire, as briefly as I am able, to lay before the House my views on the question which we have to decide. The matter which has been put before the House as the reason for bringing forward this Bill is simply this: Doubts have arisen as to how far machinery is to be taken into consideration in the process of rating, and it is this point with which the Bill proposes to deal: But, whatever may be the object of the Bill, it must necessarily be the consequence that if this measure is passed a considerable quantity of machinery will be exempted from the area of rateability, and the rates formerly paid in respect of the machinery so rated must fall on other kinds of property. It was on this point that Mr. Clark spoke with reference to Birmingham. Birmingham has been spoken of as having a law to itself, but if we only look and see what is done in Birmingham, in regard to rating, there is no such thing as a Birmingham-created law, but Birmingham has taken, as I think, a very excellent way of rating machinery. Instead of taking the value of the machinery at its cost or its structural value, and putting upon it $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the assessment has been made at the rate of 50s. per horse power, so that the rateable value of a 100 horse-power machine would be £250 a year, instead of going to the trouble of finding out the capital value and getting $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon it, and this figure includes all the machinery worked by the power. By this means, so far from exempting machinery the rate is raised on machinery, as Mr. Clark has shown in his evidence. The value of the machinery is put at a higher rate, he says, if taken at 50s. per horse-power than if taken at $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the market value. Mr. Clark being asked as to the result if the Bill passed, said that £5,300, from which the owners of machinery would be freed, would have to be spread over the whole rateable value and that £5,000 represented about a penny rate.

MR. POWELL WILLIAMS: In the parish of Birmingham?

*MR. STAVELEY HILL: Yes, in the parish of Birmingham. So then it comes to this upon the witness's showing, that £5,000 taken out of the area of rateable value, this liability from which you release the larger machine owners would fall upon the smaller men. You cannot get out of that.
Mr. Staveley Hill

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman state whether, from the evidence, I am not right in saying the difference would be between 6s. 7d. and 6s. 8d. to all the rate-payers?

*MR. STAVELEY HILL: It may be so as a matter of calculation, but it does not so appear in the evidence. It would come to an increase of the rates all over the parish of Birmingham to the extent of a penny or three half-pence. Now, that being so, what is put forward as the reason for this Bill? It is suggested that the Bill gives effect to the recommendations of the Committee of the House, which considered the question in 1887, notwithstanding which recommendations it is said Rating Authorities are seeking by harassing litigation to further increase the burden upon the use of machinery. Now, first of all in that Committee, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) has said, every witness and the answer to every question made the prospect of the Bill more hopeless, until at last the hon. Baronet the Member for Banbury (Sir Bernhard Samuelson) appeared to be willing to give up his Bill, and to accept the Resolution now put forward by the right hon. Member for Grimsby. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray) rather altered the actual state of things by reading the Resolutions in a different order to that in which they were passed. The first Resolution acknowledged the difficulties arising from there being no definition of the rating practice, and upon that followed the Resolution put forward now as an Amendment that there should be a general system and a general Rating Bill brought in to alter the whole state of things. If we are to take the authority of the Committee, it certainly was not in favour of the Bill; for the further examination of the Bill stood over for three weeks or a month.

*MR. MOWBRAY: The hon. and learned Gentleman will find that the Resolution was passed on June 28th, and on the 5th July the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby moved that the Bill should be reported without amendment. That was negatived by a considerable majority in the Committee.

*MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): And the Committee reported that the Bill, as amended, would meet the case of industries depending mainly upon motive power.

*MR. STAVELEY HILL: On the 28th June the Resolution was passed, and July 5th was the next meeting, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby moved that the Bill be reported without amendment. This was negatived by six to four. Those hon. Members who have just risen to correct me were energetic supporters of the Bill and desirous of going on with the Amendments.

*MR. MOWBRAY: I recollect that it was put to us that if we reported the Bill without amendment it was tantamount to saying that the Bill should not be proceeded with during the Session. Therefore, in voting against the Resolution, we were in favour of discussing and amending the Bill before returning it to the House.

*MR. HENEAGE: My Motion was founded on the understanding implied in the other Resolutions, that the Bill should not proceed further. It was a formal Resolution, and I regret that it was negatived.

*MR. STAVELEY HILL: In our view it was negatived by a small majority at a meeting when many of us were absent, for we had ceased to take any interest in the Bill at all. Now, the next suggestion in this Memorial which has been circulated by the promoters of this Bill is that the Bill will assimilate the system in England to the settled practice in Scotland. But that is not the fact, as the evidence will show. The evidence of Messrs. Nesbit and Munro will show that it is by no means a settled practice in Scotland. Mr. Nesbit said it would be a good thing to get a proper definition of machinery fixed or attached, and that it was a general feeling among assessors that what is held to be heritage in succession should be further defined, and he showed there was much difference of opinion. Mr. Munro, in his evidence, said, in the interest of machine owners, the Bill was undoubtedly most desirable. I do not propose to go at length into the comments upon my evidence made by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Winterbotham); but let me say, shortly, that the case for the Bill is, that there is doubt with reference to the present condition of the Rating Law. It is said there have been considerable changes effected by the decision in the Tyne Boiler case. Now, I do not know that it is very complimentary to the three learned Judges in the Court of Appeal to suppose that they have altered the law. We are generally accustomed to suppose that learned Judges are not the men who wilfully go against the law as enunciated in a series of decisions, and yet this is put before us in argument. These decisions have been going on for some three centuries, ever since the passing of the Statute of Elizabeth, with a certain developing, without alteration, until at last in the Tyne case and in the Bishop Wearmouth case, we are said to have three bad Judges altering the law. The law as laid down by Lord Esher and those who sat with him, that "Things which are on the premises to be rated for the purpose of making, and do make, the premises fit for the purpose for which they are used ought to be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value of such premises."

This is said to be an alteration of the law; but my hon. Friends may remember the decision of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, which cannot be distinguished from the law as laid down by the Master of the Rolls to the effect that so long as machinery was kept in position, and added to the value of the freehold premises, it ought to be paid for. It is said again that advantage has been taken of the Wearmouth case and the Tyne Boiler case decisions, by valuers to go up and down the country harassing ratepayers by litigation and raising points that are only profitable to surveyors and lawyers. This was the prophecy made shortly after the Tyne Boiler case was decided, but the prophecy has not been fulfilled. Let me for a moment call attention to the special Report of the Committee, for it rather places the Bill in a different position to that in which it has been placed by those who have introduced it. When the Committee had gone through the whole of the evidence, then, without going into the question whether the law had been altered by recent decisions, the Committee declared their opinion that the system acted upon by valuers had varied considerably, and the practice, in the absence of legislation, would in many cases be materially affected in the future. Then the Committee went on to express the opinion that the Bill would, if amended, meet the case of those industries, depending mainly upon fixed motive power; and the Committee agreed, therefore, to report the Bill as amended to the House. Well, but is there no question to be raised on the definitions in the new Bill? It is very well to say that words may be altered or introduced in Committee, but we must give those who framed the Bill the credit for having made choice of the best words they could use, and no doubt they have taken the best advice they could avail themselves of. The Bill says—

“From and after the passing of this Act in estimating for the purpose of assessment to the rates upon property rateable to the relief of the poor, the annual value of the machinery in this section specified upon such tenement or premises shall be taken into consideration; that is to say—first, water wheels, steam, gas, air, and electric machines, steam boilers, and all other fixed motive powers, and the fixed appurtenances thereof; secondly, shafts, wheels, drums, and other fixed power machinery which transmits the action of motive power to other machinery, fixed or loose.”

Are these words sufficient? Is no question to be raised as to the meaning of the expression “fixed appurtenances thereof and fixed motive power?” I venture to say that no words in the Statute of Elizabeth or any Act passed since are more difficult of construction. You are going by this Bill to discharge from the rates all cranes, weigh-bridges, and machines of that character. Is that fair? Is it fair that the owner of a small engine should be rated upon that, but not the man with a weighing-machine, out of which he makes considerable profit? The Bill will inflict great injustice on the small ratepayers. Then we have been told of the Chard case, where disused premises were being fitted with machinery by a manufacturer to the great advantage of the people in the district, but that the owner was harassed by the imposition of rates on this machinery. The hon. Member for Cirencester read, with greatunction, the argument addressed to Quarter Sessions by counsel whose ability I do not for a moment doubt, who was engaged on behalf of the Rating Authority. But surely this argument of counsel is not to be taken as indicative of the way in which judgment will go, and the case has not yet been decided by a Divisional Court, and it may perhaps be carried to the Court of Appeal, and even to the House of Lords. It shows the absolute poverty of my hon. Friend's resources in regard to finding evidence of the hostility of Rating Authorities towards machinery owners that this is the single case to which he has directed attention. Though I have been quoted at considerable length, and though I could find a good deal to answer under this part of the able speech of the hon. Member for Cirencester, I will not trouble the House further. I hope the Bill will not be carried, for I hold the view that the area of rateability should not be limited, and those who can afford to pay should not be free from their liability.

Mr. Staveley Hill

*(3.50.) MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): I do not think there is much force in the observation that my hon. Friend's pointed reference to the argument of the counsel in the Chard case indicates the poverty of his resources, but rather, I think, we may infer poverty in the resources of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. The importance and the danger of the argument of the learned counsel referred to lies in the fact that after using that argument he had the decision of the Court in his favour. I will only detain the House a few minutes while I express my determination to support the Bill on the ground that it is an attempt by legislation, and in the form of a Declaratory Bill, to remove from the industries of this country what all Members will agree is detrimental to the industrial interests—the uncertainty which now overhangs them. I wish to disclaim the insinuation which is made by some hon. Members that this Bill is brought in as an attempt on the part of manufacturers to evade the legitimate charges that ought to be made upon them for local purposes. I do not urge that manufacturers generally ought to be regarded as occupying that elevated place which the hon. Member for Gorton (Mr. Mather) has assigned to them, but they are free from liability to any just charge of an attempt to evade legitimate obligations. No doubt the history of legal decisions has shown a gradual extension of the area of rateability; and the tendency, following on the decision in the Tyne Boiler case and indicated in the action of the valuator in the Chard case, is to carry out the extension to the bitter end. I support the Bill because it is a Declaratory Bill, and not one for altering what I conceive to be the intention of Parliament. It is a Declaratory Bill with the purpose of limiting that over-widening of the area of rateability which has resulted from successive decisions of Judges. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) says that in the evidence of the witnesses before the Committee, and in the action of the Rating Authorities, there is more or less of uniformity, and I may agree with him, but in the sense that there is more of the less and little of the more. There is in the evidence an extreme divergence of opinion as to what is and what is not rateable. The right hon. Gentleman finds underlying the Bill the principle of taking off from those now rated a large portion of their liability. I repudiate that argument altogether. The intention of the Bill is not to declare off from rateability that which is now liable, but to guard against the increasing liability which seems to be threatening us in the future. The hon. Member for South Birmingham (Mr. Williams) has referred to the fact that in that city a successful plan has been adopted which avoids all litigation by assessing the motive power, including machinery, at 50s. per horse-power. Will it be surprising to the hon. Member to know that in Yorkshire, without pretending to assess machinery in that way, that is the very charge made so that all the arguments used as to the immense difference between Birmingham and other districts come to nothing! It has been said that the exclusion of machinery would raise the rates in Birmingham from 6s. 8d. to 6s. 9d.; but the fact is, that the adoption of the assessment of 50s. per horse power, as in Yorkshire and other districts, would cause the continuance of the rates exactly as they are now. It appears to me that the incidence of the taxation under the plan adopted in Birmingham must be very unequal, because there must be a great difference in the value of machinery adapted to different purposes, and, in some cases, you will have heavy and inexpensive machinery included at the same rate as delicate and intricate machinery in other cases. It is quite clear that limitations and definitions are, more or less, attended with difficulty, but, notwithstanding the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken, the Bill defines by an easy and feasible method what shall be the limits of rateability, and, I think, these limits are fixed on the general principle that freehold inheritances shall be assessed, and that machinery and chattels shall be exempted. In the case of Insurance Companies, this discrimination is made between the inheritance and machinery and chattels. The line of demarcation in the Bill follows that laid down in Section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, where all that is to be regarded as part of the heritage is set out and described in three classes, and the division in that Act is identical with the terms of the Bill now before the House. It is a happy coincidence that the Bill of Sales Act, which draws a limit between what are chattels and what is attached to the heritage, should be identical in terms to the delimitation which is proposed in this Bill. I think that if the Bill be defeated and the practice with which we are now threatened on the part of the Rating Authorities is continued, we shall not be able to stop even at the very broad line which is laid down by the Tyne Boiler case. We shall never arrive at any principle until we decide that all chattels shall be rateable, because it seems to me that if in the case of a mill the machinery in it is to be rateable, so in the case of a restaurant or hotel all the appointments ought also to be rateable, and in the case of a residence all the furniture, and in the case of a farm all the agricultural and farming implements. It has been said, in opposition to the Bill, that machinery ought to be made rateable because it reduces manual labour. If, by the introduction of machinery into a manufactory employing 1,200 hands, 200 are thrown out of employment, it is hard upon the 200, but still the 1,000 are greatly benefited, inasmuch as they may have their employment assured to them for a longer period than they otherwise would. Those who are practically acquainted with manufacturing know that the repair and renewal of machinery—the keeping up with the times—is a source of very great expenditure and diminution of profit to the manufacturer. It is, indeed, essential for the supremacy of the industry of this country that the machinery used should not have added to it any additional embargo or burden. I hope, therefore, this Bill will be passed, and the country, and manufacturers in particular, will be relieved from the uncertainty which now attaches to the condition of the law.

(4.5.) MR. WALTER JAMES (Gateshead): As the representative of an important constituency in the North of England which will be largely affected if this Bill passes into law, I must say I cannot quite see why I should support it. The case relating to the Tyne has been mentioned in the course of the discussion, and no doubt there has been a considerable opposition from that quarter to these proposals which have, for many years, been before Parliament. The Bill was brought in last year, and I thought it my duty, at a quarter before 6 o'clock one Wednesday evening, to intercept its further progress. I think my action caused some little annoyance to my hon. Friend the Member for the Cirencester Division (Mr. Winterbotham), but I imagine that, after the great divergence of opinion which has been expressed this afternoon in regard to the provisions of the Bill, he will agree with me that it is hardly a Bill the Second Reading of which ought to be passed without discussion. The two chief cases which have been referred to were not cases prompted by the valuation of the Local Authorities; but I think that some 15 or 16 years ago there was a general feeling in the North of England that many of the large manufacturing industries which had contributed so much to the prosperity of the district had not contributed their fair share or quota to local taxation. Now, the only point which I, as a layman, regard as of great importance is, that if you shift the burden as suggested, you, to some extent, break faith with the Local Authorities. These sums of money, which have been raised on the security of the rates, you will take from one interest and give to another. That appears to me a very important point, and I ask the Government, when they come to speak on the Bill, to give special attention to it. It is clear that if you shift the burden from the shoulders of the manufacturers you put it, in great part, on the shoulders of the small property owners. Take the case of my own constituency. If you diminish the rates you add to the wages of the working classes. That is all very true, but I hope the House will remember that there is one thing which is necessary to the workman in addition to his wages, and that is his home. These property owners are the owners of the houses of the working classes, and if you burden the owners with taxation you diminish, materially, the comfort and prosperity of the working classes. The rates in my constituency are extremely high—as much as 6s. in the £1, and if the property owners feel themselves burdened with increased taxation no improvement need be expected in the homes of the people, and the probability also is that the rent will be increased. I do not think that this is exactly the time for a change of the kind proposed. Certainly, so far as the North of England is concerned, this is not the time for the initiation of this kind of legislation. If anyone will go down the Tyne upon one of the penny steamers and notice the prosperity of the districts, he will quite understand the point I am urging. I think that the aim of this Bill should be taken into account when the whole question of valuation comes to be dealt with by the Government. That will be the time when this exceedingly complicated question can most properly be dealt with by Parliament.

Mr. Oldroyd

*(4.10.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax) : I am sure the House will admit that we have had a most interesting and instructive debate, and it occurs to me that the time is approaching when we may ask the Government for some expression of opinion. I cannot but express my great regret at the absence—I fear on account of indisposition—of the President of the Local Government Board. We know he is familiar with all these questions, and we are aware that he always approaches questions of this kind in a wise and impartial spirit. But I am reconciled to the fact of his absence by the knowledge that the Secretary to the Local Government Board is present, who has displayed his ability on many occasions, and who is backed up by a Department which is second to none in the State for its industry and capacity, and which is particularly fitted to advise upon legal points its representatives in this House. Now, the case for the Bill is the uncertainty of the law. I cannot agree with the hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) that there is no uncertainty in the law, nor can I admit that the judgment of Lord Esher in the Tyne case is free from doubt or difficulty. The hon. Member for Cirencester (Mr. Winterbotham) has spoken with his usual vigour and clearness, and the hon. Member for Manchester (Sir W. Houldsworth) has justly urged, in support of the Bill, the uncertainty of the law and the still greater uncertainty in the practice. We have a superabundance of evidence on that subject. The practice differs, we have been told, in Manchester and in the immediate neighbourhood of Manchester. The hon. Member for the Gorton Division (Mr. Mather) told us that within four miles of his works there are manufacturers who are subject to a rating which he escapes, because the Assessment Committees interpreted the law in different ways. That is an inequality and an injustice which ought to be remedied. The hon. Member opposite

(Sir W. Houldsworth) told us, and he apparently spoke with authority, that many Rating Authorities are waiting for the decision of the House upon this measure, and that if the measure is rejected the immediate consequence will be a crop of excessive assessments, which will lead, no doubt, to further inequalities, and further injustice and litigation. Let me point out to the House a practical inequality. I have referred to it in the case of Manchester and neighbourhood. But we know that the law in Scotland differs from the law as it is being interpreted and extended in this country. The law in Scotland is, practically speaking, the same as the proposers of this Bill wish the law in England to become. But we have been told by the hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Houldsworth) that he believes the law in Ireland is also of the same character as is now desired. So far as we are at present informed the fact is, that in Ireland and Scotland manufacturers are at an advantage, and will be at a still greater advantage in the future than manufacturers in England, unless the Bill is passed. I do not like the notion of legislation by judicial decision. If it is brought home to us that the condition of the law is uncertain, and works with inequality and injustice, I maintain we are not doing our duty if we say we will not interfere in the matter, but leave it to the parties affected to fight the question out in the Courts. The evil of the present state of things is admitted, and, therefore, Parliament ought to set to work to find a remedy. In passing, let me say that this Bill is supported by a variety of large interests in different parts of the country. The hon. Member for South Birmingham (Mr. J. P. Williams), who opposed the Bill, is understood to speak in the name of Birmingham, but only to-day I learned that the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce supports the Bill. Now, there are two methods of dealing with the evil. One method is to pass a general Bill laying down the principles of rating applicable to all hereditaments or properties, and the other is to pass such a Bill as this. I do not think it is worth while entering in detail into the question of the difference of opinion amongst the Members of the Committee of 1887, but I think it well to point out that while my right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) proposes to-day—

“That this House, whilst believing that the Bill affords a basis for an equitable system of assessment in cases of industries depending mainly upon fixed motive power, is of opinion that the difficulties of defining a satisfactory principle of valuation for the purpose of assessment generally are so great as to render it desirable that the matter should be dealt with as part of a comprehensive scheme of local taxation.”

In Committee, on the 28th of June, he admitted, in a Resolution he moved, that it is clear from the evidence that the system acted upon by valuers in different parts of the country has varied considerably, and that the practice in many cases will be materially affected in the future. The right hon. Gentleman recommended legislation, and I find that, on the same occasion, a Motion was carried, with the right hon. Gentleman's assent, that it is desirable that, in the meantime, the various Rating Authorities should not depart from the present system of assessment. My right hon. Friend really wanted the Assessment Committees to hold their hands, but I want to know how is he to get them to hold their hands if they get hold of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. I ask the Government whether they are prepared to at once bring in a general Bill dealing with the principles of rating as applicable to all the subject matter of rateability? I do not imagine they are. If they are not, I contend they will undertake serious responsibility if they decline to avail themselves of this opportunity of legislating in this particular instance. Certainly I do not see why the Government should object to the Second Reading of this Bill, seeing that they would retain absolute freedom of action in Committee. They know perfectly well that this is not a Party question, and I believe that, in Committee, we may be able to shape the Bill so that it will be generally acceptable, and at the same time redress a considerable and growing grievance.

* (4.30.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The hon. Mr. Stansfeld

Member who moved the Second Reading of this Bill expressed regret that the task had not fallen into abler hands. Similarly, owing to the regretted absence of the President of the Local Government Board, I may myself be allowed to express my own regret that the task of replying on behalf of that Department on this question has devolved upon me, for it is admitted, both in the discussion we have had to-day and in the evidence given before the Select Committee, to which reference has been made, that this is one of the most difficult and complicated questions it is possible to ask Parliament to decide. I hope that if I make any reference to remarks that have been made in this House or to evidence which has been given before the Select Committee on the part of the manufacturing interest—which may seem almost impertinent as coming from a man who has no practical experience of the industries affected—hon. Members will acquit me of desiring to offer more than legitimate criticism of the views advanced on both sides of the House in relation to this question. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who has made one of those fair and kindly speeches which he is accustomed to make in this House, was good enough to invite me to tell the House what the opinion of the Department is as to the legal question. Well, I do not approach the task of giving expression to a legal opinion with any great amount of satisfaction. We have had a legal argument to-day, and the hon. and learned Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) has given the House the benefit of his legal opinion, and told it that the law has not been altered by recent decisions. The opinion of the Department is that there has not been a variation in the law, but that there is evidence to show that there is some variation in the application of the law. But what have been the arguments addressed to the House in support of the Second Reading? They have not been based upon grievances already existing. No long list of cases has been given in which manufacturers have been unfairly rated. No manufacturer has ventured to say that manufacturing industry has been depressed in consequence of unfair or undue rating. The hon. Member for the Gorton Division of Lancashire (Mr. Mather) has told us that the manufacturers appear here to-day, not so much as men of business, but rather as philanthropists desiring the good of those with whom they are connected. Well, I am quite certain every word the hon. Member said is absolutely true. I am convinced that the manufacturers desire that their workmen shall in every way be properly housed and properly treated; but still I have a suspicion that with the manufacturers, as with the agriculturists, the question of profit does sometimes enter into their calculations. Hon. Gentlemen who support the Second Reading have not spoken of the manufacturing industry as suffering under grievances at the present time. What they tell the House is, that the result of certain decisions is that Assessment Committees and Rating Authorities are about to effect a change which will do great injury to manufacturing industries in the future. Witnesses on the side of the Rating Authorities said before the Committee of 1887 that they had not increased the rates, but that if Parliament did not legislate on the subject they would increase their assessments. But now we are in 1890, and not one of the Gentlemen who have addressed the House, and who are fully competent to speak on the subject, has produced an instance of direct hardship or injustice existing at present. ["Oh!"] Well, I have heard of the Chard case, in which it was said that injustice was done. What has happened? The machinery has been rated, the owners have appealed, and I have just heard that the appeal has been over-ruled to-day. No instance of injustice has been alleged. All that hon. Gentlemen ask the House to believe is that there is a fear which operates injuriously to manufacturing interests, and that unless Parliament interposes injury will be done. Evidence has been adduced to show that there are different rules, which operate differently in different parts of the country, and that, so far as I have been able to understand, is the chief reason which has been advanced in favour of legislation. But let me remind the House of what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby told us a short time ago. He said that this question of rating was by no means confined to machinery. Any hon. Gentleman who examines the assessments of his own county will find the most incomprehensible differences in them. I think there is a great deal to be said for the principle that if the House is to take up this question of assessment it ought rather to deal with those who are admitted to be suffering under great difficulties than with those who, to judge by their representatives, cannot be regarded as otherwise than prosperous. ["Oh!"] An hon. Member behind me disputes that statement. I have not yet heard that manufacturers, as a rule, allege that they are suffering from bad times, or are depressed in the same degree as the agricultural interest all over the country. The right hon. Gentleman invited the Government to support the Second Reading, and assured us that if we do so he will give us his personal assistance in improving the Bill. But it would, undoubtedly, be a very difficult, if not impossible, task to amend the Bill in Committee so as to make it a fair compromise between the two contending parties. Speaking for those not connected with manufactures, and for the Government, I can say that they do not desire, in the slightest degree, to do anything unfair to the manufacturing interests, nor do they wish that the matter should be turned into a question between town and country. What they desire is that justice should be done, whether to the manufacturing interests or other interests. But the differences between the parties are very acute and hardly reconcilable. The manufacturers have laid down what they believe to be the right basis of rating. There is a party, with representatives in this House, on the other hand, who say that the result of the application of the definition of rating contained in the Bill would be that the manufacturers would get a benefit over the rest of the community. We have heard from the hon. Member for South Birmingham that in Birmingham the difference would be a sum of £8,000, which would be an increase to the rates of upwards of 2d. in the £1.

MR. P. J. WILLIAMS: Over 1d. What I stated was that the difference would be between £7,000 and £8,000, or an addition to the rates of about 1½d. in the £1.

*MR LONG: I meant to say upwards of 1½d. in the £1. The evidence from Birmingham is sufficient to show that if the definition in the Bill is to guide the Rating Authorities, and those Authorities are to adopt what the manufacturers regard as the fair basis of assessment a great upset in the assessment of the whole country must result. It must be manifest to all that if in Birmingham £7,000 or £8,000 is written off the rates, that amount must be provided from other sources. Hon. Gentlemen, in supporting the Bill, assure the House that concessions made to the manufacturing interest will tend to the benefit of the industrial classes, and not to the benefit of the manufacturers. If this slight impost, by means of assessment, is removed by the Bill, I have no doubt that hon. Gentlemen who are manufacturers will give the benefit of the relief to their workpeople; but it should be borne in mind, at the same time, that if this relief is granted to the manufacturer, it has to be met by some other class of property. What would be the class of property upon which the burden would fall in those particular districts? It would be the property of the industrial classes, in whose interests the House is asked to pass the Bill as it stands. It seems to me, personally, so far as I am able to understand what the legal rulings on this question have been, that the law as laid down by the Master of the Rolls is the law which has been generally accepted and acted upon ["No, no!"] and which may be justly described, in the words of Lord Justice Lopes, as decisions which "were founded on good sense, and are good law." Hon. Members have appealed to the representatives of the labour interests to support the measure, and they have told us agriculturists of the terrible things that will happen to us if we do not pass it. One hon. Member on the other side has told us that unless a Bill of this kind is passed, our ploughs and harrows—and I suppose he would go on to say our spades and forks also—will eventually be rated. That may or may not be the case. It will be time enough for us to be alarmed when a practical suggestion is made to carry that out. So far, no one has seriously contemplated that rating should go down to the harrow or the plough, because they are implements which go to the cultivation of the farm, and they have no relation to the assessment of the farm, which is fixed on the basis of rent, rent being fixed according to the productive power of the land. A farm is let as a going concern, without a plough or a harrow on it. The difficulty in this case is to define what are tenants' fixtures. That would be the difficulty we should have to face in Committee on this Bill, and we should find it very hard to arrive at a compromise which would be satisfactory to both parties. The difficulty seems to me almost an insuperable one. ["No, no."] I am only giving my opinion for what it is worth.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: The hon. Member is mistaken. This question is settled every day. Fire Insurance Companies invariably divide machinery into two categories—landlords' machinery and tenants' machinery. The whole of the machinery cannot be insured in one sum.

*MR. LONG: I hope that if the Bill is read a second time, the difficulty will be overcome with as much apparent ease in the House of Commons. It is, however, a difficulty which hon. Gentlemen will have to face, and I think it will be very hard to arrive at anything like a compromise satisfactory to the two contending parties. As was pointed out by the hon. Member for Manchester, who seconded the Second Reading of the Bill, the question is a most complicated and difficult one. The hon. Baronet (Sir William Houldsworth) told us that, so far as he is concerned, he should be prepared to accept any fair Amendment which would not interfere with the real objects of the Bill. That is all very well so far as it goes. The difficulty will be to arrive at what are practical and fair Amendments which would properly give effect to the general wish of the House. It has been alleged, and I do not deny it, that there is a want of uniformity in the practice with reference to assessments all over the country.

But it has been said by those opposed to the measure that the law on the subject is perfectly clear and has been continuous, and that no change has been made by any recent decision. It appears to the Government that there is undoubtedly a very great divergence of opinion in the House on the merits of this question. It is a matter, however, which the Government think ought to be decided by the House itself. They cannot express their approval of it. Many are opposed to the principle of contracting the area of rateability or to any change which will have the effect of throwing increased burdens on other kinds of property. The Government feel, however, that evidence has been adduced pointing to a want of uniformity in the practice of rating, and it is for the House to say whether or not Parliament shall legislate at once on this portion of a greater question. I hold that if the House deals with the question of assessment it should deal with it as a whole. If, however, the House is of opinion that legislation is urgently necessary, and accepts the Second Reading of the Bill, then it will become the undoubted duty of the Government to ask that the next stage of the Bill should be postponed, and that an opportunity should be given to us to consider what Amendments we ought to propose. I shall support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, not because I wish to create or perpetuate an injustice which presses on the great manufacturing industry, but because I believe this question of assessment should be dealt with as a whole.

*(5.0.) SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): The view many hon. Members of the House entertain on this question is that a practical difficulty has arisen which, we think, ought to be removed. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Local Government Board has said that he declines to be a party to any limitation of the liability to rating that now exists, but can the hon. Gentleman decline to be a party to a mere definition of what ought to be rated? I may be told that such evils as exist have prevailed for a very long period, and that there is no pressing necessity for legislation. But I would remind the House how the present practical difficulty has arisen. In former times the Rating Authorities had certain broad rules placed before them for their guidance. They were told to seek for that which was fixed to the freehold, that which is the landlord's fixture and not the tenant's, and to rate that which is fixed to the land and to omit to rate that which is moveable. These were the principles on which they proceeded. By degrees, however, those landmarks of the past have been encroached upon, and now these encroachments have so much advanced that none of the landmarks remain, and few practical men are now acquainted with the principles that ought to guide them in making assessments. The principle that has been laid down in the case so often quoted is, no doubt, legally sound, but the difficulty is that it is very difficult to know how to apply it. May I ask the House to listen to what every valuer has to bear in mind? He is told that he is to rate things on the premises which are there for the purpose of making those premises fit for the particular work for which they are used. Valuers apply that principle in different ways. While one valuer may decline to value anything which is not firmly fixed to the freehold, another may include the vice upon a bench as something which makes the premises more valuable for the trade for which they are carried on. The result is that one system of rating exists in one place, and another in another. The question the House has to consider is whether or not it will deal with this anomalous state of things, and secure that there shall be one uniform system of rating. This is a practical difficulty which must be dealt with some way or other. The question to be determined by the House now is not whether cranes or weighing machines shall be exempted from rating. This question can be dealt with in Committee when we reach the sub-section which defines what shall be the subject of rating. But there is no wisdom in leaving every valuer to exercise his own authority and interpret for himself this somewhat ambiguous rule. These are the facts which have led some of us to support this Bill. We do not pledge ourselves to the details. We ask simply that the Legislature shall bear the responsibility of determining what shall be rated and that the point shall not be left in that state of uncertainty which is very disastrous to commercial interests.

(5.8.) SIR R. PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I object to the Bill as a nibbling at a very important trade question. When the right hon. and learned Member speaks of the encouragement afforded by recent legal decisions to Rating Authorities to rate machinery, I venture to think there must be some error, because the dicta of the Judges, whose Judgment has been quoted, themselves afford a refutation of the idea. Each hon. Member who has addressed the House in support of the Bill appears to have done so from a different point of view. One hon. Member told us that the Bill was only a declaration of the existing law, and that it made no change; but another hon. Member asserted that the Bill was necessary to prevent the extinction of manufactories in this country; yet not a single instance has been alleged in which the existing law, as interpreted, has caused, or is creating, any difficulty whatsoever. Of course, we have had a series of gloomy, forbidding, and dreary pictures of possible distress laid before us as likely to arise if the Bill is not allowed to pass into law. But I would like to point out that the decision of which hon. Members have made so much was delivered so far back as the year 1886, and that in the four years that have since elapsed none of the difficulties which they are prognosticating have arisen. The real object of the Bill is that property which has been declared to be legally rateable should no longer be rated. It is a Bill which will have the effect of withdrawing from the area of rating something that is at present liable to rates. It is a Bill advanced by one particular interest, and by one class of men; and it has nothing to do with the greater question of the inequality of rating. Anyone who is acquainted with the present system of rating knows that it is full of inequalities and injustices, and that it requires extensive amendments; and I venture to lay down this proposition—that a matter so intricate, so difficult, and affecting so many interests, is one which ought not to be dealt with in an accidental, haphazard private Member's Bill, but that it is of sufficient importance to be dealt with in a Government measure. It has been argued as if the Bill were something entirely new; but, as a fact, it has been before the House year after year since 1885, and each year it has been brought forward by one of the leading manufacturers. I do not complain of manufacturers taking that line; but when we are told that the Bill is being advanced from philanthropic motives, I think we should bear in mind what class of property it is designed to remove from the area of rating. Reference has been made to the fact that, unless the Bill is passed, large mills might become unoccupied, and that our national industries would suffer. I would like to know if there are not at the present time large areas of land which, in consequence of the inequalities of rating, are unoccupied and waiting the hand of the toiler. If the argument is applicable to manufacturers it is also applicable to the case of landowners, and it only strengthens my point that the question is one that should be dealt with as a whole. I contend that the Bill cannot, by any possibility, do any good. It will not settle the law, and the hon. Member for Manchester, in speaking on it, did not attempt to deny that it would require many alterations. The Scotch Law has been quoted; but I would like to know if the Bill will assimilate the English with the Scotch, or even with the Irish Law. I venture to assert that it will do nothing of the kind. But what it will do will be to relieve large manufacturers of a burden which will be thrown upon the poorest class of householders, who are already sufficiently heavily burdened. The Bill will intensify existing injustices instead of simplifying or settling the law, and under these circumstances I feel compelled to vote against its Second Reading.

Sir Henry James

(5.19.) THE EARL OF CAVAN (Somerset, S.): The hon. Gentleman who spoke for the Government said that no case of hardship had been made out. Now, the case of Chard has been frequently alluded to in this debate, and there undoubtedly a case of great hardship exists. A man bought some works for £4,300 and also paid £1,500 for the machinery. He then put £23,000 into the business and acquired a large quantity of new machinery under the belief that the same system of assessment would continue, when suddenly he had the new assessment sprung upon him. I have letters from three or four other manufacturers complaining that the new assessment presses very hardly upon them. We hope the House will agree to the Second Reading of this Bill not only because it deals with individual cases, but because it will enable manufacturers in England, as in the case of Scotland and Ireland, to know what their rating will be.

*(5.21.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I regret that time does not permit me to submit the case of the mining industries with which I have been this day intrusted; but I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill if, providing the Bill is read a second time, he will in Committee exempt coal mining machinery from the operation of the Bill?

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Certainly, Sir.

(5.22.) The House divided:—Ayes 239; Noes 87.—(Div. List, No. 51.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SLAVERY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 150.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 220.)

As amended considered; Amendments made; Bill read the third time, and passed.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.—(No. 60.)

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, &c.

M O T I O N S.

RATING AND VALUATION (SCOTLAND).

(5.35.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the Law relating to the rating and valuation of the various kinds of property subject to assessment in Scotland, and to report what amendments may be necessary therein; that the Committee do consist of Seventeen Members; that Mr. Baird, Mr. J. B. Balfour, Mr. Barbour, Mr. Joseph Bolton, Mr. Caldwell, Dr. Cameron, Sir Archibald Campbell, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Mr. Hugh Elliot, Sir Archibald Orr Ewing, Mr. Hunter, Colonel Malcolm, Mr. M'Ewan, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Shaw-Stewart, Mr. Mark Stewart, and Mr. Edmund Robertson, be Members of the Committee; that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; that five be the quorum; that the Report and Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee of Rating and Valuation (Scotland), in Session 1888, be referred to the Select Committee on Rating and Valuation (Scotland).”—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS (St. Augustine's, Kent): I object on the ground that the hon. Gentleman has not ascertained whether the Members he has named will or can serve on the Committee, it being usual to obtain the consent of hon. Members before nominating them.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I would point out that this is merely an old Committee to which the hon. Gentleman has himself assented, and to the re-appointment of which I assume there can be no objection. Moreover, the Lord Advocate has consented to the re-appointment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I simply consented to the re-appointment of the Committee, but not to the inclusion of the same names as on the old Committee.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: May I explain that this Motion is precisely similar to that of last year, which was assented to by the Government.

MR. AKERS DOUGLAS: There is no objection to the appointment of the Committee; but there are some of the Members of the old Committee who will not be able to serve on this, because they have already been appointed to serve on other Committees.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Then I beg to move the first part of my Motion.

Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the law relating to the rating and valuation of the various kinds of property subject to assessment in Scotland, and to report what amendments may be necessary therein.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of seventeen Members.

Ordered, That the Report and Minutes of evidence taken before the Select Committee on Rating and Valuation (Scotland), in Session, 1888, be referred to the Select Committee on Rating and Valuation (Scotland).

TOWN HOLDINGS.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Committee do consist of Nineteen Members; That Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Amherst, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Beadel, Mr. Channing, Mr. Crilly, Mr. Stormonth Darling, Sir John W. Ellis, Mr. Elton, Dr. Fox, Mr. Lewis Fry, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Macartney, Sir William Marriott, Colonel Nolan, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Seale-Hayne, and Viscount Wolmer, be Members of the Committee; that Five be the quorum; that the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; that the Minutes of Evidence of 1888 and 1889 be referred to the said Committee."—(Colonel Nolan.)

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I would point out that there is only a single Scotch Member nominated on this Committee. I therefore object to the Motion.

COLONEL NOLAN: If the hon. Member will withdraw his objection we will assent to the addition of one or two Scotch Members.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman withdraw his objection?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes, Sir.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Nineteen Members.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Amherst, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Beadel, Mr. Channing, Mr. Crilly, Mr. Stormonth Darling, Sir John W. Ellis, Mr. Elton, Dr. Fox, Mr. Lewis Fry, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Macartney, Sir William Marriott, Colonel Nolan, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Seale-Hayne, and Viscount Wolmer.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That five be the quorum.

Ordered, That the Minutes of Evidence of 1888 and 1889 be referred to the said Committee.—(Colonel Nolan.)

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) BILL.

Return ordered—

"Of Advances and Repayments under 'The Irish Church Act, 1869,' and the several Land Acts of 1870, 1881, 1885, and 1888."—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

Return presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 125.]

IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES FUND.

Return ordered—

"Showing the financial position of the Irish Church Temporalities Fund in the event of the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill becoming Law."—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

Return presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 130.]

TRUST COMPANIES BILL [LORDS.]

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 225.]

IRELAND—THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House,

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether the Papers that have been granted with reference to the Land Purchase Bill are all that are to be issued?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No, Sir; they are not the whole of the Papers. Those that have been already granted show the operation of the various loans under the Land Act of 1868-9, and to-morrow will be issued further Papers containing tables illustrating the working of the Bill, the amount of the Guarantee Fund, and the present position of the Church surplus.

THE CASE OF MR. GARDINER.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the charge against Mr. Gardiner has been withdrawn? It is a disgraceful scandal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing whatever about the matter.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 17th April, 1890.*COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added the Lord Kinnaid and the Lord De Ramsey to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., for the consideration of the Open Spaces Bill. Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

ADOPTION OF CHILDREN BILL.

A Bill to regulate the adoption of children—Was presented by the Lord Chaworth (E. Meath); read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2nd on Friday the 25th instant. (No. 56.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMEND-MENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons; Read 1st, and to be printed. (No. 57.)

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 17th April, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA FACTORY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the present position of the India Factory Act Amendment Bill; and whether, having regard to the Resolutions adopted by the recent Conference at Berlin, in relation to the employment of women and children in factories, Her Majesty's Government is prepared to sanction the provisions of such a measure as that proposed by the Government of India?

MR. JAMES MACLEAN (Oldham): I have also to ask the Under Secretary for India whether he has seen the statement in the Times Calcutta telegram of March 30th—

“That the Factories Act Amendment Bill has been postponed till next winter, the Government being of opinion that there is no pressing necessity for the measure;”

and, whether any information has been received at the India Office to show that this is the real reason for the postponement of the Bill?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The India Factory Bill has been postponed by the Council in India till the receipt of replies from the Local Governments and Administrations. The Resolutions of the Berlin Conference will be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the Government of India, and will no doubt receive due consideration from them before the Bill is passed into law. No such statement as that referred to by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) has been made by the Government of India to the Secretary of State. The reason given by the Government of Bombay for postponing the Factory Bill is that they are awaiting the receipt of replies.

MURDER OF A BENGALI AT DUM DUM.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State will lay upon the Table of the House the proceedings in the High Court of Calcutta, including the trial and the hearing on appeal, in the case of a soldier named O'Hara, charged with the murder of a Bengali at Dum Dum; and whether he will consent to the Return relating to Murders in India, which stands on the Paper this day?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State is not in possession of any proceedings in the case of O'Hara, which can be laid on the Table; and he is advised that, in criminal cases, proceedings of the kind suggested in the question do not exist. The Secretary of State cannot consent to the Return asked for; it is in some respects impossible, as, when a murder remains undetected, nobody can tell whether it was committed by an European or not. Information as to the number of murders reported to the police, and the number of persons convicted, is to be found in the Statistical Abstract. The further information for which the hon. Member asks, could only be collected, if at all in India, at a cost which, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, would be indefensible.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether any communication has been made to the Secretary of State in reference to the trial and appeal in the case of the soldier charged with the murder of a Bengali?

*SIR J. GORST: I must have notice of that question. I can only say that no communication has been made that I am aware of; but if the hon. Member will give notice, I will inquire.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): From the military aspect of the case, would the inquiry be undertaken by the Government of India, or by the Commander-in-Chief?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE CROPS IN SOUTHERN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the detailed Reports of the district officials of Madras respecting the condition of the crops in Southern India, which crops were expected to be very short owing to the deficiency of rain, have been received by the Secretary of State; and whether he will lay them upon the Table?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State will be happy to show the hon. Member all the Reports received up to the 22nd of March, which is the latest. They can be made a Parliamentary Paper, if the hon. Member desires. But the rains of the end of December happily removed all cause for apprehending serious scarcity, and there has been no scarcity, though crops are below the average.

PROSPECTS OF AGRICULTURE IN THE NORTH-WEST PROVINCES AND OUDH.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State can give the House any information respecting the state and prospects of agriculture in the North-West Provinces and Oudh; whether he is aware that the wheat crop has greatly suffered, and that, even reckoning land under canal irrigation, it is anticipated that there will not be a two-anna (or one-eight) yield; whether prices of good grains are already rising in the United Provinces; and whether fears are entertained of great scarcity, if not of actual famine?

Sir J. Gorst

SIR J. GORST: In reply to the first paragraph of the question of the hon. Member I have to say that the latest Report—that for the week ending March 19—shows that the hill district of Humaon was the only one in which a serious failure of crops was reported. My answer to the second paragraph is that the anticipation of March 12 was that the wheat crop would be two-thirds of the average. The answer to paragraphs 3 and 4 is in the negative. Of 18 central markets noticed in the Report of March 19 the price was stationary at six, rising at five, falling at five, and unsteady at two.

INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Indian Councils Bill, which stands as the fifth Order of the Day, will be taken?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It will certainly not be taken either this week or next.

THE AMENDMENT OF THE INDIAN FACTORY ACTS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the letter in the Times, of 10th April, from Mr. Holt S. Hallett, relative to the Amendment to the Indian Factory Acts, wherein he quotes the Report of Mr. Meade-King relative to the effect of factory work at an early age upon Indian children:—

“Nothing has impressed me more in the course of my inspection of the Bombay mills than the unhealthy, stunted, and puny appearance of a great number of the children whom I have seen at work;”

whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence of Mr. Drewett, which was laid before the Factory Commission, regarding the ginning factories in Khandsesh, wherein he states that—

“The women sit on the back of the gins, and have simply to lift up the cotton and push it forward. I have often seen them doing this mechanically, three-parts asleep. I think you will find that the women had worked night and day for as long as a week at a stretch. I do not think there is a double set of children anywhere, and they must also have worked day and night. The women would have worked 23 out of the 24 hours;"

and whether the Government of India are taking any steps to check the abuses reported?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has had his attention directed to the evidence as to the condition of women and children in Indian Factories. The Factory Law Amendment Bill, now before the Indian Legislature, will, to some extent, deal with the existing evils, and will, in particular, bring the ginning factories referred to in paragraph 2 of the question for the first time under legislative restriction. The proceedings of the Berlin Conference will be considered by the Government of India in reference to these matters before the Bill is passed into Law.

IRELAND—EMPLOYMENT OF MILITARY AT EVICTIONS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the total extra cost arising from the employment of military at, or in connection with, evictions in Ireland, during the three years ending 31st March, 1890?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The total cost arising from the causes referred to for the period stated was £2,675.

COST OF EMPLOYING POLICE AT EVICTIONS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the total extra cost arising from the employment of the constabulary at, or in connection with, evictions, or in the protection of caretakers, during the three years ending 31st March, 1890?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary authorities report that the books of the Department do not contain separate entries of the costs connected with the duties referred to in the question; and an investigation for the purpose would involve such considerable labour and serious loss of time as to render it inexpedient in the public interest.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a Return was granted in 1888?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; and the preparation of that Return involved so much labour that I could not ask the Department to repeat it. The labour in preparing a Return for three years would be enormous.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Before going into Supply upon the Constabulary Vote, will the right hon. Gentleman give all the information necessary to enable the Irish Members to discuss the Vote?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Will the hon. Gentleman specify what he wants?

DR. TANNER: I want the whole of the information.

MR. HUGH GRAHAM, J.P.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any complaints have reached the Lord Chancellor of the conduct of Mr. Hugh Graham, J.P., of Rahoney, Dromore, County Tyrone, accusing him of drunkenness, and threatening to assault a passenger in a railway carriage, on the 27th of March, 1889; of being under the influence of drink while giving evidence in a Land Court, on 23rd January, 1889, when Mr. Justice Litton had him removed from Court by a policeman; and of being on another occasion drunk at the Omagh Railway Station, and annoying ladies, when a policeman who was asked to arrest him refused on the grounds that he was on railway premises; and whether the Lord Chancellor has inquired into these allegations, and with what result?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the case of this gentleman is still under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

POST OFFICE AT CORDUFF.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the necessity for a post office at Corduff, County Monaghan, which has a population of 400 families, with chapel, schools, and dispensary, and is situated in a populous district of country, and several miles from a post office?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The subject to which the hon. Member refers has been carefully inquired into, and I regret to find that the correspondence which would benefit by the establishment of a Post Office at Corduff is so small in amount as to preclude me from acceding to the request. The nearest Post Office to Corduff is at Corvally, two and a half miles distant, and the Postal Service in the neighbourhood is now conducted at a loss to the Revenue.

ABBEYFEALE PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, at a Petty Session Court, held in Abbeyfeale on the 26th ultimo, before Messrs. Turner, R.N., and W. C. Harnett, J.P., a case of alleged trespass, at suit of James Esmonde, J.P., against Mrs. Harnett, was called, the plaintiff not appearing; that the defendant applied for an adjournment in consequence of the absence of his solicitor, but was refused; and that, after all the other cases had been disposed of, the Magistrates kept the police and officials of the Court waiting the arrival of Mr. Esmonde, and then heard and adjudicated upon the case, although Mrs. Harnett had been refused the adjournment; and if he will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the case had been already adjourned at the previous Petty Sessions, and as it involved no question of difficulty the Magistrates refused to further adjourn it. They accordingly proceeded with it upon the arrival by train of the plaintiff, who had come a distance of upwards of 80 miles to give evidence in the matter.

In reply to a further question by Mr. W. ABRAHAM,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said there was only a delay of about a quarter of an hour.

RAILWAY IN DONEGAL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Grand Jury of Donegal have agreed to a baronial guarantee for the working expenses of a line of railway from Stranorlar to Glenties, through the town of Ballybofey; whether such guarantee includes the area of that town; whether representations have been made to the Treasury that such a line running through the town will rather injure than serve it, unless provision is made for a station there; and whether the Treasury will take steps to secure that this shall be done?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Representations have been made to me on this subject, which will be carefully considered before any final action is taken.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF LETTERKENNY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the vacancy in the Postmastership at Letterkenny has yet been filled; what the allowance for office rent is to be; what are the numbers of the assistants, established and unestablished, and their respective salaries; and whether there is any difference in the work done by them?

*MR. RAIKES: No appointment has yet been made to the Letterkenny Post Office, but I hope to be able to make one shortly. An allowance will be granted for office rent; but the amount of it cannot be fixed at present—depending, as it does, upon the arrangements which the new Postmaster may make. The established force will consist of three members on scale, rising from 12s. to 30s. a week. There will also be two assistants, unestablished, at £30 a year each. Between the work done by the established and unestablished force there is, no doubt, a difference; but what this difference is in the particular case of Letterkenny, the shortness of the notice has not admitted of my ascertaining. If I can obtain any information, I will furnish the hon. Member with it.

LAND COMMISSION PURCHASES.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many acres of land in Ireland have been purchased by the Irish Land Commission under Clause 5 of "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885;" what amount has been expended by the Land Commission in purchasing the same; how many acres have been sold by the Land Commission under the above clause, what amount has been realised for them, and what number of acres so purchased does the Commission still hold; what is the number of acres and purchase value of holdings resumed by the Land Commission from tenant purchasers under Clause 3; and how many of these have been re-sold to fresh purchasers, and at what price?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that under the powers referred to in the first paragraph of the question, 19,817 acres have been so purchased, the purchase money being £152,117, which also represents the amount for which the lands were re-sold by them. The Commissioners do not possess any portion of the holdings. As regards the inquiries in the two concluding paragraphs, the hon. Member appears to be under a mis-apprehension. The Land Commissioners do not resume possession of holdings from tenant purchasers. If, however, there be default in the payment of instalments for a holding, it is put up for sale by the Commissioners, subject to the future instalments payable in respect of the original purchase-money. Since the passing of the Act in 1885, loans have been issued in upwards of 12,000 cases, and in 12 cases only has there been default in the payment of the instalments.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of the question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Under what I apprehend to be the conditions referred to by the hon. Gentleman the number re-sold of the 12 is nine, and three are still unsold.

LANDED ESTATES COURT.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table a Return of Irish Estates in the Landed Estates Court for sale, showing the location of each estate, the name of the landlord, the rateable valuation, the actual present rental, the highest offer made in each case in which there has been any offer of purchase, and the period for which each estate has been in the hands of the Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Registrar to the Land Judges reports that it would not be practicable to give the proposed Return.

In reply to another question by Mr. SEXTON,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I only received the information which I have just given since I entered the House, but I will be glad to make further inquiries.

COMPLAINT AGAINST PRISON OFFICIALS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has caused any independent inquiry into the allegations of Mr. George Harrison against the officers of Pentonville, Millbank, and Chatham Prisons, made to a representative of the Press, and reported on the 29th of March; and, if so, whether he will communicate the Report to the House?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have caused inquiry to be made by the Visiting Director into all the allegations which have been attributed to George Harrison in the Press, and he has reported that they are devoid of foundation. I do not propose to lay this Report on the Table, but I will show it to the hon. Member, if he wishes it.

WILFUL MURDER.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, in the 10 years from 1879 to 1888 inclusive, there were in England and Wales 1,766 verdicts of wilful murder found by Coroners' Juries, 672 persons committed for trial, 373 acquitted or found insane, 299 condemned to death, 154 executed, and 145 sentences of death commuted; and whether, looking to the disparity between the numbers of committals and convictions, and between the numbers of capital sentences passed and carried out, as compared with committals, convictions, and sentences for other crimes of violence, the Government will, in this or next Session, introduce a measure either for the abolition of capital punishment, or for otherwise amending the law relating to punishment for wilful murder?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; the figures are correctly given. Of the 145 cases where the death sentence was commuted, 30 were crimes of infanticide by women. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation in the direction indicated by the hon. Member.

FACTORY ACTS—CARDIFF.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any steps have been taken to enforce the Factory Acts (Clause 16, 41 and 42 Vic.) in Messrs. Vaughan's works at Cardiff; if he is aware, that during the recent dispute, Messrs. Vaughan, and Co. supplied food to the women and girls at work on the premises, and that last Good Friday the women worked at this establishment to 12 o'clock; and if he would see that in future the Factory Acts are enforced in this establishment?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; the Factory Acts are being enforced at the dye works of Messrs. Vaughan, and I am not aware that they have been infringed. The facts referred to in the second paragraph took place at the laundry works of Messrs. Vaughan, which are not within the Factory Acts. The hands in the dye works had both Good Friday and Easter Monday as holidays. The dye works have been regularly visited by the Inspector for years.

OLD CROSS BONES BURIAL GROUND.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the use made of the unconsecrated "Old Cross Bones" Burial Ground, in Union Street, Borough, closed in 1854, and from which the human remains have not been removed; whether he is aware that the property was sold by auction by the parish in or about the year 1886, and that since that date it has been constantly used for the following purposes, namely, penny circuses, switchback railways, waxworks and ghost shows, steam roundabouts, &c., accompanied by steam and other organs, rattles, drums, bells, and steam shriekers; and whether any existing Authority can prevent the landlord from letting the property for these purposes; and, if not, whether he will take steps to legislate in the direction of giving powers to put down this and similar proceedings?

Mr. Cobb

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; my attention has not been called to this matter, otherwise than by the question of the hon Member. I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that the property was sold to a private individual by the Trustees of the parish, and that it is used for the purposes referred to by the poorer classes, who conduct themselves in an orderly manner. It is a question of law, as to which I can give no opinion, whether the temporary erections referred to are buildings within the meaning of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, and it is left to the Local Authority or to private individuals to proceed by indictment for nuisance. The County Council are the Authorities under the Act of 1884, and I think any representation on the matter should be addressed to that Body.

MR. CAUSTON: The London County Council have proceeded against the tenants, but when a conviction takes place the tenant retires, and another takes his place; I want to know whether there is any way by which we can get at the freeholder?

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot venture to express an opinion upon a question of law like that.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP INSPECTORS.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to statements in the Press, notably in the Manchester Guardian, to the effect that the Government are about to throw open the appointment of Factory and Workshop Inspectors to open competition, and whether this is intended to prevent the further appointment of workmen inspectors?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; I have not seen the statements in question. The existing scheme for the examination of Factory Inspectors is now under revision, but the changes in contemplation will not have the effect of preventing the appointment of working men candidates in the future. It is not intended to throw open these appointments to open competition.

OFFICERS' SWORDS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to the recent detention at Queenborough, by the vigilance of Her Majesty's officers of Customs, of a case of swords marked with a British crown and the words "Royal Scots Lothian Regiment," but subsequently released upon "Manufactured in Germany" being pointed out hidden under the hilt; if the swords were imported for the officers of Her Majesty's First Regiment of Foot; if he can state the name of the importer; and whether, having regard to the dangerous failure in the Soudan of foreign weapons in the hands of British soldiers, and the importance to the nation of the lives of the Queen's officers in battle crises, they are free to equip themselves indiscriminately from abroad, or if colonels of regiments are responsible to the Military Authorities for the proper arming of the officers under them?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The facts are as stated by my hon. Friend in the first paragraph. It is presumed that the swords were imported for the officers of the Royal Scots, but the War Office has no information on this point. The importers are Messrs. Hartjen & Co., of No. 4, Falcon Street, E.C., and I understand that the Board of Customs has informed them that the country of manufacture should be more conspicuously marked in future. Officers of the Army and Navy provide their own swords, and they are at liberty to buy them where they please.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Does the same rule apply to revolvers?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir; the officers provide their own revolvers.

PAYMASTER SERGEANTS.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his statement, last year, that there was no intention of altering the status of paymaster sergeants and orderly room sergeants appointed to the permanent staff of the Militia before the 1st March, 1888, whether it is the case that orders have recently been issued directing that such non-commissioned officers be not permitted to continue in the Service beyond 21 years, no matter what their age may be; and, if so, whether such orders materially alter the status of men whom the Militia Regulations permit to serve until they attain the age of 50 or 55 years, according to the time they joined the permanent staff of the Militia?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There are three descriptions of paymaster sergeants and orderly room clerks now serving in the Militia—(1) those who are completing their Army engagements of 21 years; (2) those who have completed such engagement and are allowed to continue serving; and (3) pensioners and militiamen serving on five-year renewable engagements. The appointment of paymaster sergeants and orderly room clerks in the Militia have been abolished, but there is no intention of interfering with the engagement under which men are now serving. Such engagement, however, will not be renewed except where it is for the good of the Service, and when specially recommended.

MILITARY COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state now when the result of the last Military Competitive Examination for Commissions in the Army for Subalterns of the Militia, held on the 19th and 20th of March last, will be communicated to the candidates?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is hoped that the result of this examination will be notified to each candidate, by post, on Saturday next. There were 318 candidates, and as the competition is a very close one, the papers have to be most carefully checked.

THE LADIES' GALLERY.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, seeing the keen interest taken by ladies in the proceedings of this House, and the eager but often ineffectual attempts of Members, by the daily ballot, to obtain seats for them in the Ladies' Gallery, it is within the resources of architectural skill to enlarge the space within which the ladies are at present encaged, so as to provide more equal accommodation for strangers of both sexes; and whether there is any good reason for caging off the Ladies' Gallery, and so obstructing the view which the ladies would otherwise have of the House and its proceedings?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): I am sorry to say that, owing to the structural conditions of that part of the House wherein the Ladies' Gallery is situated, it is not possible to enlarge it as the hon. Member suggests. As to removing the grating, that is a burning question which has often been raised and debated, and has always been decided in the negative, very much, I believe, because it has been ascertained whenever inquiry has been made that, though some of the ladies who visit the Gallery complain of being "encaged" as the hon. Member puts it in his question, the feeling of the majority is decidedly against the removal of the grating.

DR. TANNER: As this is a burning question, is there any chance of its being melted down?

MR. PLUNKET: It is called a grill now.

THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH TO THE CONTINENT.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the purchase of the submarine telegraphs between England and the continent has resulted in a financial success; and whether he is in a position to give the approximate expenditure and the receipts of this Service from the period of purchase up to date?

*MR. RAIKES: It is difficult to attach a precise meaning to the words "financial success," as employed by the hon. Member, but I think I am justified in saying that the result of the acquisition of the submarine cables between this country and the continent may, on the whole, be described as satisfactory. In view of the approaching International Telegraph Conference, it would be contrary to the public interest to make any official statement at present respecting the details of this question.

Mr. Leng

NON-DELIVERY OF TELEGRAMS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a telegram handed in at Bournemouth, on 22nd February, addressed to a mercantile firm in Glasgow, was never delivered, and that the Department, on 2nd of April, admitted that the non-delivery was due to carelessness on the part of one of the telegraphists; whether he is aware that a loss of about £90 resulted from the non-delivery of the telegram; and if he can explain why the Department offered 7½d., being the amount prepaid by the sender of the telegram, as the only compensation, and whether any increase can be made on that offer?

*MR. RAIKES: I regret to find that the failure of the telegram referred to was due to carelessness, and to learn from the hon. Member that it was attended with such serious loss. The Department has no power to grant compensation for loss incurred through the non-delivery of a telegram. All it can do is to refund the cost of the telegram and endeavour to prevent similar mistakes. Punishment is always inflicted on the person in fault.

THE SCOTCH MAILS.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the 8 p.m. mail from London to Scotland does not arrive in Wick until 5.30 p.m. next evening, in Thurso until 6 p.m., and in Kirkwall until 12 p.m.; and whether he is prepared to take such steps as will enable the mails to reach Wick at 3.30 p.m. and Kirkwall at 8 p.m., so as to enable merchants and others in those remote towns to peruse their correspondence and reply to it by next morning's south-going mail?

*MR. RAIKES: The facts are, no doubt, substantially as stated in the hon. Member's question; but, while fully appreciating the importance of the matter, I should not be justified in incurring additional expense in accelerating the Highland Mail Service, the cost of that Service being already very great. I am, however, giving very careful attention to the subject, in the hope that a way may be found of acceding to the wishes expressed, without adding to the charge on the public purse.

PARCEL POST WITH THE UNITED STATES.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if any steps are being taken to bring about the establishment of a Parcel Post between Great Britain and the United States?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir. For several years active steps have been taken to bring about a Parcel Post with the United States, but hitherto without success. Negotiations, however, have recently been renewed, and I am not without hope of a satisfactory result.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—SALE AGENCY IN WALES.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the Government will appoint a publisher in Wales, say at Cardiff, for the sale of Parliamentary Papers, Bills, Acts of Parliament, and other Government publications; and will cause the name of the publisher for Wales to be set forth on the imprint of all such documents, along with the names of the publishers for England, Scotland, and Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: Sale agencies for Government publications of all kinds have been granted, after competition, to three firms for 10 years from January 1, 1887, the rights of the one firm extending to England and Wales together, the others respectively to Scotland and Ireland. So long as these contracts run it is impossible for the Government to grant a fourth contract for sale agency in Wales, but I am not aware of any inconvenience to inhabitants of the Principality, resulting from the present system, which would necessitate the establishment of a separate agency for Wales. Monthly lists of the Parliamentary Papers are exhibited in the chief post offices in Wales, including Cardiff, with order forms for the use of the public.

BROMPTON CEMETERY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen shire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, considering the great increase of property and population in the neighbourhood of Brompton Cemetery, Government will agree to close it, as proposed in 1884, and will hand it over as a disused burial ground to the London County Council, with due regard to the vested rights of interested persons, and to the policy of the Extramural Interments Act.

MR. JACKSON: The Treasury is advised that it is not necessary, on sanitary grounds, to close Brompton Cemetery, and as there is a present income of £6,000 per annum derived from the cemetery, I am not prepared to advise that it should be closed on other grounds.

GOVERNMENT COPYRIGHT IN BLUE BOOKS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is true, as stated in the public prints, that the Government have claimed a copyright in Blue Books, and given notice that in this respect Her Majesty intends to stand upon her rights, and insist that those who wish to republish the contents of Blue Books should not do so without permission; and, if so, whether the Government will reconsider this matter, and, instead of restraining, will facilitate and encourage the action of all who are willing to circulate in a popular form the useful matter presented to Parliament, without regard to the profit of Queen's Printers or other purveyors of official books?

MR. JACKSON: The opinions of the Treasury with regard to the enforcement of the copyright in Government publications are given at length in the Minute of August 31st, 1887, which was presented to Parliament on September 13th of the same year. (House of Commons Paper, 335-87.) If the hon. Member will refer to that Paper I think he will see that there is no need to reconsider the matter.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I will take the first opportunity of raising the question in the House.

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether lands adjacent to crofter's holdings, propelled or conveyed since the passing of the Crofters' Acts by a proprietor to his eldest son and apparent heir, are thereby no longer liable to be taken for the enlargement of the holdings of the adjacent crofters?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute.): If by any bond fide disposition lands have been conveyed by a proprietor to another person since the passing of the Crofters Act, I do not consider that such lands could be deemed available land under the provisions of Section 13 of the Act.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is legal, or in accordance with the Local Government (Scotland) Act, for Parochial Boards to choose, as their representatives on District Committees of a County Council, men who, not being electors for such county, are not qualified to be elected Councillors?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: This is a question of statutory construction; but my opinion is that Parochial Boards are at liberty, if they see fit, to appoint representatives who are not qualified to be county electors.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS ACT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps have been taken by the Board of Trade in respect of Section 6 of "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889?"

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade informed the Railway Companies that they proposed to fix the 1st July next, as the date from which every passenger ticket is to have the fare printed upon it. The Board propose to adhere to that date, as a rule, but where there is any real difficulty, they will grant an extension to the 1st January, 1891, but not beyond that.

LIGHTHOUSES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is true that at present there are no lighthouses on the west coast of Orkney; and, if so, whether he is prepared to recommend their erection?

Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The only light on the west coast of Orkney is the light on Gremsa Island in Hoy Sound. The south-west coast is, however, guarded by lights on the north coast of Scotland and in the Pentland Firth. As to the erection of further lights, I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply of the 28th March, 1889, to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, and to state that since that date no proposals for the lighting of Orkney have been submitted to the Board of Trade; but I ought to add that the present financial condition of the Mercantile Marine Fund will not justify me in sanctioning such a proposition, if made.

THE TRAMWAYS ACT.

MR. THOMAS HENRY BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government will consent to the appointment of the proposed Select Committee, with reference to "The tramways Act, 1870," provided the inquiry contemplated is restricted to the tramways in the Metropolis and the neighbouring districts, and that it is understood that any legislation recommended by the Committee shall be of a metropolitan character?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not aware of any sufficient reason why the tramways in the Metropolis and the neighbouring districts should be dealt with separately from tramways in other parts of the United Kingdom.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise the fact that next year the valuable rights of the people of London will be insufficiently provided for if there is no legislation in the meantime?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not aware that there is any absolute necessity for immediate legislation.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiry to be made? Both the London County Council and the Tramway Companies see the necessity for legislation in the matter.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Tramway Companies look at the matter from quite another point of view. They want advantages for themselves of another kind.

BERLIN INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. MUNDELLA : I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government is in possession of the Report of the proceedings of the Industrial Conference at Berlin ; and when the same will be laid before Parliament ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.) : All the Protocols of the Labour Conference at Berlin have not yet been received ; but those in our hands are in course of translation, and the whole will be presented as soon as possible.

PORTUGUESE EXPEDITION UP THE SHIRÉ.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and, if so, what, information has reached the Foreign Office as to the despatch of a Portuguese Expedition up the Shiré to attack Mponda, and in reference to which the Times correspondent at Zanzibar states that telegrams confirming the report have arrived from Delagoa Bay ?

*SIR J. FERGUSON : Reports as to the alleged objects of the expedition were telegraphed by Her Majesty's Consul at Mozambique, and Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon was at once instructed to communicate with the Portuguese Government on the subject. The Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that the Portuguese Government had no official knowledge of the expedition, but, on hearing that it was rumoured, had instructed the Governor General of Mozambique, if the statement was true, to order the Commander immediately to retire behind the Ruo. We have received a further positive assurance that no fresh action on the part of the Colonial Authorities in the Shiré inconsistent with the understanding between the two Governments would be sanctioned or tolerated.

THE BOULAK MUSEUM IN EGYPT.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his attention has been called to an attempt which has recently been made by three Europeans to set fire to the famous Boulak Museum in Egypt, which contains objects of priceless value for the history of art and of early man ; and whether the Government can see their way to putting some pressure on the Authorities in Egypt to secure that these objects shall be housed in some building less liable to be burnt down than the Palace in which they are now contained, and for their better custody and protection. I also wish to have an answer to a question put some time ago whether the Egyptian Authorities are taking any means for the protection of monuments which have been recently much destroyed by travellers in the Nile Valley ? My right hon. Friend said that he would inquire of Sir Evelyn Baring and inform the House.

*SIR J. FERGUSON : No information has yet been received as to an attempt made by three Europeans to set fire to this Museum. On February 9, Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General reported that the transfer of the Boulak Museum to the Palace of Ghizeh had been effected with complete success, and that there could be no doubt that the ancient Egyptian monuments had been placed in far greater security and would be seen to far greater advantage than had hitherto been the case.

THE REV. MR. DOBIE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can now state the circumstances attending the imprisonment and release of the Rev. Mr. Dobie, at Hodeidah ?

*SIR J. FERGUSON : I am not yet able to give a reliable account of the circumstances, as the statements of Mr. Dobie and the Turkish Local Authorities are so much at variance that Her Majesty's Ambassador has found it necessary to call for further particulars from the British Vice Consul at Hodeidah, Ata Muhamad ; when they have been received his Excellency will make a further Report to Her Majesty's Government.

DOCKYARD EMPLOYÉS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if it is the case that males of from 18 to 20 years old are employed as boys in Her Majesty's Dockyards ; what are their wages; and are these boys put to do skilled work, such as drilling, driving steam cranes, machines, &c.?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Boys are employed in the Dockyards up to the ages of from 18 to 20 years in connection with most of the principal trades. Their pay at 20 years of age would be 2s. 6d. per day. These boys are entered for the purpose of learning trades, and are employed on skilled work with that object. Great pressure is put upon the authorities at each Dockyard to enter boys and teach them trades, and it is a frequent source of complaint that more are not entered, as the sons of workmen have very few other opportunities of learning trades in the Dockyard towns.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have received any Petitions from the labourers employed in the Dockyards for an increase of pay, these having been presented to the local officials in February, who promised that they should be forwarded; if it is a fact that ordinary labourers are paid 15s. per week, and whether the Admiralty have any intention of raising this minimum to the £1 per week asked for by the labourers; and whether the Admiralty propose to redress the grievances complained of, namely, in the matters of checked pay, low wages, and with a view to boys being employed on boys' work and not on skilled labour?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Petitions have been considered, and regulations issued, for a more rapid advance to higher rates of pay. These labourers have opportunities of becoming skilled labourers and earning 20s. per week and over—if they show themselves fit for better work. It should be borne in mind that far more men are anxious to be entered at 15s. per week than we could find employment for.

THE MALABAR TROOPSHIP.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is a fact that there were 14 funerals on board the Malabar troopship during her last home voyage; that she carried 200 invalids at starting, and 300 by the time she reached Malta; and whether the numbers on board were in excess of Admiralty Regulations?

Mr. Cuninghame Graham

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Fourteen deaths did occur on board the Malabar during her last homeward voyage. Excluding officers and ladies, 644 invalids were embarked, but the term "invalid" includes not only men in the last stages of organic disease, but also those who have ailments which render them unfit for service only, and who are otherwise in health. The numbers embarked were not in excess of those allowed by the Regulations, but the number of invalids embarked is settled by the Military Medical Authorities at Bombay, who alone would be in a position to decide upon the proportion of sick that it would be safe to embark at one time.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is a fact that the men employed upon task work in Her Majesty's Dockyard, Chatham, are complaining of being checked, and for what reason are the men checked 10 and 20 per cent. of their earnings when engaged upon task work? I have also to ask whether it is true that complaints have been made to the Admiral Superintendent of the manner in which the measurers take the men's work, and of the prices paid for the same?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: A few complaints were made about three months ago that men were not being paid, in some cases, the full amounts earned. This was at once looked into, and it was found that deductions had in a few instances been made by the measuring officers; but this was stopped, and orders were sent by the Controller to each yard that no alteration of the rates or prices paid for work should be made without the approval of the Superintendent. The result of establishing task work has been very beneficial to the workmen, as it has enabled the workmen to earn 22 per cent. above their ordinary wages, and every care will be taken in developing the system to see that the men are adequately paid according to the work they perform.

H.M.S. BARRACOUTA.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the expression of regret by the Coroner's Jury in the recent Barracouta case at Sheerness—

"That the Admiralty had not carried out the recommendations of the Jury in the Thistle explosion in 1869, by providing hospital accommodation for injured men at Sheerness, and thus caused the necessity of sending cases to Chatham;"

whether he is aware that there is already at Sheerness a Military Hospital which is never full, where cases of accident could be treated; and whether he will take immediate steps to put an end to the unnecessary suffering caused by the present arrangements?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: My attention has been drawn to the rider to the verdict of the Coroner's Jury. Since the Thistle inquiry the Admiralty have made such further arrangements as seemed desirable. Increased accommodation has been provided at Sheerness Naval Barracks for cases of accident, and a vessel has been specially fitted for the proper transport of injured men, when deemed fit, to Chatham Hospital, an important establishment, where patients receive greater comforts than could be afforded locally. The Army Hospital of 36 beds at Sheerness is considered to be sufficient only for military requirements, but in the event of the Naval Infirmary at Sheerness being already full of serious cases, any naval patient who might not be in a condition fit for removal to Chatham would, no doubt, be accommodated in the Military Hospital if there were a bed to spare. No unnecessary suffering is now caused, as every precaution is taken to prevent it, and only such men as are considered by the medical officers on the spot as fit to be removed and as likely to benefit by the change are sent to Chatham.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: In consequence of the answer of the noble Lord I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the subject.

BECHUANALAND AND CYPRUS.

SIR GEORGE TREVELLYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there are obtainable by Members of Parliament a statement of the expenditure and income of Bechuanaland, and a statement of the expenditure of the Government of Cyprus?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): As regards British Bechuanaland, the right hon. Gentleman will find information relating to previous years in the Blue Books, C5,363, pages 12 and 13, and C5,620, pages 24 to 28. The estimated expenditure and income for the financial year now current are given at page 429 of the Civil Service Estimates, Class V. As regards the expenditure of Cyprus, the right hon. Gentleman will find detailed information in the Blue Books, C5,523 and C5,812. The Annual Estimates of Cyprus have frequently been printed for Parliament in full, and those for 1888-9 will be found at pages 69 to 86 of C5,523. As the details and totals are almost the same from year to year they have not since been reprinted.

THE CENSUS OF 1891.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is intended to introduce the three Bills making provision for the Census of 1891?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman must have failed to have observed that the question he has raised was answered last Tuesday. When the Committee at present sitting has reported the Government will consider the course to be pursued.

JOHN DALY.

MR. SEXTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary say now how soon the evidence in the case of John Daly will be in the hands of Members?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have heard from the prison visitors that it will be sent this week.

WOOLWICH AND ENFIELD FACTORIES (EMPLOYÉS AND OVERTIME).

Address for—

"Return, showing the total number of men employed in Woolwich Arsenal, and also in the Small Arms Factory at Enfield; the number employed in each Department, and in each branch of Trade; the extent to which Overtime (not including Night Shifts) has been worked during each of the last two years, namely, from the 1st day of March, 1888, to the end of February, 1889, and from the 1st day of March, 1889, to the end of February, 1890, respectively; and the number of men working Overtime in that period (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper No. 206, of Session 1888)."—(Mr. Howell.)

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE, &c.

Ordered, That the Standing Committee on Trade, &c., have leave to print and circulate with the Votes the Minutes of their Proceedings from day to day.—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

EAST INDIA (FINANCIAL STATEMENT).

Address for—

"Copy of the Indian Financial Statement for 1890-91, and of the Proceedings of the Legislative Council of the Governor General thereon."—(Sir George Balfour.)

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Sixth Report brought up and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

David Lloyd-George, Esquire, for Carnarvon Borough.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION) BILL. (No. 114.)

Bill reported from the Standing Committee on Trade, &c.

Report of the Committee, with Minutes of Proceedings, to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 133.]

Bill, as amended, to be taken into Consideration upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 226.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*(4.20.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Courtney, once more I have the great satisfaction of being able, in presenting the National Balance-Sheet, to show that it balances largely on the right side. Once more the absence of costly expeditions or small wars has relieved me from any of those sudden inroads on the national resources which have so often marred the fairest prospects of Chancellors of the Exchequer. Again no events have occurred to put any extraordinary expenditure upon us, while, on the other hand, a steady increase of prosperity has caused those Estimates which prudence dictated to be exceeded in the result. The Estimates of Revenue have been attacked as having been put too low. Those Estimates I am prepared to defend, but as regards Expenditure I think all Parties in the House will acknowledge that the figures are most satisfactory. The Paper which I have had put in the hands of hon. Members will show that the estimated expenditure has not been exceeded by more than the very trifling sum of £116,000. I am relieved on this occasion, I hope, from the somewhat dreary necessity of wearying the Committee with many explanations of details with regard to excess of expenditure or savings, by the fact that the Estimates have been, on the whole, so extremely accurate. The aggregate result is this—I estimated for an expenditure of £85,967,000; the Exchequer Issues for the year were £86,083,000, or £116,000 more than the estimate. As the Committee are aware, there have been some Supplementary Estimates on the one hand, while on the other we have been compensated by savings; but there is not one item on which I need touch. The ground I have to cover is very broad indeed, and I hope the Committee will excuse me if I do not go more into detail than is absolutely necessary, or more than they have a right to demand. I ask the Committee in passing to note the fact that on an aggregate Expenditure of £86,000,000, we have been right within £116,000. I do not believe there is any private establishment, or any great Railway Company, or any company of any kind, that could have forecast its expenditure in a more business-like manner than has been done by the Administrative Departments of the State. I think that the financial officers of the various Departments deserve great credit for this result. I think the heads of these Departments deserve credit for having so controlled the expenditure, and I think the Committee will recognise that some credit is also due to my hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury, who watches over the Estimates with such care and vigilance. I come now to the Estimates of Revenue. The surplus Revenue which I am able to lay before the Committee to-day does not come from any savings, nor from any cause connected with Expenditure, but from the expansion of Revenue. The receipts have exceeded my estimate by more than £3,000,000. I am bound to say that this has been made a matter of some reproach to me. It has been said that this is "easy finance"; that it is an easy process of securing the popularity of a surplus to depreciate the expansion of your probable Revenue, and so be able to put a satisfactory conclusion before the country at the end of the year. It has been said that personal motives must have induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take a gloomy, or too gloomy, a view of the Estimates at the beginning of the year. I have even seen it declared that I must have purposely and wilfully deceived the public in this matter. I shall be able to produce conclusive proof that this has not been the case; I shall be able to produce the most satisfactory proof to all hon. Members on both sides of the House, and, I think, to my censors, that I was perfectly right in the course I took. If I insist on this for a moment, I do not do so as a personal defence—I am not concerned to defend myself very seriously against having a large surplus—but I think a defence is necessary, not so much for one Chancellor of the Exchequer as for the sake of his successors, and for the sake of the public generally. It is utterly impossible to forecast a Revenue amounting to £86,000,000 or £90,000,000 so accurately that you should not be out by a few per cent., and remember that 1 per cent. upon this total of £86,000,000 means £860,000, and that, speaking roughly, an excess of 4 per cent. would be about equivalent to the £3,000,000 which represents the surplus. What we have to do, therefore, is to see that within a very narrow percentage we are able to calculate the proper Revenue of the year. Supposing we were to be less careful as regards the Estimates, what would be the result? If any change took place during the course of the year—and who can say that a change will not take place?—you might from having taken an optimistic view of your Revenue most likely find that you were on the wrong side. I am not prepared to say that it is right for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to treat it practically as a toss-up whether he will have a deficit or a surplus. He must make sure, so far as human expectation goes, that he is on the right side at the end of the year, and I am perfectly confident that right hon. Gentlemen opposite will take the same view as I do in that respect. It is discreditable, unless there are unforeseen circumstances, that you should land the credit of this country in a deficit. I think it may be well to show the public shortly how these Estimates are framed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer does not get the Estimates placed before him simply in the gross, and then say, "Now the times are prosperous, let us put on a couple of millions." That is not the process at all. Every Department is responsible for the estimates which it places before the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Customs and the Inland Revenue calculate, not only what each Department may fairly estimate for, but they go through every item, and they are anxious that in every item it shall be proved that they have taken a businesslike view, and that there should not be a deficit in that item at the end of the year. I suppose it has rarely happened that a Chancellor of the Exchequer has said to himself that he would underestimate an item which had been put before him by his responsible advisers. The temptation is all the other way. The temptation to a Chancellor of the Exchequer is to avoid the imposition of taxation, when it may seem necessary, by screwing up estimates. That is a temptation into which we may sometimes fall, but there is no temptation to under-estimate your Revenue in order to impose taxation. The phrase has been used of "easy finance." Clearly where you have to impose actual taxation in order to make the Revenue square, personal considerations would point to putting your Estimates high and not to putting them low. If I had put my Estimates higher last year I might have escaped the fierce onslaught that was made upon me by the brewers in consequence of the 3d. addition obliged to be put on the Beer Duty, and in the same way I should not have had to impose the additional £1,000,000 of the Estate Duty. I framed my Estimates according to the best advice I received, and I shall be able to show the House, when I come to consider the details, how those Estimates have been justified. For the last two or three years we have been on the ascending curve of prosperity, and in that case there is nearly always a prospect of some increase of Revenue over your Estimates. But you must take care not to be caught half-way. When a Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks he is still on the ascending curve of prosperity, he may before the year is out have a drop and find his Estimates falsified. We have had some warnings in that respect. Several times it has been believed that we had seen the dawn of a greater prosperity, but in the East people sometimes speak of "false dawns," and there have been many occasions when prosperity seemed to be opening to us and we thought we saw the real dawn, but it has proved to be a false hope. Happily this year we seem to have come upon a greater period of prosperity, and the result is that, in some respects, but in some respects only, the Estimates show a very remarkable elasticity. The House will be startled when they come to consider in detail the cause of the very considerable excess of Revenue over Estimates. Nearly £2,500,000, out of a surplus of £3,250,000, were due to absolutely extraordinary circumstances. The £2,500,000 have been due to an extraordinary rush to alcohol and to an operation in silver which was not contemplated when I presented my Budget last year. The increase in the consumption of alcohol last year, as compared with its predecessor, produced an increase of duty exceeding £1,800,000. Let me remind the House that for eleven years the Revenue from spirits had been declining, and that for two years it had remained stationary. Speaking of forecasting the Revenue, if I had come before this House and had stated that I believed the increase on alcoholic beverages for the year would be £1,800,000, I believe I should have been considered either a lunatic or a libeller of the consuming classes of the country. Let me analyse the details of the Revenue of the past year. I think the House will admit that the figures are interesting. The net receipts from all consumable articles except spirits, wines, and beer actually fell short of my Estimate by, in round numbers, £130,000, surely an exceedingly accurate estimate. The net receipts from these articles—namely, tea, dried fruits, tobacco, and coffee—were £14,488,000, as compared with the Estimate of £14,617,000, and as compared with a net produce in the previous year of £14,468,000. As to alcoholic drinks, I am bound to admit that I have a different tale to tell. The net receipts from all alcoholic drinks amounted to £29,265,000, as compared with my Estimate of £27,430,000 and with a net produce of £27,157,000 in the year before. If I deduct the produce of the change made in the Beer Duty it shows an increase of £1,778,000, which I have roughly called £1,800,000. The Beer Duty exceeded my estimate by £270,000; the duty on foreign spirits by £421,000; on home spirits by no less than £1,010,000; and on wine by £120,000. It is on drink, and on drink alone, as regards consumable articles, that the Revenue was under-estimated in the past year. I may have been wrong in not foreseeing this increase in the consumption of alcoholic drinks, but I think I should have been wrong in disregarding the previous opinion of every person who has studied the course of consumption during the last few years. The Committee will notice that there has been a universal rush. Some have rushed to the beer barrel, others to the spirit bottle, and others to the decanter.

Mr. Goschen

All classes seemed to have combined in toasting the prosperity of the country in largely increased quantities of alcohol. I call the special attention of the Committee to this extraordinary circumstance—a circumstance which must be deplored by all—and which places upon the House of Commons and the Government an increasing liability to deal with the question of the consumption of alcoholic liquors. A closer examination of the separate items in the list of alcoholic beverages will not diminish the surprise which I think the House and the public will feel. Of all beverages in the world, the one that shows the greatest increase during the last year is rum. I have taken some pains to find out who drinks the rum. I am told the consumption takes place mainly in seaport towns; and London, being a port, has also contributed largely to this extraordinary increase. The consumption of rum has increased by 12 per cent. in the last financial year. British spirits follow with an increased consumption of over 7 per cent. Brandy follows with an increased consumption of nearly 6 per cent., and other sorts of spirits show an increased consumption of nearly 5 per cent. I cannot exaggerate the impression which these figures make on myself. The more you deal with them the more extraordinary they seem to be. I have attempted to ascertain what this consumption of 12 per cent. additional of rum means if reduced to intelligible proportions. I understand that rum is generally asked for in public houses by the half quartern or half gill, both of which mean about one-eighth of a pint. The retailer is allowed to mix water with the spirit as long as it is not reduced to below 25deg. under proof. Taking these facts into consideration, and bearing in mind that the price of a half gill of rum is about 2½d. or 3d., you will see that the rum consumed in the United Kingdom during the year 1888-9, if it was all drunk in this way, was 245,000,000 drams, and that enormous amount has been increased by 30,000,000 drams during the course of the last financial year. I hope the Committee will feel that this is a matter we ought to look fully in the face. We ought to understand not only what 12 per cent. means when you put it in the bulk, but how it works out in detail. It is an extraordinary historical fact that in the year 1875-6, which was the greatest drinking year on record, there was precisely the same rush, in precisely the same proportions, to these different classes of spirits. At that time, too, the consumers of wine followed generally in the wake of the consumers of spirits and beer. So it appears that, notwithstanding all our efforts in the cause of temperance, increased prosperity does not mean an increased consumption of other great classes of articles, but unfortunately has meant, and does mean, a great increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquors. Wine, which had been at a standstill for a few years, last year exceeded by nearly 10 per cent. the amount consumed in previous years. The consumption of beer has increased about 4 per cent., which is considerably larger than the increase in population, although there has been increase of duty. I saw a somewhat remarkable statement coming from a country brewer, who asserted that if the impost was maintained, the quality of the beer would be deteriorated. Whether that is so or not I cannot say, but at all events the taste for it has not decreased. Let me now descend from these stupendous, these sensational figures, into the more ordinary figures of the Budget. If I run through, as is customary, the various items of Revenue, comparing the receipts with my Estimate, there is a decrease of £17,500 on chicory, coffee, and cocoa; an increase on dried fruits of £49,000; an increase of £421,000 on foreign spirits; a decrease on tea of £220,000; an increase on tobacco of £152,000, and on wine of £120,000, the net increase being about £410,000. Coffee and cocoa are as disappointing as they always have been. I do not think we need pay much attention to the case of dried fruits, as that depends so much upon the crops. The deficiency in the Tea Duty is due to two circumstances. It is due in a great part to the transfer of the purchases from China to Indian tea. That accounts for a very considerable amount. But there is also another circumstance, and that is that the traders have refrained from taking tea out of bond during the last two months, owing to the belief—as to the justification for which, at this moment, I will say nothing --that the duty would be reduced. But taking the Customs as a whole—and I draw attention again to those critics who speak of under-estimating the Revenue—the result is that with an income of upwards of £20,000,000, the total increase is only £400,000, due practically to foreign spirits. Passing now to Inland Revenue, I come to Excise. The excess of Receipts over Estimates is, in the Beer Duty, £270,000; and in spirits, £1,010,000. The Railway Duty shows a small increase of £12,000. In Licences there is a decrease of £32,000. The total receipts from Excise are £24,133,000, as against the estimate of £22,870,000, the increase being entirely due to spirits and wines. I now come to the Death Duties. The Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties yielded £6,056,000, against an estimate of £5,940,000. The new Estate Duty yielded £784,000, as against an estimate of £800,000. I think, looking at the uncertainty of life itself, it is a remarkable fact that there is no estimate more certain of being proved correct at the end of the year than the estimate framed upon Death Duties. It appears to me to be a extraordinary fact that we are able so accurately to estimate what is really a double sum, namely, the number of people who are likely to die in the year, and the fortunes which they will leave, and I may almost say the manner in which they will leave them. But, taken altogether, our Estimates of the Death Duties have been wonderfully correct. The last item under the head of Stamps is general stamps. This item is more difficult to gauge than any other, because, this being upon the transactions of the living, who can foretell at the beginning of the financial year whether speculation will continue on the same basis as it assumed at that time? It would have been difficult to foresee that the rush for forming companies would have been as continuous as it had been during the past year. There are various circumstances which modify the result from stamps, and there is no more uncertain item in the whole of our Revenue. As the result, I am glad to be able to announce that the increase on the whole of these general stamps was £357,000. It may interest the Committee to know that, as regards the Companies' Capital Duty, which I imposed in 1888, and which, I may say, is paid with marvellous cheerfulness by the sanguine promoters of companies, it amounted to £290,000, against an estimate of £180,000, although I had allowed for an increase of £50,000 over the estimate of last year. It has passed through my mind sometimes whether it might not have been better to have put a tax of 2 per cent. instead of 1 per cent. upon this form of industrial activity. I wish the Committee to note that the chief increase took place in the first three quarters of the year. The general stamps have not been so productive during the last quarter. There has been a check in trade, there have been symptoms which do not point to that increase of transactions which has been so useful to the Revenue during the last year. Therefore, though the total for the year is as satisfactory as I have indicated, I think it will be seen that caution will be required as regards general stamps next year. The receipts from the Post Office have exceeded the Estimate by £100,000—a very close calculation. When hon. Members talk of under-estimating the Revenue, they should remember that no credit is due to me, but that great credit is due to the Post Office Authorities for having been able to estimate a Revenue of £9,000,000 within £100,000. In Telegraphs there is an excess of £90,000 on the aggregate sum of £2,230,000. I have one more item. I said that there were two abnormal causes in the receipts of last year. One was the Drink Bill. I spoke of £2,500,000, which leaves a margin of £700,000. I will explain to what cause this is due. It is a windfall which cannot be expected to recur. It is due to the increased profit of the Mint upon the circulation of silver. Practically, the whole is due to that cause. It could not be anticipated at the beginning of the year, because the action which was taken, and which has brought in a profit of £774,000, was not contemplated at that time. The actual profit derived from silver is £774,000, against an Estimate of £200,000. The Committee will remember that there have been continual complaints of an insufficient silver circulation. On the other hand, there was plenty of silver at the Mint, and at the Bank, and every desire to put it into circulation. But somehow or other the conduit pipes by which it passes into circulation seemed to be stopped. The public wanted more silver; we were prepared to issue it, but something seemed to be amiss. On looking carefully into the matter I found that there was a charge of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. upon the freight of silver from London to the provinces, or a charge of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. made by the Bank of England in respect of the transmission of silver from London to provincial banks. And bankers, having no special interest in supplying their customers with silver, shrank from paying the $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and consequently the silver did not flow. I can almost prove that that is the case by showing what occurred when the hitch was removed. Seeing that it was desirable, as the country wished for silver, to let the country have the silver, I authorised the payment of the $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. by the State. It was an infinitesimal sacrifice, but the removal of the charge set the flow of silver free, and has put us in the position of being able to show such a satisfactory result at the end of the year. There was also an increase in wages, which made the moment favourable for an increase in the circulation of silver. I do not think that there have been many complaints that too much silver was put into circulation. On the contrary, I occasionally hear still of the want of shillings and sixpences in various parts of the country. The Committee will remember that it is not the duty of the State to supply people with silver, but that silver must be asked for through the banks, or through the ordinary channels, before it is obtained. There is no State process for the issue of silver except so far as we can pay it out to our own workmen. That is what we have done, to some extent, taking care that there should be no complaint or abuse. We also prevented the increase, to any great extent, of the most expensive coin in the world—namely, the half sovereign. We have been charged with diminishing the amount in circulation of that most useful coin, but we have not diminished the amount. All that we have done is rather to check the fresh issue of a coin on which the annual loss is as great as it is on the sovereign itself.

Mr. Goschen

We have made a profit on silver, and thus lightened the work which we have to perform with regard to the withdrawal of light gold. The total amount of silver issued in 1889-90 was £2,304,000. Without being carried into detail, the Committee may like to know the comparison of the total Revenues of the past year with those of its predecessor, in order to see what expansion there has been. Apart from those special causes which I have enumerated, apart from the non-tax Revenue, and making the necessary allowances for the increase in the Beer and Estates Duties put on last year, the result of the comparison is as follows:—The Customs show an increase of £453,000; the Excise, an increase of £1,326,000; stamps—so far as regards the Death Duties—an increase of £354,000; and the remainder an increase of £516,000, which is due to general stamps. The Land Tax and houses show an increase of £44,000, and the Income Tax an increase of £295,000. The total increase is £2,988,000, or, in round figures, £3,000,000. I want to call the attention of the Committee to these figures. In the composition of that sum of £3,000,000 they will observe that the increase in the Customs and Excise receipts counts for £1,800,000, while the increase in what we call direct Revenue, that is, Stamps, has been £870,000, and in the Income Tax £295,000—figures small in comparison to the great increase which has taken place in the amounts derived from indirect taxation. I have now completed, and, I hope, made clear to the Committee, the results of the past year as far as Expenditure and Revenue are concerned. I now put the two amounts together. We allowed for a margin of Revenue over Expenditure of £183,000, and the Revenue exceeded the Estimates by £3,154,000, an excess altogether of £3,337,000. On the other hand, the Expenditure exceeded the Estimate by £116,000, so that the real surplus of last year is £3,221,000. I am also able to make a satisfactory statement with regard to another important part of the finance of the year. I wish to say a few words about the general reduction of the Debt of the State. I suppose the story to be told in that respect will be satisfactory, unless, indeed, there be Members of this House, or of the outside public, who think that money may be better spent than in reducing the enormous liabilities which still lie upon us with regard to our National Debt. We have diminished our liabilities during the last three years, I think I may say, "by leaps and bounds." Last year I was able to inform the Committee that the round sum provided out of taxation for the reduction of the Debt in the years 1887-88 and 1888-89 had been £15,000,000, or an average of £7,500,000. I have more than kept up the average during the past year. I am able to show a reduction in the Debt of upwards of £8,000,000. In the year the Funded Debt was diminished by £20,944,000; on the other hand, the Unfunded Debt was increased by £16,159,000; so that the two Debts together were reduced by £4,785,000. To this total we have to add the diminished liability in respect of Terminable Annuities of £3,510,000, thus leaving the total reduction for the year £8,295,000. We have also diminished our liabilities in other respects. The Savings Bank deficiency is reduced by £260,000. On the other hand the Exchequer Balance, to which I shall have to refer hereafter, is reduced by £270,000; so that the total amount by which our liabilities were reduced last year is £8,200,000. I will also state what will be the amount paid out of Revenue in the last financial year in reducing our capital liabilities, or applicable to that purpose. By Annuities and the Sinking Fund we have diminished the Debt in 1889-90 by £5,062,000. We have further to apply in redemption of the Debt the balance of Revenue over Expenditure in 1889-90, which constitutes the old Sinking Fund of that year, amounting to £3,221,000. So that the total cash applied, or applicable, belonging to 1889-90 amounts to £8,283,000. The amount of Debt which we have reduced in three years is £23,323,000—the largest amount that the Debt has ever been reduced in three consecutive years. This statement, however, is incomplete without an explanation of the position of the balances. Our balance at the commencement of the year was

Mr. Goschen

£5,592,000; on March 31 it stood at £5,220,000, or less than at the beginning by £372,000. Yet we received £3,221,000 by the excess of Revenue over Expenditure. This requires explanation. In order to meet the temporary requirements of the War Office and the Admiralty under the Imperial Defence Act, we have temporarily taken out of the balances £500,000 for the War Office, and £337,000 for the Admiralty. We have also taken for redemption and conversion purposes about £1,678,000. We did not fully replace the Exchequer Bills presented for payment by £192,000. We advanced on account of bullion purchases more than we repaid by £150,000. On the other hand, there was paid into the balances, in respect of the Sardinian Loan, £53,000. The Revenue exceeded the Expenditure by £3,221,000. If we deduct this amount paid into our balances from the amount taken out, the result is that we arrive at the £372,000 already mentioned, which is the sum by which our balance has to be restored. It will be seen that the large excess of Revenue over Expenditure has assisted us in the redemption operations, and has enabled us to defray the Expenditure under the Imperial Defence Act without borrowing. Of course, I need not tell the Committee that we do not intend to deplete our balances permanently by the amounts I have mentioned. We shall have to borrow the sums issued under the Imperial Defence Act, in 1888-9 and 1889-90, for the Army and Navy, amounting together to £1,497,000. We shall also have to make good a portion of the money taken out of balances for redemption and conversion purposes. I am sorry to trouble the Committee with these banking details, but these financial statements are sometimes referred to in the future, and it is customary to explain the balances. But it is a somewhat tedious process, and leaving these details, I come to some larger and much more interesting figures. It may be remembered that at the close of the Conversion operations in 1888 we were left with a balance of Three per Cent. Stocks which had to be dealt with in accordance with the notice given in July of that year. The amount of the old Three per Cent. Stock outstanding on November 5, 1888, was, in Consols and Reduced Threes together, £42,325,000. In the course of the next eight months, by the action of the Sinking Fund, the amount redeemed was £1,356,000. Therefore, the amount which had to be specially dealt with was, in round figures, £41,000,000. This was the sum we were pledged to deal with under the Notice of July 6, 1888. I admit it looked a very formidable operation to oblige one's self to pay off £41,000,000, unless they should be converted into new Stock, and as by that time the new Stock stood 1 or 2 per cent. below par, it was doubtful whether any large portion of that £41,000,000 would be automatically converted. I will not say I did not pass through some moments of anxiety. At one time the Money Market made me rather uncomfortable. I will admit that sometimes the large proportions of that sum did cause me some feelings of anxiety; but the resources of the country were so great and its credit was so enormous as to enable me to borrow any sum which might be necessary. The resources of the National Debt Commissioners especially were exceedingly useful. I am now in a position to state how we dealt with the £41,000,000 which has been finally disposed of and wiped out altogether. We paid off in cash £24,378,000, of which the National Debt Commissioners supplied us with £10,800,000; and I had no difficulty in borrowing the remainder. There were exchanged for new Stock by the National Debt Commissioners on the 5th of July, 1889, £8,164,000—an amount which they had bought from their own resources in the course of the year with a view to their conversion into new Stock, and whereby I was relieved from the necessity of paying cash to that amount. There were automatically converted into new Stock on the 5th of October, 1889, £8,426,000. Thus, out of £41,000,000 about £8,000,000 were converted, and the balance of the old Stock, £41,000,000, has now finally and completely disappeared. The Committee will like to know how much the Unfunded Debt in the hands of the public has increased in consequence of the Conversion and Redemption operations. On the 30th of March, 1888, about £14,000,000 were so held, and there are now held by the public about £23,500,000. In other words, our liability towards the public in respect of short or Floating Securities has been increased by £9,500,000. On the other hand, during these two years the Funded Debt has been decreased by £28,500,000; and as the amount of Stocks held by the National Debt Commissioners is larger by £13,000,000 than it was two years ago, our liability towards the public in respect of Funded Debt has been decreased by over £40,000,000. I do not pass away from this subject without offering a tribute of gratitude, not only to the Governor and Deputy Governor and Directors of the Bank of England, who have seconded our efforts with unwearying care, but also to the staff of that establishment, in which these gigantic operations have been carried out without a single hitch, and, as I believe, without a single error and with the fewest possible complaints. I have completed my review, I hope not entirely uninteresting, of the finance of the past year. Before I finally close the history of the last year I wish to state how I propose to deal with the question of light gold. The Committee will remember I stated we had had a windfall in a profit on silver, a sum of from £600,000 to £700,000. I think that nothing can be more proper than to allow the silver to pay for the gold. We propose to establish a Coinage Fund and to credit it with the £600,000. I propose in a few days to introduce a Bill to carry this out. I will just state, what bankers will be anxious to learn, what has happened with regard to the pre-Victorian coins. When it was determined to take these coins in hand it was estimated that there were in circulation 4,295,500 sovereigns and 314,000 half-sovereigns. It was expected that there would be sent in for exchange 2,169,800 sovereigns and all the half-sovereigns; and the cost of renewing these coins was estimated at £50,000, for which a Vote was taken last summer. The amount of coins received by the Bank of England up to the 2nd of April was 2,071,000 sovereigns (nearly the exact Estimate) and 210,000 half-sovereigns. The greater part of these coins has been sent to and weighed by the Mint, and, according to the present calculations, the loss per sovereign proves to be 4·7d., as against an estimated loss of 4·6d., and per half-sovereign to be 6d., as compared with an estimated loss of 5·9d.; and, accordingly, the total deficiency to be made good on the coins presented at the Bank for exchange has been £44,000, against an Estimate of £50,000. I am now able to approach what is a more interesting subject—namely, that of the Revenue and the Expenditure of the coming year. The Committee are acquainted with most of the Expenditure, as I have given the figures of the Expenditure of the coming year in the Paper in the hands of hon. Members, so as to facilitate reference. The total Consolidated Services amount to £28,308,000, being £18,000 more than last year; the addition in the Supply Service, gives a total of £58,319,000, being £568,000 more than the Exchequer itself issued last year, so that the whole calculated Expenditure amounts to £86,627,000, as against £86,083,000, being an excess of £544,000. I have nothing new to say with regard to this Expenditure. The House knows that the chief excess is due to the Army Estimates. The Post Office and Telegraph Services account for £150,000 more Expenditure, but this increased Expenditure is more than compensated for by the estimated increase of Revenue. I ought, perhaps, to say that the Expenditure would be £265,000 larger but for the fact that the Scotch grants have been dropped in consequence of the transfer of Scotch licences to the Scotch Local Authorities. When I come to the licences it will be seen that there is a corresponding or larger decrease, owing to the transfer of these licences to the Scotch Authorities. The House will also call to mind that this is not the total expenditure, because you have to add to the items of expenditure £160,000 in respect of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, and also £40,000 as representing the gain to which Ireland is entitled in common with England and Scotland, as her share derived from the transfer of licences to the Local Authorities. There is also an Estimate of £30,000, which some hon. Members may have seen, for additional requirements in Bechuanaland. That brings up the total Expenditure to £86,857,000, and that is the Expenditure which we have to meet. Now, I ask the Committee in what spirit am I to approach the Estimates? I have now the duty of framing my Estimates for the coming year. Am I to approach them in an optimistic spirit or to proceed with the same caution which I am blamed for having displayed on previous occasions? I have made many inquiries in many quarters as to the prospect of trade and industry and of general commercial activity for the coming year, and I am bound to say that the answers I have received recommend caution rather than sanguineness. [Opposition cheers.] I ask those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who cheer that sentiment, to be good enough to remember next year, if I again have to present a satisfactory balance-sheet, that they share at the moment when the Estimates are framed, the temper in which I consider the Estimates ought to be drawn up. Seriously, I think that it would be an error to say that we can prudently count upon a continuance of that progressive prosperity which I trust we may continue to enjoy, and of that speculative activity which has characterised a part of the past financial year. We know that the price of iron has largely fallen, and we know that there has been a check in the shipbuilding trade. We know that the Stock Exchange transactions are not so many; we know that speculation for the moment has calmed down, and though we may hope that the relations between capital and labour, which were so strained at one time during the past financial year, may continue in a state of harmony and concord; still trade is disorganised occasionally by the strikes which take place; and, indeed, I am told that blows have been struck in some parts of the country to industrial enterprise by the unfortunate differences which have taken place. I do not dwell upon that particular circumstance, but I do dwell upon the whole circumstances of the position, and I say that, while I trust we may have prosperous times, we must proceed with caution, because it is possible we may not have that progressive prosperity with which we have been blessed during the past financial year. It is clear that we must look upon the great articles of consumption with caution. As regards tea and tobacco, and the other items, we cannot count upon any large increase. I ask again, then, in what spirit are we to frame the Estimates? As regards alcoholic beverages, I decline to increase the Estimate over the result of the receipts of the past year. I may be wrong. It may be that there will be still a continuance of the increase produced by rum, brandy, and other intoxicating liquors. I will go further, and say that I believe there will be an increase during the next few months in respect of those articles. That is highly probable, but I do not think that such increase will extend over the whole year. When we come to those months where the greatest increase took place last year, I do not think that there can be a cumulative force in this tendency to spend so much of our increased prosperity in augmenting the general drink bill of the country. As regards wages, it is generally true that there is not a decline in the rate of wages directly prosperity begins to flag, and it may be said that you can count for some time upon a continuance of those high wages which have enabled the working classes to consume largely during the past year. But the sum of the wages to be expended does not only depend upon the rate of wage, but upon the continuance of employment of the workmen, and although we may all hope that there may be that continuance of employment, still I say it is in a spirit of caution with regard to the future that I think we ought to act. Let me run through the various heads of Revenue. I have not framed these Estimates in any pessimistic spirit. I will only suggest that it is just possible that we shall only have to mark time. As regards the Customs Receipts on coffee and its satellites, I am not permitted to expect any increase. The history of the past shows that it would be injudicious to do so. In fact, my advisers say that we should estimate about £3,000 less for coffee and £3,000 more for cocoa. On dried fruits I estimate an increase of £14,000. Tobacco, looking at its history for the last two or three years, I estimate to give an increase of £213,000, that is about 2 per cent. on the present importation, while the increase of the population is only at the rate of 1 per cent. As regards tea, I assume that there will be a further transfer from China to Indian and Ceylon tea. I assume that 10,000,000lb. of China tea will be displaced by 7,000,000lb. of Indian and Ceylon tea—a very satisfactory prospect for India, and also a very satisfactory prospect in this respect—namely, that this Indian tea makes so many more cups of tea per pound, in the proportion of ten to seven, so that, practically, tea has been cheapened to the working classes by the displacement by Indian of China tea, if the middleman would only give sufficient influence to this greater cheapness owing to the discovery and development of this great branch of our Indian trade. That diminished consumption of tea is equivalent to about 3,000,000lb., representing a loss of £75,000 in Revenue. On the other hand, we have the fact that tea was not withdrawn in its usual quantities during the last two months of this year in anticipation that the Tea Duty would be reduced. ["Hear, hear," from the Front Opposition Bench.] I hear a smile passing over the face of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Laughter.] It was an audible smile. [Laughter.] During those two months we estimate that tea was not withdrawn to the amount of £140,000, which, if it had been paid, would have swollen the Receipts of the last year. Now it will come in in the current year. Looking to these two counterbalancing effects, I add about £220,000 to the Estimates. On wine I will take an increase of about £10,000. But spirits, for the reason that I have mentioned, I decline to put at a higher figure than the enormous amount realised last year. In fact, foreign spirits I put at £80,000 lower than the amount received last year, while, on the other hand, British spirits I expect to increase by £40,000, with the reason for which I will not trouble the Committee. The Total Receipts from Customs I put at £20,836,000, or about £375,000 more than last year. I now approach the Excise. Beer has been expanding, and I believe that we are justified in reckoning upon a slight further expansion. I place the Estimate at £9,650,000, which is £240,000 more than the net Receipts of last year. While I have taken off £80,000 from foreign spirits I put on £40,000 on British spirits, putting my Estimate at £13,900,000. The Railway Duty I estimate at £330,000. When I come to the licences, I find that the miserable remnant left me by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board is still further reduced by £318,000, which I had to take off for the Scotch licences, and I am only left with £220,000 under this head as a source of Imperial Revenue. The total Excise Revenue I put at £24,108,000, against the net Receipts of last year of £24,133,000, or less by £24,000. But for the loss of licences there would be an increase of £286,000. Again, I think the Committee will see that I have proceeded with caution, but not with undue caution, in my Estimates, unless they take a different view from me as regards alcohol beverages. I now pass to the Death Duties and the duties from general stamps. The new Estate Duty last year yielded £784,000, but it did not come into operation at the beginning of the financial year, and, therefore, it will give more in the coming year. I expect to receive £1,070,000 from this source. The Probate Duties I put at £2,400,000 for half the duty; the other half goes to the Local Authorities. Here, again, I must congratulate my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board on the good bargain that was made for his Department. The original estimate of the half of the Probate Duty that we parted with was £2,130,000—that half now is £2,400,000; so that the Local Authorities derive a benefit from the progressive nature of the tax in these two years of £270,000. By a strange coincidence that is the precise amount which the Wheel and Van Tax was expected to realise. The Legacy Duty is put at £2,840,000 as compared with £2,770,000—an increase of £70,000. The Succession Duty is naturally creeping up under the changes that have been made. The proceeds last year exceeded those of the previous year by £144,000. I assume an increase of £100,000 next year, and I put the amount at £1,150,000. Now I come to general stamps, and after the remarks that I have made on the general state of trade, on the position of the Stock Exchange, and the best forecast I can make, I find that I should not be justified in calculating upon any increase of Revenue from general stamps. The general stamps last year amounted to £6,157,000. I take the round sum of £6,140,000 as the general stamps for next year. The total Stamp Duties, including the Death Duties, I put at £13,642,000, as against the Receipts last year of £13,040,000—an increase of £600,000, of course entirely due to the increase put upon the Death Duties. The Land Tax I put at £1,030,000, or less than last year by £18,000, and the House Duty of £2,000,000—an increase of £22,000. I come now to an interesting item—the Property and Income Tax—and there I think I am justified in being more sanguine than I have been with regard to most of the items through which I have passed, because there we have safer grounds to go upon, as we have the advantage of the three years average. My forecast is not only prospective, for I can take a review of the general situation of the last three years, and I find we have now come upon an average of good years and are beginning to get rid of the bad years. That being so I put my estimate at £13,200,000, which is £430,000 more than last year. When I put this before the House last year I said I framed my estimates with some hesitation. I considered I was doing rather a bold thing in putting the yield of ld. Income Tax from £2,020,000 to £2,100,000. This estimate has been more than justified by the expanding prosperity of the country, and this year I feel justified, from all that I have seen and heard with regard to this source of Revenue, in putting my estimate at £2,200,000, which gives a total for the 6d. of £13,200,000. The vast increase in the proceeds of the ld. as compared with the estimate put upon it by the late Sir Robert Peel in 1844 of £800,000 will be apparent to the public at large. It denotes the enormous power of this great fiscal engine—the Income Tax—which enables us, by the increase of ld. alone, to find a source of Revenue equal to upwards of £2,000,000 sterling. As regards the non-Tax Revenue, I have conferred with the Post Office Authorities, and I feel justified in putting my Estimate at £9,750,000, an increase of £300,000 on the Exchequer Receipts of last year. Of course, it is not all profit, though it goes to swell the Revenue. You must deduct the corresponding item of increased charge on the other side. Telegraphs I propose to estimate at £2,470,000, which is £150,000 more than last year. Crown Lands remain the same as before—£430,000; and the interest on advances I put at £240,000. So far, the Committee will see that I have made good progress. When I come to the Miscellaneous Revenue I lose that profit on silver which I had last year. Stripped of that Revenue, I am not able to put it higher than £2,700,000, which is less than last year by £711,000. The decrease under Miscellaneous Items affects the whole of our receipts from non-Tax Revenue, and the non-Tax Revenue altogether I can only estimate at £15,590,000, as against last year £15,890,000, a decrease of £300,000. If I now add all the non-Tax Revenue and the Tax Revenue together, I get a total estimated at £90,406,000, against the Exchequer Receipts of last year of £89,304,000, which shows that I build upon an increase of £1,102,000. A more interesting comparison is obtained by setting my estimated Revenue against estimated Expenditure. The estimated Revenue is £90,406,000, and the estimated Expenditure is £86,857,000, and I find that I am left with a surplus of £3,549,000, of which I have to dispose. Now, I come to what is, perhaps, as embarrassing a part of my task as if I had to impose taxation, namely, the use of this excess of Revenue over estimated expenditure. I propose, in the first instance, to deduct from this amount the sum which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War tells me he can spend on barracks during the coming year. This brings me to explain how we propose to deal with that matter. The Committee will remember that there is a Bill before the House for spending £4,000,000 on barracks. I have conferred with my right hon. Friend as to how this sum shall be met. We have taken powers in the Bill for borrowing money in future years, but not in the present year. What is wanted this year will come out of the annual Revenue. But as regards the following years and the bulk of the expenditure we shall deal with it on the analogy of the Military Forces Localisation Act of 1872. That Act contemplated barracks, storehouses, and buildings of that kind; and the amount, if I remember rightly, was £3,500,000. The reason then given for proceeding by loan—for under the Act power was given to borrow the whole—was that the Government had incurred at that time a very heavy abnormal charge for Army Purchase. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, speaking at Chester the other day, said—

Mr. Goschen

Mr. Goschen

"He would not grudge a large expenditure upon barracks, but he hoped resort would not be had to the somewhat cowardly practice of casting the burden on coming years. That had been done before, but it had been done when an enormous expenditure had been incurred out of the Annual Votes upon the abolition of purchase."

But the largest annual Vote under the abolition of purchase was about £900,000, and the heavy annual extra payment incurred last year for Naval Defences was larger than that sum by £500,000, so that we, too, are precisely in the same position as the Government of 1872-3. That is, that we have undertaken this large work for the improvement of our barracks at a time when we are making special efforts in another direction. But the Revenue was as prosperous then as it is now. At that time, too, there was a surplus, and the circumstances are thoroughly analogous. But we do intend to spend such an amount as can be spent this year, out of current Revenue, and therefore I trust my right hon. Friend will not think that we are cowardly in this respect. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War tells me that what he can spend this year is £300,000. I have not asked him to cut down the sum to a minimum, but I asked him to tell me frankly the maximum; and he states that £300,000 will be as much as will be likely to be spent in the present year. One word as to the general charge that some right hon. Gentlemen made against us, that we are having large recourse to borrowing. Whatever may be our plans, at all events up to the present we have not incurred any censure in that respect. We have estimated the Naval Annuity, which amounts to £1,429,000 in every year, over a moderate number of years. But in this first year it has proved, as we knew it would prove, more than enough to cover the expenditure of the year; and, in fact, under the Naval Defence Act we have levied from the taxpayer in the past year about £1,000,000 sterling more than the Admiralty were able to pay out. Therefore, so far from having incurred any debt up to the present, we have paid our way with regard to the naval defences, and have carried a certain sum forward to next year. Hon. Members will now deduct the £300,000 required by the War Office, and they will find the surplus reduced to £3,249,000. I now come to a matter which will, perhaps, interest hon. Members more deeply even than the barracks scheme, looking to the interest which has been taken in all parts of the House in the question. It is connected also with the Services. The House recently agreed to a Resolution calling upon the Government to supply to the Volunteers certain articles of equipment, and on full consideration of this decision we now propose to accept the Resolution, and to set aside a sum of £100,000 out of the surplus to meet that demand. I leave it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War to find a further sum of £50,000 out of his resources; and it appears to us that the sum of £150,000 will enable us substantially to give effect to the Resolution which has been passed by the House. But until certain inquiries are completed it will not be possible to give full details. The Government are glad in this way to be able to meet the wishes expressed by Parliament for further assistance to this valuable Force; but I think it is right to remind the Committee that every new grant made to the Volunteers must necessarily carry with it some corresponding increase of Government control, and that Parliament, in sanctioning increased expenditure, will require to be satisfied that it obtains a fair return in the improved efficiency and heightened value of the Force. I have therefore deducted another sum of £100,000 from the surplus, and I have asked myself how I should deal with the remainder. If we were to look simply to popularity, I believe there is nothing we could do that would more satisfy, I will not say legitimate, but illegitimate public opinion than if we were to spend a very large portion of the surplus. I call to mind all the demands made upon us from various quarters. I call to mind what the men of science have asked us to do. I call to mind what the artists have asked us to do, and what the educationists have asked us to do. If any collection of pictures is offered for sale we are denounced if we do not immediately purchase it. Every collection

Mr. Goschen

I am told is one which ought to be at once secured for the nation. If we have valuable sites we are told it is niggardly on our part if we do not erect magnificent public buildings upon them at the earliest possible moment. We are asked more largely to endow Universities. We are asked more largely to endow Technical Institutions. We are asked more largely to endow Intermediate Education; and now we shall be asked what we propose to do with regard to assisted education. To meet half the demands made upon us, I believe £2,000,000 of this surplus would soon be scattered. Possibly the money would be well employed, but it would soon be scattered, and the burdens of the people would not be lightened. We think that we have done a great deal in meeting the fair demands that have been made upon us. The other day we bought land at Kensington for £100,000. We have taken a new departure in giving sums to a number of new and valuable colleges. We have been more generous to the National Gallery and the British Museum. We have done a great deal. Though there may be at this moment rather a flow of opinion in the direction of extravagance and an inclination to call everything niggardly which does not correspond to the wishes of those who desire this expenditure — notwithstanding this, I think it would not be right to allow all these claimants to dip their hands ad libitum into the Treasury chest. As long as I retain my office I shall think it my duty, on the whole, to sit tight upon the lid of that chest. But it may be said that we have been extravagant in other directions. There are men who think that while we have been economical in some respects we have been extravagant as regards the Army and Navy. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad to hear that that cheer was not a very general cheer. We have not been extravagant as regards the Army and Navy, if we have only done those things which were imperatively necessary in the interests of the country. I would frankly say that when I leave my office I shall look back with some pleasure on having diminished our national liabilities through the conversion of the National Debt; but I shall also look back with pleasure, and with no apology whatever to the fact that, notwithstanding that I have been Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have agreed to large proposals which I believe will have the effect of strengthening the defences of this country. I think a Chancellor of the Exchequer is one of the last Ministers who ought to be indifferent to the absolute security of our shores and the security of our commerce. What would be the effect upon our Revenue of even panic preparations? What would be the waste of money and the expense the moment the slightest panic occurred? But if the panic should be of a more real character, then every one knows that in a country like this, dependent as we are on other countries for our food supply, and dependent, too, upon that credit which is the mainspring of our commerce, I think it almost baffles the imagination to think of the consequences of a real, serious panic at the present moment when the whole edifice of our commerce and trade is built up upon credit. I think myself, and I say it in great frankness, that our bankers and merchants trade with too little reserve, and I think that the reserves of the supplies in this country are also reduced to an insecure amount. Looking to all this, I believe the Government have done no more than their duty in availing themselves of a portion of the great resources which the country has placed at our command in doing what we can to strengthen and improve our Army and Navy. We have done much. I will not recapitulate what we have done with regard to the Navy. As regards the Army, we have armed the infantry with a new magazine rifle. We have supplied the artillery with new guns. We shall have fortified our coaling stations by the end of this year. We shall have improved the defences of our Imperial Ports. We shall have done all this, and I say we have no apology to make for the large sums which we have had to impose upon the people for all these purposes, although we would gladly have used them to reduce the burdens which the people cheerfully bear. We must admit them to be heavy burdens, and we will lighten them as soon as it is possible for us to do so. I have said that, notwithstanding our surplus, we do not intend to listen to any proposals of extravagance. But I believe that in the proposal I am now going to make I shall have cordial support from all Members of the Committee. We propose, if we can persuade other interested parties to do so, to deal with the question of the postage to India and our colonies, and to reduce all rates, by whatever route, to 2½d.—not ocean postage only, but postage by the quickest route. The existing rates to Australia, India, China, and the Cape range from 5d. to 6d., and the House is also aware that in the case of some of these letters they would be transmitted cheaper to their destination if they were posted abroad. No doubt it is a great anomaly that if letters are sent to Calais they can be posted to our officers at Quetta or in Burma more cheaply than if they were posted at a British post office. We propose, therefore, to remove these anomalies if we can persuade the other interested parties to join us, because we cannot act in this matter without the cordial co-operation of the colonies themselves. The ocean penny postage has been recommended very much on the ground that it would draw us closer to the colonies; but it would be a very unsatisfactory beginning to such a proceeding if we were to embark upon a cheapening of postage to which the colonies themselves were opposed. My right hon. Friend the Postmaster General will place himself in communication at once with the Agents of the colonies, and he will see, with every hope of success, whether they can be induced to reduce the postage in the future to 2½d. by whatever route the letters may be sent. The loss which would be incurred by this process would be £80,000 in the present year. It would be £105,000 in a complete year. But I think £80,000 will cover it in the present year, looking to the negotiations which will take place. Now, I intended to explain to the Committee how this loss would arise. But, looking to the ground which I have still to traverse, they will excuse me if I do not defend the proposal more than by making this statement. I can only say this: that we must assume this loss, because we cannot recoup ourselves on letters which go by the quickest route by any increased correspondence. We have to pay an amount equal to 1d. for the foreign transit, and the cost of the letter in this country and in the colonies or in India is taken to be even more than 1½d. Thus, if you add 1d. to the 1½d., the cost of the postage will be more than 2½d., or at least fully 2½d., and we cannot expect to recoup ourselves. But I have little doubt that the Committee generally will be prepared to make this sacrifice out of Revenue for the purpose of removing anomalies and securing cheaper communication with India. India will also have to be consulted on the proposal. We are at present in communication with her on the subject. So far I have spoken of increased expenditure, namely, that for barracks, Volunteers, and postage. I now come to the point of remissions of taxation. But, still, I must ask hon. Members to be patient while I deal, only in a word or two, with some very humble claims for relief. The Committee will think that it is the duty of a Chancellor of the Exchequer quite as much to look to humble claims to relief, if there is any hardship or injustice, as to deal with larger questions. Apprentices have to pay a stamp of 2s. 6d. on their agreements, provided no premium is paid. If a premium is paid they have to pay the heavy duty of 5s. for every £5. If there is a premium of £20 they must pay £1. This appears to me a great hardship, and I propose that on no agreement of apprenticeship shall there be a higher stamp than 2s. 6d. Then, take the case of insurance policies. Life insurance policies are only subject to 1d.; but health insurances, which provide that if a man falls sick he is to receive a certain sum during his illness, have to pay a 6d. Stamp Duty. It has been represented to me by the Societies interested that this is a hardship, and I propose to remove it by putting health policies on the same footing as other policies. I mention these matters, not as being of fiscal importance, but to give them the publicity they deserve. Quite apart from larger questions, I propose a slight change in charging the Income Tax as between different schedules. Complaints have been made that when a man loses under Schedule A he is not allowed to set off that loss under Schedule D. So it happens sometimes that a man who has lost heavily on his farm has to pay full duty on the profits of his business without being allowed to deduct the loss on his farm. That I intend to put right by allowing the loss under one schedule to be set off against the profits of another schedule. There will be no appreciable loss under these heads, and I merely mention them for the purpose of giving them publicity. The first serious inroad which I propose to make on my surplus is a change involving the remission of the duty on gold and silver plate—a change which, I believe, has been expected, and I will not conceal from myself that it is not pleasant for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to part with a tax which is paid with the greatest possible cheerfulness by those who have to pay it. There is a positive alacrity on the part of the chief members of the trade in paying the Plate Duties, and they are protesting in advance against their abolition, and I must, therefore, make out some case why we propose the abolition of these duties. The first shake was given to them by the Report of the Select Committee of 1878-9, of which I was myself a member. They recommended as follows:—That “Whenever the condition of the Revenue will permit the duty upon silver plate should be abolished.”

Mr. Goschen

The Committee were moved to make this recommendation by the consideration of the unequal incidence of the duty and the great proportion it bore (nearly 40 per cent.) to the raw material, and the importance of promoting the use of silver as an article of manufacture. The Indian community soon fastened on the suggestion of the Committee. I think myself that India has attached almost undue importance to the abolition of these duties. But the fact remains that they do attach enormous importance to the abolition of the Plate Duty. They consider it will have an effect upon the price of silver, and will enable them to send more articles of manufactured silver to this country, though I think they are rather sanguine in their expectations. It might be contended, and I have heard it argued, that we ought not to look to the wishes or expectations of India, but to British interests alone. But the argument had been rather cut away from under our feet by the recollection in India of a transaction which they consider to have been unfair to themselves, justly or unjustly I will not say. But they consider that the duty upon the imports of British cotton goods was promoted and carried rather with a view to British interests than to Indian interests, and they have made a kind of passionate claim in return that in this matter of Plate Duties we should consider the interests of India. Now, they have had a good deal to go upon with regard to declarations made by various Chancellors of the Exchequer. The abolition of the duty was recommended without hesitation by the recent Royal Commission upon Gold and Silver as a practical measure for diminishing the difficulties of India. It is difficult in the face of a recommendation of that kind, coming from a strong Commission, to resist that pressure. I mention it because, as I say, we must have strong arguments for the repeal of a duty, the repeal of which is opposed by the trade of silversmiths in England itself. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian handled the subject in 1881, and proposed to reduce the duties gradually. He would have preferred an immediate reduction, but he shrank from it on account of the drawback, which then was estimated to amount to £170,000. The right hon. Gentleman subsequently withdrew his proposal, but referred to the matter again the next year. From that time to this the matter has been in suspense. My right hon. Friend, speaking of this duty, said—

"The state in which it was left perplexes the market, places transactions upon old plate on an embarrassed footing, inflicts much mischief and limitation on the industry, and possibly tends to lower the standard of our manufactured goods, whilst obstructing the taste in design."

With all these declarations before us, I said last year that I should wish to adopt the recommendations of the Royal Commission to abolish the Silver Plate Duty, but that I had no means at my command to make up for the loss and also to meet the demand on the drawback. Now that the moment has come, I consider we are practically bound, by all that has occurred in the past, to take the bull by the horns and to deal with the duty on this footing. Viceroy of India and ex-Viceroy of India have all attached the greatest importance to this matter; and it would create a serious disappointment in India if we were not to deal with the matter. But, it may be asked, if we propose the abolition of the duty on silver plate, why should we abolish the duty on gold plate? The duty on gold articles amounts to a very small sum.

The House will be amused to learn that the greatest portion of the duty on gold plate is paid by wedding rings. Three-fourths and more of the duty, amounting to £23,300, on gold plate come from the duty paid by this most necessary article of civilised society. Otherwise gold plate is so small an item that, practically, no revenue whatever is derived from it. Nor would the question of drawback arise in the case of gold plate, and I propose no drawback. As regards silver plate, the amount of drawback involved I put at £120,000, which I add to the £80,000 we shall lose by the abolition of the Gold and Silver Plate Duties. The drawback used to be estimated at £170,000. But the uncertainty of the trade has prevented the accumulation of stocks, and I feel confident that £120,000 is a fair sum. But we do not propose to pay any amount of drawback which may be claimed. We shall take £120,000 as a maximum, and arrangements will then be made, which shall be stated later in detail, for paying the drawback on the stocks in the hands of dealers, provided they have not passed into use. I am told that it will be possible to get a perfect statement of the whole of the silver plate on which drawback may be claimed. If the claims should exceed £120,000, then a corresponding diminution will be made upon the drawback claimed, so that the sum which the State will have to pay shall in no case exceed £120,000. The Royal Commission said that we should not pay more than three years' drawback, and it will be seen that £120,000 is about two years' drawback upon silver plate, because the amount of Silver Plate Duty is about £60,000. I have now arrived at a point when I must attack the bulk of my subject. I trust that hon. Members will not feel that I have unduly trespassed upon their attention in explaining these smaller items of remission. I have, of course, to think not only of the audience listening to me now, but also of those outside who are interested in silver plate or any of the other matters which I have touched upon. They require a rather full statement, and I was therefore bound to make it, although it may be somewhat wearisome. I now come to the larger remissions. After deducting the barrack expenditure my surplus stand at £3,249,000. I have further disposed of £100,000 for Volunteers, £60,000 for reduced postage, and £200,000 for silver plate, leaving me in possession of £2,869,000, but after having read so much during a portion of this year about the gigantic sums that would be at my disposal, I confess that the proportions of that surplus appear to me to be very modest, when I have to set against this amount the number of claimants who have already put forward their claims to remission. There are the advocates of the abolition of the Tea Duty, but the abolition of that duty would mean a sacrifice of revenue of £4,900,000. Then someone spoke of a reduction of 2d. on the Income Tax. That would mean a sacrifice of £4,000,000. Then there are others who are not only anxious for a free breakfast table, but for free pudding as well, and who desire the abolition of the duty on all dried fruits. Then there are my friends who are interested in the brewing trade. They consider that they are entitled to the remission of the 3d. per barrel imposed last year. Then there are the County Councils, who ask that we should hand over to them the House Duty, there are other persons asking for this modest trifle of £2,000,000, and others suggesting that the whole of the duty should be remitted. Well, I ask, what is my surplus amongst so many? I will proceed to consider the various claims that may be met; but instead of approaching the task with the feeling that I am going to give satisfaction to any of the claimants, I feel that the amount to be divided is comparatively so small that I shall create much disappointment in apportioning it. I first turn to the question as between direct and indirect taxation. It has been suggested that the present Government have favoured more than they ought the payers of Income Tax. A right hon. Gentleman opposite considered that we had unduly favoured the payers of Income Tax by reducing the tax from 8d. to 6d., but I hold that in having done so we have simply restored the status quo. The extra 2d. was imposed for a special purpose at a special time when there were special exigencies, and it should be remembered that at that time a proposal had been made to increase indirect taxation, which proposal was, however, withdrawn. Therefore, I consider that we have in no way altered the status quo as regards direct and indirect taxation or favoured direct taxation by the course which we have taken. Again, it must be remembered that we imposed an additional duty, the Estate Duty, upon real and personal property. Looking, then, at all the circumstances I do not think that we have altered the status quo. Hon. Members may ask, what is the opinion that ought to be held with regard to the status quo before these reductions of taxation and these increases of taxation take place? That is a speculative question which would lead us very far afield, and on which there might be very great differences of opinion. I approach the question in a simpler fashion, and ask myself how the surplus of this year has mainly been produced. Has it been produced mainly by the increase of direct taxation, or by the increase of sources of indirect taxation? When the subject is considered from that point of view, it will be seen that we owe the greater portion of the surplus to the increased consumption of articles which pay duty and contribute towards indirect taxation. Out of the sum which remains to me, nearly £2,000,000 has been yielded by indirect taxation, and the Government have determined as indirect taxation has mainly produced the surplus, that mainly to the relief of indirect taxation shall the surplus go. Now, the surplus has been mainly produced by the consumers of alcoholic beverages, but no man in the House would be prepared to say that they should be relieved. The sum which they have contributed, which amounts, after deductions, to about £1,500,000, we propose to apply to the reduction of the duty upon tea by 2d. in the £1. The tipplers shall relieve tea. The loss upon the Tea Duty will amount to £1,500,000. I know that it has been said that a reduction of 2d. will not benefit the consumer; but I am not prepared to admit that argument. We have to look to our own responsibility, and we must bear in mind that a duty of 6d. upon tea represents a very large proportion of the primary cost of the article. If tea were sold to the consuming classes at anything like the cost price, it would appear at once what an enormous relief would be given by a reduction of 2d. in the £1. But the amount of the relief is concealed by the fact that the middleman walks away with so large a proportion of the price which is paid by the working classes for their tea. In many villages the working classes pay as much as 2s., as 2s. 6d., even as 3s. for tea, while much tea can be bought at a cost price, 11d. or 1s. If you take the price at 1s. 6d., a price at which good tea can be bought and sold, and realise that from that price you are going to make a reduction of 2d., you will see that you are conferring an appreciable boon upon the consumer. It would be very satisfactory if full advantage could be taken of this reduction by consumers, so that they should receive their full share of the relief. Let them, therefore, consider whether through better organisation, or by other means, it may not be possible for them to buy on better terms this article of primary necessity, this article so important to the whole of the working classes. I will here frankly say that I am opposed to the total abolition of the Tea Duties. There is no doubt that tea is the one article through which those who neither smoke nor drink contribute to the Revenue, and therefore I think it right that a Tea Duty should be maintained; and I should, besides, be sorry to think that we were going to cut off altogether any of the sources of our Revenue. But looking at the way in which the surplus has been created, and bearing in mind the circumstances to which I shall have to call attention hereafter, I think that justice demands the application of this portion of the surplus in the manner which I have indicated. I proceed now to another article, in respect of which I propose to grant remission—I refer to the duty on currants. It is at present 7s. per cwt., and I propose to reduce it to 2s. The loss of Revenue, after allowing for a very substantial increase of consumption, will probably be £210,000. I am not prepared, looking to the further remissions which I have in view, to increase the amount of this remission on dried fruits by making it applicable to all. The Committee will ask why I have selected currants for this special benefit, while the tax on raisins remains as before. Well, currants come chiefly from Greece, and Greece attributes such immense importance to this reduction that she is prepared in return to make a substantial offer of reduction on British manufactured goods. To Greece, the exportation of currants under most favourable circumstances is a question of life and death, and besides the pleasure of reducing the duty on an article of general consumption in this country, it is a matter of sincere congratulation to Her Majesty's Government that we are at the same time able to propose a fiscal change which will be eminently advantageous to that little Kingdom, in whose fortunes the British people have always taken so warm an interest. Let me now mention the change in her tariff which Greece on her part is willing to make, which I think will be received with considerable satisfaction by certain of our exporters. On herrings there will be a reduction of 33 per cent., on cotton yarns 16 per cent. on single grey yarns up to No. 24 English; simplification of classification in bleached and dyed, coupled with reduction of duty of about 25 per cent. The extra duty on dyed yarns will be abolished; common grey cotton tissues reduced by 12 per cent., and for other cotton tissues a simplification of classification on the same principle as that for yarns, while for cotton goods specially mentioned in the Greek tariff, such as embroidered goods, cretonnes, and men's clothing, the reductions range from 20 to 50 per cent. On linen, hempen, and jute tissues, the reductions range from 18 to 50 per cent.; on carpets and certain other mixed woollen fabrics, an average reduction of 20 per cent. is made. On indigo, the duty of about 1s. in the £1 is reduced to a nominal charge of about 1d., and the duty on acids is reduced one-half, to a nominal charge of about 1d., while on non-refined acids the duty is entirely abolished. These reductions will relieve the British trader from duties which are calculated at from £50,000 to £60,000 a year. The Committee will see, from what I have stated, why currants have been specially selected for fiscal favour this year. I should be extremely glad if the countries exporting raisins, such as Spain and Turkey, should see their way to meet us in a similar manner on a future occasion, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer might again be able to achieve the double object of cheapening raisins to the home consumer and securing lower duties on British exports to those countries. One piece of warning, however, I must give. I have been told that there is every probability that with the greater cheapness of currants, they will be used for the manufacture of wine in this country. I do not mean the innocent currant wine that used to be made in simple English homes, but wine manufactured out of dried currants and worked up into claret, or what is sold as claret. In France, dried currants are, I believe, largely used for the manufacture of wine. There is, of course, 'no harm in wine being made out of currants, but if that be done the Excise might have something to say on the subject. It would not do to have such wine manufactured at home escaping from Excise Duty, while imported wine had to pay duty. But I may go further, and warn the manufacturers of British wines that they are, in some cases, sailing dangerously near the wind, and that some of these wines are brought very near the standard of alcoholic strength which is taxable. Indeed, I am compelled to add to the Budget Resolutions one for imposing a duty on imported wine rendered sparkling in this country. I now come to another article, which is also one of universal consumption—I mean the duty on beer. I admit that last year, by changing the standard of gravity, I practically increased the duty to the extent of 3d. a barrel. I also admit that I stated, in reply to urgent pressure from the brewers, that the tax had been increased for a special purpose, and that the tax having been increased for a special purpose a fair case would be made out for consideration if a surplus should arise which should permit an all-round reduction of duties. Beer would then have a claim side by side with other consumable articles. Has the case arisen? Who has paid the tax? Some brewers have declared that this additional impost has been a kind of Income Tax upon them. But is this so? Have they paid it, or have they recouped themselves by a slight deterioration of the article they have sold? I will not attempt to decide this point. I cannot admit that when a tax is put on a great article of consumption it must be regarded as a tax on the producer. However, looking to the whole circumstances of the case, I am prepared to part with the additional

Mr. Goschen

Mr. Goschen

3d. per barrel as an item of Imperial Revenue. As Chancellor of the Exchequer I will forego this additional 3d., though it makes a gap in my surplus of £386,000. At the same time, I must ask my hon. Friends who are interested in the brewing trade not to indulge in any premature congratulations. They must share in the fortunes and responsibilities of the liquor trade generally, and if special appeal should have to be made to that trade and to that interest they must share in the burden. I have now disposed of £1,500,000 as remission on tea, £386,000 as the loss on beer, and £210,000 as the loss on currants. Adding these together they make a hole of £2,096,000 in my surplus, and all that remains to me is £773,000 for remission and for the necessary balance to be carried over at the end of my account. The direction in which I now look to give relief is a class upon which I have always looked as being heavily taxed as compared with the rest of the community—I mean the class just above the working class, the class, if it is not offensive to say so, that begins to wear the black coat, who have a very hard battle to fight, and who have demands made upon them in many respects severer than those falling upon the ordinary working men. I refer to men with incomes ranging from £150 to £400 a year, men of the poorer trading class, small tradesmen, and clerks, men who generally live in houses of the value of between £20 and £60 a year. Upon these, who have to pay in addition rates and taxes, the House Duty falls with special severity. If they have shops they pay 6d. on their shops and they pay 9d. on their houses. Houses below £20 are exempt. Following, to a certain extent, the principles adopted as regards small incomes, I propose to reduce the duty on houses between £20 and £40 from 6d. and 9d. to 2d. and 3d., and on houses between £40 and £60 to 4d. and 6d. The Committee will perhaps scarcely realise the number of persons whom this will affect. The Committee scarcely realises, I think, the extent to which both the Income Tax and the Inhabited House Duty are paid by men of comparatively humble means. I thought at one time it might be reasonable to allow every Income Tax payer to deduct £400 from his income before paying Income Tax, but I was staggered to find that this would involve a loss of £4,700,000 out of a total receipt of £13,000,000. To allow every Income Tax payer to deduct £200 would involve a loss of £2,500,000. This shows to what an enormous extent the Revenue is contributed to by people of small incomes. The relief which I propose in regard to Inhabited House Duty will, it is calculated, affect some 800,000 persons of humble means and will cause a loss of upwards of £500,000, or a full quarter of the whole of the tax. But it is a relief which I am glad to propose, and which I believe the House will be glad to sanction. I have two other minor proposals in regard to this tax. I have endeavoured to see whether lodging-house keepers could be relieved from the hardship of which they complain of having to pay on their houses as if they were residences, when they are really places of business. I propose that, in future, lodging houses shall pay on the lower rate as if they were shops or places of business. We propose, also, to meet a wish which has been widely expressed, and with which I have every sympathy. We propose to extend the definition of structural separation, so that if a house of the value of about £20, let in tenements to the working classes, shall be certified by the proper Local Authorities to have been constructed so as to be fit for the separate habitation of the families of the working classes, it shall be treated as houses below the value of £20, which are now exempt on the ground of structural separation. I have endeavoured to relieve the pressure of the House Tax at those points where it seems most to weigh with heaviness upon that portion of the population who have the greatest difficulty in meeting the burden of taxation. Now, it will be seen that if we deduct the £540,000 which those changes and remissions in the House Duty are estimated to cost from the sum at my disposal, £773,000, I am left with a balance of £233,000—as small a margin as I think circumstances will justify me in retaining. I ought now to have come to my peroration, and to have all but concluded the long statement which I have been making to the House. Under ordinary circumstances, indeed, I should now have completed my task, but the circumstances are not ordinary, for two years ago we were called upon to deal not only with Imperial, but with local finance, and to local finance I must apply myself for a still further short space of time. In 1888 I endeavoured to settle the question as between the ratepayers and the rest of the community, and I made large transfers from Imperial Funds to Local Exchequers. Somehow or other, the large amount of those transactions has not been sufficiently realised. I have been charged, and the Government have been charged, with not having fulfilled our pledges to the ratepayers, the County Councils, and the Local Authorities. It is said that the Local Authorities have not received that degree of relief which they expected. Well, if they have not gained, the Imperial Exchequer has, at all events, had the loss. I have practically handed over £2,750,000 to the Local Authorities. The question is, how would the Local Authorities have been faring now if no change had been made connected with local finance, and how are they actually faring? I will take the three kingdoms separately. England has received a gain of £2,236,000; Scotland, £282,000; and Ireland, £256,000. Accordingly, we are giving to the Local Authorities of the United Kingdom, this year, £2,774,000 more than they received before Local Government was taken in hand. But let me put in this caveat. If the Probate Duty should not continue to yield the amount expected, the Local Authorities must take their chance with the Imperial Exchequer as to the amount which the duty may yield. We assigned certain sources of Revenue to them, but we did not pledge ourselves to the amount. They will note, however, that this tax on personalty is generally progressive. But it is said that we are indebted to the Local Authorities for £800,000. A claim has been put forward by Local Authorities belonging to all political parties that we should make good this £800,000. I noticed the other day that, in the other House of Parliament, Lord Ripon, Chairman of the Yorkshire County Council, spoke with as much warmth about the gap made in the finances of the County Councils by the loss of the Wheel and the Horse Taxes, as my hon. Friends behind me have often spoken in this House, as if I were supposed to be pledged to make up the sum in question ; but I have always denied, and I do deny, that pledge. The Government was not pledged to any specific amount, if the House did not accept the means by which we proposed to raise it. Suppose I were to say to the Agricultural Committee of this House, or to the Central Chamber of Agriculture, "I will renew my offer ; I will pay my debt in the same coin in which I contracted it—I will re-introduce the Wheel and Horse Tax, and ask you to pass it." Would that be a satisfactory solution ? And yet no one can deny that I should have redeemed the pledge which I am supposed to have given. Hon. Members would not be grateful to me if I renewed those proposals. But, though I deny the pledge, I should much like to find the means for removing all complaint at the hands of the County Councils. I should wish to see them start on their difficult task thoroughly satisfied as to their financial position. More than that, connected with the question of rates and local finance is a matter of supreme importance—the question of the superannuation of the police, both in town and country. Hon. Members are aware of the most unsatisfactory footing on which this matter stands. In London the Police Superannuation Fund already stands at a figure which absorbs £150,000 out of the total raised for police purposes, and the police are not content, but are urging that their superannuation should be put upon a more satisfactory footing, on principles which have been embodied in Bills submitted to Parliament on several occasions. In the country the question stands in an equally, if not still more, unsatisfactory position. Some Superannuation Funds are insolvent, others are constructed on such arbitrary principles that no satisfaction whatever is given to the police. Bill after Bill has been introduced, but has been withdrawn, because the ratepayers shrank from facing the necessary cost, and there was no other source of Revenue to be found than the overburdened rates. It would be a great satisfaction if we could find means for dealing with this superannuation of the police. I wish I could find a further sum to relieve the County Councils from the drawbacks to which they declare the failure of the Horse Tax and Wheel Tax has exposed them. But more than this, I wish I could find a sum to enable the Local Authorities to buy up some of that enormous multitude of licences which has so largely contributed to the drink bill of the nation. I wish I had a million and a quarter to dispose of for this purpose, aye, a million for England and a quarter of a million for Scotland and Ireland. Yet in what direction may I turn ? I have stated that, as between personalty and the ratepayers, the transfer of the Probate Duty closed the account, as far as my own action would go. The Horse and the Wheel Taxes would be difficult to carry, nor would their aggregate amount cover the needs which I should like to meet. I am sure that the Committee are with me in my objects. Will they support the Government in its effort to find the means ? The objects are great ; they are overwhelmingly important ; but to accomplish them I must raise £1,250,000. To find that sum I turn to alcohol. I propose a surtax on all spirits, British and foreign, of 6d. a gallon, to be specially paid over to local taxation account, to be used generally for the purposes I have indicated, and to be distributed as I shall presently describe. A tax of 6d. a gallon on spirits will yield £918,000 on the number of gallons which I have calculated in my Imperial Budget. But, Sir, we must be fair. It would not, I think—and I believe the House will concur with me—be fair to put 6d. on spirits without taking toll of beer. I told my hon. Friends connected with the brewing interest that we might have to meet again before I closed my speech. If alcohol is to be taxed for local purposes, in some of which the brewers are as much interested as the distillers, beer can scarcely escape ; and so I fear I must ask them to contribute the 3d. per barrel of which they have been relieved in the Imperial Budget, as their share towards that Local Taxation Fund which I have been so peremptorily and universally called upon to reinforce. I will not press the argument that there is nothing inappropriate in the consumer of spirits contributing in some slight measure to the maintenance of the police and of those local funds out of which the cost of pauperism has to be met. If the gigantic proportions of the drink bill of the nation are but half as responsible for police work and pauperism as is sometimes alleged, it is certainly not out of place that the consumer of spirits should contribute, in some slight measure, to the cost of those local purposes. But if the brewers contend that it is out of their pocket, and not out of that of the consumers, that this 3d. a barrel is paid, I respectfully point out to them that in our proposals we include the assignment of a sum equal indeed to their contribution for the purpose of diminishing the number of existing licences, a process in which, I believe, they will find much compensation and consolation. I do trust that the Committee, if they agree to the objects, will support us in the means which we require to carry them into effect. I admit the struggle may be severe. We may have to deal with great interests, but if they are not shortsighted they will co-operate with us in the task we have undertaken. If we can settle this great licensing question—we cannot do so in one year, but if we can make progress towards solving that question—we shall have done something with which, I believe, all parties in the House will be satisfied. Let me place before the Committee the special distribution of the sum to which I have referred. The Beer Duty, on its present basis, is expected to yield £9,650,000. The 3d. per barrel assignable to local purposes will produce £386,000. After making an allowance for some watering, foreign spirits, if subjected to a duty of 10s. 10d. instead of 10s. 4d. per gallon, are expected to yield £4,822,160, and 6d. out of the 10s. 10d. will produce £223,000. I have made an allowance in my Imperial Budget for the reduction likely to follow on the increase of 6d. per gallon. The Customs and the Excise expect some decrease in consumption, not perhaps in the total amount drunk, as measured by measure, but because further watering may take place in consequence of the increased duty. If that should occur, possibly a large number of persons will not be so very much disappointed or dissatisfied. Home spirits, if subjected to a duty of 10s. 6d. instead of 10s. per gallon, are expected to yield £14,595,000, and 6d. out of the duty of 10s. 6d. will produce £695,000; and if the Committee add together the additional duty on foreign and home spirits the total amount will be found to be £1,304,000. Therefore, the total further amount assigned to local taxation will be £1,304,000, and will be divisible according to the proportion fixed for Probate Duty, and distributed among the Three Kingdoms as follows:—England, 80 per cent., £1,043,200; Scotland, 11 per cent., £143,440; Ireland, 9 per cent., £117,360. I propose to allocate the English portion as follows:—To the Metropolitan Police Superannuation Fund, £150,000; to the County Police Fund, £150,000; to Local Authorities, for the purchase of licences, £350,000; and the remainder—£393,000, or whatever it may be—for re-inforcing the funds of the County Councils; making a total of £1,043,000. If I now add together what I have already given to Local Authorities—namely, £2,774,000—and the further amount I propose to give—namely, £1,304,000, less the amount to be appropriated for licensing purposes, £438,000—the amount will be £3,640,000, or a total altogether of £3,640,000 as the relief to local taxation. I may here state that it would certainly be useless to give money for the purchase of licences if at the same time we did not stop the issue of new licences. We propose, therefore, and we shall hope to carry, if the House takes a real interest in this question, as I believe it does, notwithstanding the tasks which are placed upon us and the duties we have to perform, at least this suspensory measure that, until the whole question can be dealt with, there shall be no further issue of licences at all, unless in exceptional circumstances, such as the development of new populations or new wants which may appear here and there. Again, I say if the licensed victuallers take a broad view of their position they will see that this is a matter in which the temperance party and they have one and the same interest. Licensed victuallers do not object to a diminution in the number of new licensed houses, and, certainly, the temperance party desire it ardently. Eighteen years ago, on the introduction of Lord Aberdare's Bill, the licensed victuallers themselves suggested that they should be taxed to contribute to a compensation fund. We hope that we shall combine both parties and be able to reduce, or at all events to restrict, the issue of licences. As I have had the opportunity, through the courtesy of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), of learning what he has been doing in a very assiduous study of the licensing question, I shall be guilty of no breach of confidence when I say that he would also propose in his Bill that there shall be a cessation of the issue of new licences. I am glad that we may find common ground in that respect on which we may work. The House will see that we have taken a comprehensive view of the question of Local Finance, dealing with it broadly and in all its aspects. We may be embarking on great difficulties. But the House will, I hope, relieve me from the necessity of explaining those proposals in further detail. [The First Lord of the Treasury here made a communication to the right hon. Gentleman.] The transfer of old licences to new licences would continue. That is a further step which we consider to be necessary. As to the superannuation of the police, I omitted in my statement to say that, of course, while we find the new system of superannuation, and while a special portion of the tax is raised for dealing with this Superannuation Fund, we shall make it conditional on the Local Authorities receiving those funds that they on their part shall deal satisfactorily with them. We are not going to hand over this money unconditionally to the Local Authorities; advantage must be taken of this occasion to put the superannuation of the police on a sound and satisfactory basis. With regard to distribution in Scotland and Ireland those funds cannot be distributed precisely on the same footing, the circumstances being so different, and a future occasion will be taken to explain how the money falling respectively to those portions of the country will be assigned. Now, at last, I have achieved my double task. I have dealt with the Imperial Budget, and I have had to deal with a supplementary Budget, and possibly in the opinion of some hon. Members they may find the supplementary Budget almost as interesting as the Imperial. We have opened up and are touching a large number of questions, and we have endeavoured to solve some of them without seeking any violent measures. We believe it will be seen that if we are imposing a new burden on the consumers of drink we at the same time believe that great consequences may flow from the steps we have taken. I feel that I may have created in the breasts of many some disappointment. The fabric of our finance is so vast and so gigantic that even a surplus of these respectable dimensions seem scarcely enough with which to work wonders, though I hope much good may flow from its judicious and equitable employment. I venture to hope that if the County Councils, reinforced by the funds which are placed at their disposal, are able to enter with fresh energy upon their task; if the police is improved, if licences are diminished; if, on the other hand, looking to the reductions of taxation, consumers of tea find some reduction in the price of the article they buy; if humble householders find that the tax paper which they receive at Christmas, and which so often mars their festivities, shows even by a small sum a diminution in the House Tax; if other classes feel the benefit of the remissions, which, though not heroic, we have made, I hope there may be some satisfaction, and that some portions of the community may look back with gratitude on the Budget of this year. Above all, I breathe an earnest hope for the continuance of that prosperity which we enjoy, a hope that a further freedom from foreign complications may continue, that a strengthened harmony between employers and employed may, during the year upon which we are now entering, be developed and fostered, and that all may tend to increase those sources of revenue of which I am for the time the humble steward, and to which we must look for the means of satisfying both the demands of national defence and the constantly increasing demands of progressive civilisation, as well as for that continuous lightening, if it may be, of the burden which rest on the shoulders of the people.

Mr. Goschen

Mr. Goschen

EXCISE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That, in addition to the Duty of Excise payable under the Act of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter one hundred and twenty-nine, for and upon every Gallon computed at proof of Spirits distilled in the United Kingdom there shall be charged and paid the Duty of Six Pence, and so in proportion for any less quantity."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(7.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I regret very much, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will regret, the inevitable absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, whose duty and pleasure it would have been to have congratulated the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not on the ability which he has shown—because that is a superfluous task in a matter of which he is a past-master—but on the favourable circumstances in which he finds himself, and upon the relief of various kinds which the right hon. Gentleman has been able to afford to the community. I am glad to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the beginning of his speech, did not put forward a surplus as being a matter to boast of on the part of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. I ventured last year to say—and I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman in an observation he made was alluding to it—that a surplus is not always a feather in the cap of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am bound to say that the explanation the right hon. Gentleman has given to-night shows that that criticism is not applicable on the present occasion. In some preceding years there has been an excess in the estimate of Revenue or an excess in the estimate of Expenditure. I do not agree with the view of the First Lord of the Admiralty, who, I read this morning, anticipated the Budget, and declared that the increased Revenue is due to a Conservative Administration. The mode in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has accounted for the increased Revenue does not seem to have any direct connection with a Conservative Administration, except that the great rush for drink which has taken place this year took place previously in the year 1875, under a Conservative Administration. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the growth of the Revenue has been principally in respect of the article rum, and I suppose the First Lord of the Admiralty may, by his exertions, have contributed to that increase, and that that is the reason he takes credit to the Conservative Administration for the large surplus. I am not going—it would be extremely unwise in me—to enter to-night into the very important matters laid before the Committee by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has shown one very satisfactory thing—that the Revenue of this country is recovering the elasticity it once possessed. The figures he has given with regard to the Customs and Excise almost exactly reproduce the figures of 1875, which we were in the habit of looking to as the high-watermark of the Revenue of the country. We find that the Customs and Excise in 1876 yielded £47,646,000, and that this year they have yielded £47,580,000, nearly the same figure. Ever since 1875 we have been deploring the falling off both of Customs and Excise. We find now that the Stamp Revenue, which, in 1876, was £10,200,000, has risen to £15,275,000—an increase of £5,000,000. In the House Duty there has been an increase from £1,400,000 to £2,000,000; and in the Post Office Revenue there has been an increase of £1,000,000. The figures show that the general financial condition of the country is not only sound, but elastic. I refer to this only to show that we should not listen to any of the quack remedies which have been suggested in times of financial depression and commercial distress. We hear a great deal about Fair Trade, and are told the country is being ruined, and that the cause of the financial depression is the commercial system of the country. We have now proposed to us another remedy, and that is a dealing with the currency. These are ideas which enter into men's minds when they find there is a temporary depression of trade or of commerce, but in spite of Free Trade and of monometallism, we see that all that distress has disappeared, that trade is reviving, and that finance is returning to its former figure. Therefore, we should wisely come to the conclusion that it is not Free Trade that is the cause of the depression, and that it is not bimetalism that is required in order to restore the finances of the country. Then we were told that the foreigner would drive us from the markets of the world. ["Hear, hear."] Yes, the hon. Member for Sheffield holds that faith, I know. An interesting Report has been issued as to the trade of Germany for the first half of 1889, which is published in the Frankfurter Zeitung. That Report states that the imports into Germany have much declined in consequence of the protective tariff. It goes on to say that it is to Free Trade and her faithful adherence to it that Great Britain owes her quick recovery of prosperity, for it enables her to obtain her raw material without additional cost. The result is that, while the amount of German exports has fallen, the amount of English exports is increasing. I believe that the Germans are now beginning to recognise that that condition of things is due to the protective policy of Germany and the Free Trade policy of this country. In his former Budget speeches the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken rather a desponding view of the recovery of the commercial prosperity of the country. Last year, and in preceding years, he pointed out that the Revenue from articles of consumption had fallen off. I am glad that the circumstances of the time have given the right hon. Gentleman confidence, and have cheered him up a little, and that the recovered condition of the country has induced him to propose the reduction of the duties upon tea and currants. One matter to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded was the increased yield of the Income Tax, and a very satisfactory increase that is. The increase in the receipts from the Death Duties is also satisfactory. One shows the great growth of the income of the country, and the other is evidence of the great increase in the accumulated wealth of the country, and I think we may safely draw the conclusion that both the commercial system of the country and its monetary system are sound when such results are produced. Talking of the increase of the Income Tax and its relation to the question of the National Debt, I took out some figures which I think are interesting. The figures show that in 1815 it would have required an Income Tax of 4s. 4d. in the £1 to meet the interest on the National Debt; while in 1842 it would have taken an Income Tax of 3s. in the £1 to do it. Now the interest on the National Debt would be met by an Income Tax of 9d. in the £1; and in the beginning of the next century it would probably be met by a tax of 6d. in the £1. That shows the enormous growth in the resources of the country, and we may rely upon its continuance if we do not tamper with the commercial principles upon which the wealth and prosperity of the country are founded. The proposals

Sir. W. Harcourt

now made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer will require careful examination. Personally, I have always taken the greatest interest in the reduction of the duty on inhabited houses, and I believe that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman in that matter will be a great boon to a large class of the community. I regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not carried his proposal even somewhat further. If the right hon. Gentleman had remitted the duty upon all houses under £100 a year it would have amounted to a remission of £1,200,000. Out of a total of £2,000,000, the sum of £1,200,000 is paid by persons who live in houses under £100 a year. We shall, no doubt, go into the matter at greater length in the Bill to be brought in; but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider the figures, with the view of going further than he has done with reference to the limit for Inhabited House Duty. There is another thing to be considered, and that is the great inequality of the House Duty with reference to houses at higher rentals, and the very unfair assessments made on them. Everyone will rejoice that the duty on tea is to be reduced, but no one supposes, I imagine, that the reduction of the duty on tea will stop at 2d. in the pound. This can only be looked upon as a commencement of dealing with the Tea Duty. And the same may be said of the duty upon dried fruit. With reference to the duty on beer and spirits, which it is proposed to increase, I have no sympathy with the beer and spirit interest which would induce me to oppose the increased duty, but I remember that, in the year 1885, a Government was attacked and turned out when they proposed a duty upon beer and spirits not accompanied by a duty upon wine. But I did not hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that any additional duty on wine is to accompany the additional duty on beer and spirits. There are some other matters less agreeable than those which are present by their reduction—namely, those which are conspicuous by their absence. The Opposition have always maintained that one of the first duties of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to remedy the inequality between the taxation on real and personal property. That redress the Chancellor of the Exchequer might, and I think should, have found out of the resources of his Budget. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, I think, last year, that this is a matter which requires time and consideration. So it does, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had time and consideration, and from a Minister of his great and known ability and experience the country had a right to expect there would be a serious attempt to redress the present injustice in our financial system. There is another question which appears to me of capital importance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus of about £3,000,000, but he is not sanguine of any great increase in the Revenue, and, therefore, cannot calculate in future years upon surpluses of the same character. What is he going to do with the question of assisted education, to which the Government have pledged themselves? The Prime Minister said the question of assisted education would depend upon the surplus the Chancellor of the Exchequer had this year. Not a word has been heard on that subject to-night. The fund out of which education can be assisted has been given away. We had a right to expect that such a sum would have been reserved out of the surplus as would have enabled the Government to redeem the pledges they have given with respect to education. I hope that before we part with the surplus we shall hear something from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that subject. I hope it was by an oversight the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no statement on the subject. I will not detain the Committee any longer than to ask one or two questions. First of all, with reference to the coinage. The plan of paying for the deterioration of the gold out of the profit on the silver is one which, by anticipation, I have approved. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken on this subject on former occasions, and has always said that he regards it as connected with the question of the £1 note. I think it important that the Committee should have that subject fully discussed. I think the two questions are very closely connected, and we ought to have a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject. I know the great influence the Chancellor of the Exchequer possesses with the moneyed classes in the City, and I believe that a proposal on the subject of £1 notes coming from him would be very useful. With reference to the Floating Debt, the right hon. Gentleman has said truly that there has been a large reduction of the Funded Debt, which has been accompanied by a very sensible increase in the Floating Debt of somewhere about £18,000,000.

MR. GOSCHEN: The increase in the Floating Debt in the hands of the public has been £9,000,000.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I only desire to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he means to make any special proposal or provision with reference to the Floating Debt. In the variations of the Money Market the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be caught with the Floating Debt, and, indeed, I believe that for a few months in this year he was caught, and was paying more than 4 per cent. on the Floating Debt. There is only one other observation I desire to make, and that is with reference to the form of the Revenue Returns. They are greatly amended, but in some of the Returns of the Revenue which are published, especially the Quarterly Returns, the gross produce of the taxes is not given, but only the net produce which goes to the Government. That may be very well as a matter of account. It treats the taxes which go to the Local Authorities as if they had not been received at all. But the result is that in the case of the Excise it shows an apparent decrease, whereas, in point of fact, there has been a large increase. That misleads the public very much. I think the form which shows the gross produce and the amount transferred is the best. And now I have only to congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the country on the revival of prosperity which is shown in the condition of the Revenue, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer may be quite sure that there will be every disposition to deal in a spirit of candid criticism with the proposals he has made for dealing with the Revenue. After a period of depression we seem again to be rising on the crest of the wave. It is very difficult to explain what are the causes which have led, throughout all the countries of Europe, to a depression of trade. I do not think the causes have yet been ascertained. In trade, as in harvests, there seems to be cycles—seven fat years and seven lean years—and none of those variations ought to disturb the determination of the people of this country to adhere to the general financial and economic policy of the country which has brought such benefits to it, and has placed its finance upon so sound and satisfactory a basis.

(7.42.)* MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I will not now follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) in his references to the question of Fair Trade, some better opportunity will soon occur. Before making one or two observations upon the Budget laid before the Committee by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I should like respectfully to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman and the Government upon the two great concessions which they have made. The first is the effect, the generous effect, they have given to the recent Resolution proposed to the House by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Sir E. Hamley), and which I had the honour of seconding. The effect given to that Resolution will, I am sure, be heartily welcomed, not only by the public at large, but by every officer and man in the Volunteer Force. I can only express the hope that the greater control which the Government propose to take over the Volunteer Force by reason of this increased liberality will not take the form of harrassing and trivial regulations. I also thank the Government for what they propose to do as regards the superannuation of the Police Force. The Police Force have waited long and patiently for a great many years, and I am sure it is gratifying to those who admire their services that those services are at length appreciated by the House of Commons. I am sorry to learn from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in spite of the earnest protests of all the leading firms in the silver trade, he has decided to take off the duty which was at once a source of Revenue and a great preventive, I am assured on all hands, of fraud upon the purchaser. I very much doubt if anyone will thank him except one well-known dealer, who has agitated this question for a great many years, and, possibly some Indian exporters of silver.

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. GOSCHEN : I made one great omission in my speech, which I regret. I ought to have spoken upon the subject of hall marking, which is mixed up with the Silver Duty. When I come to reply I will deal with the matter, but I may inform my hon. and gallant Friend and the Committee that we do not propose to abolish the compulsory system of hall-marking.

Mr. HOWARD VINCENT :* If the right hon. Gentleman assures the Committee that the matter of compulsory hall-marking, to which the trade attaches enormous importance, and upon the maintenance of which it is unanimous, will not be dealt with, I will not proceed further into that question. But, as regards the duty, I should like to say a few words. I do not hesitate to once more call the attention of the House to the fact that every prominent manufacturer in the country is, so far as I have been able to learn, against the abolition of the duty. The silver trade is a flourishing industry. The statistics regarding it prove this, and a recent Parliamentary Return shows that there is a vast increase in the quantity of silver upon which duty was paid in 1886-87, as compared with the year 1879-80. In London the increase was from 442,000 ounces to 535,000 ounces. In Birmingham the increase was from 75,000 ounces to 122,000 ounces. In Sheffield the increase was from 73,598 ounces to 162,852 ounces, or more than double. There has also been an increase in the quantity of silver exported, and upon which drawback has been allowed in London, from 73,000 ounces in 1879-80, to 101,000 ounces in 1886-87. In value, the increase has been over 75 per cent. The only thing which has held the trade back in recent years has been the perpetual agitation in favour of an upheaval of the system which has worked well, an agitation which has disorganised trade to a very large extent. Let me mention what the duties are. First of all, there is the duty upon gold plate, which is not compulsory, of 17s. 6d. per ounce, and that, I understand from my right hon. Friend, is not to be touched. Secondly, there is a duty of 1s. 6d. an ounce upon silver plate, which is compulsory. Thirdly, there is a countervailing duty upon gold and silver plate imported into the United Kingdom, equal to the Excise Duty, and lastly, there are the licences to sell gold and silver plate. My right hon. Friend has not stated whether he proposes to do away with these licences. I trust he intends to do so; the trade confidently expect he will do so if the duty upon silver plate is abolished. These sources of Revenue have produced to the Exchequer, on an average, as I gather, upwards of £130,000 a year, or, in round figures, £72,000 Excise Duty, £10,000 Import Duty, and £48,000 from licences. Will anybody thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for taking away this considerable source of national income? Mr. Edward Watherston may do so, but there are, indeed, few others. In 1883 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he thought he would abolish these duties, but so strong was the opposition of the trade that, on the 17th of April, 1883, my right hon. Friend and Colleague, the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), wrote to us—

“The Government definitely abandon the proposal to repeal the duties upon silver plate.”

Upon this subject 19 of the largest firms in the country addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 18th of December, 1888, a Memorial, in which they said:—

“The agitation for the remission of these duties does not proceed from the public or the trade at large, but from a very unimportant minority, who have next to no interest at stake, and we, the representatives of firms who pay more than four-fifths of the whole duty, desire to protest against the representations constantly made by these agitators as being far from true.”

Similarly, the Sheffield traders last year memorialised the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that—

“The majority decline to believe that the repeal of the duties on silver will stimulate the purchase of silver plate; that the tax falls almost entirely upon a class well able to bear it, and from which no urgent demand for its repeal has arisen.”

There is also the question of drawback. I understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes that only two years' drawback should be paid to the trade, estimated at about, I think he said, £120,000 or £130,000. I feel convinced of this, that two years' drawback will by no means satisfy the trade. There are considerable stocks on hand upon which it is only fair that, if the duty is abolished, drawback should be paid in full. To give only two years' drawback would be impolitic and unfair to the trade. I need not press further upon the arguments. I have already detailed them, and they have appeared in the Press, and been endorsed by 54 of the leading manufacturers of silver plate in Sheffield and London, and by the principal firm in Birmingham. These firms pay seven-eighths of the duty which is now to be remitted, and they beg the House to leave the Silver Duty and the compulsory hall-marking unaltered. I am glad to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he does not propose to touch the compulsory hall-marking, to which the silver trade throughout the country attach the very utmost importance; but I fear that now the duty is abolished, the apprehensions of some, that it will be exceedingly difficult to retain compulsory hall-marking, will be realised. In conclusion, I will only say that, despite the brilliant and popular Budget laid before the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman, I cannot help saying that I hope the time will come when he, or succeeding Chancellors of the Exchequer, will lay before the British House of Commons Budgets which will deal, to use the right hon. Gentleman's own phrase, with British interests alone, and seek alone to encourage British manufacturer and production.

*(7.55.) Mr. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I am pleased the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to deal, in a comprehensive manner, with the question of light gold, but I must join the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) in the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see his way to give the public the boon of £1 notes. In past times we exported a great many old Dragon sovereigns to Ceylon, where they were used for ornaments, and in Europe and America large quantities of our gold have been melted down. At the time of the Paris Exhibition English heavy gold was melted down, and only the light gold coins returned. The cause of all the trouble is, as I have already explained in the House, that we coin our gold absolutely free of charge, whereas other countries make a moderate charge for minting. If we charged a small amount, even $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, it would preserve our sovereigns, and we should not again be called upon to spend the £600,000 as proposed. I do not advise that we should alter the value of the coin, but I should like to have increased weight, using gold 9-10ths fine, which would make the coin more durable. I would also suggest that the Bank of England should be authorised to receive fairly worn gold coins, and melt them down at the cost of the State. I am very glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to abolish the duty on silver plate. A portion of the present duty is absolutely protective, because 1s. 6d. per oz. is charged on all foreign imported silver plate, while only 1s. 3d. per oz. is charged on plate of British manufacture. I am glad, too, to find that the compulsory hall-marking is to be retained, because the charge is exceedingly small, and it prevents unscrupulous dealers from deceiving the public, and so injuring the whole trade. That is a kind of dealing which was practised when hall-marking of gold chains was not made compulsory, and it was said, I remember, that a copper coal scuttle and half a sovereign would make a goldsmith's stock of gold chains. But the tendency of modern legislation is in favour of protecting the public from adulteration, either in food or in the material of the goods they buy. On the other hand, I do not see why there should not be some modification in the hall-marking of silver plate. It is done in the marking of gold. You can hall-mark gold at 22, 18, 15, 12, and even 9 carats; why should not manufacturers be allowed to hall-mark different qualities of silver? Why not have in addition to our present standard of hall-marking at 925 the Indian standard of 916, the French standard of 900, the German of 800, for it is found that the lower qualities are more durable in wear? An arrangement of this kind would remove a great hardship. It sometimes happens that a work of art in silver of high artistic merit is sent to be hall-marked, and if it does not happen to come up to the standard of 925 this beautiful piece of workmanship is liable to be broken up; whereas if a modification were allowed, it could be marked at a lower standard. Passing from the silver plate question, I should like to direct the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to another subject. He has made a great reduction—a grand reduction—in the Debt of the country by his conversion scheme; but he might make another considerable saving by converting, or better still by re-paying, the Turkish Four per Cent. Guaranteed Loan. There is now a favourable opportunity, for the Turkish Government have agreed to convert their outstanding Debt, and it might be a favourable opportunity to get France to assent to the conversion or re-payment of these Bonds. It would be a saving of over £20,000 a year in respect to £2,000,000 of these Bonds that have been drawn for payment, yet by some extraordinary circumstances have not been paid off. If no other means are adopted this country can borrow for the purpose at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., and France at $3\frac{1}{2}$, and there is no reason why we should keep this outstanding Debt at 4 per cent. At any rate, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could arrange that the Treasury should hold these Bonds. A short time since the Chancellor of the Exchequer refused to state the amount received from transfer stamps on Stocks and Shares to bearer, not wishing to anticipate his Budget Statement. He has not now indicated the amount, but in his long speech it is excusable if he omitted some minor details. But perhaps he will tell us now what the amount is, and will consider whether the time has now arrived to change this very obnoxious tax. Irrksome and obnoxious it undoubtedly is to everybody concerned. I know for a fact that people come to a broker's office on settling day with a mass of small bonds, and it is practically impossible for them to affix the adhesive stamp in time for settlement. Indeed, I have been told the Chancellor of the Exchequer's life would scarcely be safe if he ventured within the precincts of the Stock Exchange, so great is the irritation caused by this transfer stamp. There is no objection to the payment of the money if only some other means could be found for exacting it; but the manner in which the tax is paid by affixing adhesive stamps, which will in time cover the bonds, is the cause of general complaint.

Mr. Montagu

(8.5.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): An agricultural Representative is not expected to be a financial expert, and I am the last man to lay claim to such a character; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has devoted a considerable portion of his speech to the subject of local taxation, and has granted an amount of £400,000 to re-inforce the resources of County Councils, for which we are by no means ungrateful; and I hope I shall not be considered presumptuous if I suggest a method by which, without increasing taxation, he might increase his sources of revenue and give still further aid to the agricultural interest. As the right hon. Gentleman and every Member of the Committee knows, the law is continually evaded in connection with the transfer of shares. The amount of the share is constantly put at 10s., whereas the money absolutely passing amounts, perhaps, to £1. If the right hon. Gentleman would introduce a Bill to provide that the nominal amount of the money paid for the transfer of Stocks and Shares shall be printed on the stamp, and that if this is not done the transfer shall be null and void, the right hon. Gentleman might get a considerable increase of revenue. Then, again, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not particularly tender-hearted when he attacks a big interest. He has very properly taxed champagne, and put a $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on gin distilling, but I should like to ask him on what possible consideration is it that a beverage which has 15 per cent. more alcoholic strength in it than good port, sherry, or hock, should absolutely escape all duty whatever—I allude to British wines. If the right hon. Gentleman will take these two matters into consideration I think he might raise sufficient revenue to give us an extra £500,000 a year. I hope he will not think me presumptuous in calling attention to these matters. I only do so as a Representative of a section of that hard-working, uncomplaining class—the agriculturalists.

(8.10.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I just wish to ask one important question arising out of the latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I am sure that he, with his commercial experience, will realise the fact that when he proposes to buy up a number of these licences and at the same time to restrict the issue of further licences, that will have the effect of adding enormously to the value of existing licences, and I would ask him if he has taken any precaution that this enormously enhanced value shall not be brought in as a charge for compensation when this great question of licensing comes up for settlement.

*(8.11.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I have only one question to put, and in doing this I must express my regret that out of his large surplus the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to deal with the appeal made by Trades Union to two or three Chancellors of the Exchequer that the Income Tax charged on the incomes of Trades Unions derived from investments in real property should be remitted as I believe it is in the case of Friendly Societies. It is a very small item in the National Revenue, but it would give very great satisfaction to those Unions who have so invested their savings, and it would very much encourage further investment in the same direction, a policy which I think everyone will commend. I do not know whether it is too late for the right hon. Gentleman to consider this question, and if it is not I hope he will do so. The amount of revenue derived from this source is but a few thousands a year, and not at all considerable as compared with the great pleasure it will give to those concerned. Then I have only one other word to address to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He referred, in that portion of his speech in which he spoke of the prosperity of the country during the last few years, to the great caution with which we must regard the prospects of the trade and industries of the country in the next few years; and then, in that portion of his speech he seemed to declaim somewhat strongly against the institution of strikes, speaking with strong emphasis as to their discouragement. Well, of course, we all discourage strikes where we find it possible to do so; but I would beg the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remember that in periods of great prosperity it is the only means labour possesses of enforcing its claim to a share in the general prosperity of the community. I do not say the right hon. Gentleman intended his remarks to be so interpreted as a severe censure of

But I know on this side it will not be considered sufficient. I think the right hon. Gentleman may make up his mind that he will hear more of it, and I think a Division will be taken. I am pleased to hear of the reduction in the duty on currants; but the remarks of the hon. Member who has just spoken reminds me that when I was in Athens some two months ago this matter came up in conversation with a man who, above all others in Athens, was able to give an assurance, and he assured me that if we took the duty off currants they would at once take off the Export Duty. It is but a small duty, a sixth or a seventh, of our Import Duty, but, however, my informant said nothing in respect to reductions of duties on English imports; and it may prove to be the case that the concessions obtained on these will be of more advantage to us than the abolition of the Export Duty on currants. With regard to the change in the House Duty, I may call attention to the fact that it will add to the number of existing anomalies in respect to this duty. The principle on which the duty is charged, that is on the rental value, is a fair one; but, unfortunately, that principle is only carried out in reference to small houses, it is not carried out in respect to large country houses, mansions, and castles, which are rated far below their actual letting value. On one point Scotch Members are naturally much interested, the £144,000 to be granted to Scotland. Our share of the Probate Duty was applied to freeing, so far as we could, the first five of the educational standards. The amount was hardly sufficient; and I hope, in the allocation he makes, the right hon. Gentleman will remember that we still require something to free all the standards in every school in Scotland. On account of the sum formerly given being insufficient, we have what are very much disliked—graded schools, schools where fees are charged, but which also receive a share of the Probate Duty. Therefore, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consult Scotch Members as to the application of the £144,000, and I am sure he will find the general desire will be to free all the standards in every school, and also to apply part of the money to evening or continuation schools. The feeling upon this point among the Scotch Members will be practically unanimous.

Mr. Provand

When it was proposed last year to apply our share of the Probate Duty entirely to freeing education, there was not a single dissentient voice against the proposal, and we all feel that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not do better than apply part of his surplus to freeing the standards in those schools which still charge fees, and in assisting evening and continuation schools. (8.31.)

*(9.4.) MR. HUGH WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I congratulate myself on having been present this evening to listen to one of the most able, exhaustive, and practical addresses ever made by any Chancellor of the Exchequer during the present century, and I may add that in my opinion, when the political history of this country comes to be written, the right hon. Gentleman will be entitled to a place, as one of the most successful as well as the most able financiers the country has ever known. I should like, without unnecessarily occupying the time of the House, to call attention to a subject of great interest, magnitude, and importance, in connection with the operations of a body of men who are practically an irresponsible body, who are called upon to deal with transactions representing many thousands of millions per annum. I allude to the Stock Exchange. On this subject I might remind the House of the recommendations made by the Royal Commission of 1878, a Commission which was composed, for the most part, of exceedingly able and practical men. Since the Commission conducted its investigations the Brokers' Relief Act of 1884 was passed—an Act which destroyed all public control over the operations of the Stock Exchange. The hon. and gallant Member for Essex and the hon. Member for Whitechapel have referred to stamps in transfers and Foreign Bonds. I am convinced that the only effective way to prevent the Revenue being defrauded is by carrying out the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and granting a Charter to the Stock Exchange.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I beg to remind the hon. Gentleman that he is travelling somewhat beyond the question which is at present before the Committee.

*MR. WATT: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the intimation he has given, my excuse for seizing the present opportunity being that as the Government have appropriated private Members' nights another will not be afforded during the present Session. I will not pursue the subject further. There is, however, one matter with regard to which I should like to offer an observation. I refer to sparkling wines, in regard to which I maintain that no advantage is at present derived by the consumer. The tax on those wines is one which is a very slight advantage to the country at large, while it certainly has an injurious operation upon the trade, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take the matter into his careful consideration. I am authorised to state that the trade would much prefer a 3s. or even 4s. rate to a differential tax as at present. With regard to another subject, I must confess that I should have liked to have seen a penny taken off the Income Tax; but as that seems to be an impossibility at the present moment, and in the present stage of the financial condition of the country, I trust that by-and-by he will be able to see his way to the wiping out of that imposition in its entirety. I would only remind him and the House that that tax was originally imposed as a War Tax, and was never intended to be a permanent burden on the people of this country, nor do I think it should be allowed to become a permanent tax, because in the event of war or any other great and pressing emergency, it would be very difficult, should that burden be continued in its present form, to find the ways and means of meeting the demands thus created. In conclusion, I have only to repeat my congratulations on the able and satisfactory Financial Statement which has been presented by the right hon. Gentleman, and to express my opinion that it will meet with the general approval of the country.

*(9.9.) SIR R. LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I desire, Sir, as one who has some claim to speak on behalf of our fellow-subjects in India to express to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer my deep satisfaction at the announcement he has made of the intended abolition of the duties on silver plate, an announcement which I am sure will be received with much gratification throughout the length and breadth of that country. I am quite certain that the action of the Government with regard to this matter will be hailed by the people of India as a distinct mark of the sympathy felt in this country for its greatest Dependency. Like the quality of mercy, this remission will be twice blessed—it will be blessed to the country that gives it, and also to the country that receives it. On the one hand it will undoubtedly quicken the silver export trade of India, while it will encourage the art manufacture of silver in that country; but, on the other hand, beyond this it will multiply for us in this country those beautiful objects of art which are manufactured in India, and which, in the present state of metallic art in this country, cannot be produced here, and which, in fact, can only be manufactured by the Indian artificer. Furthermore, it will tend pro tanto to re-habilitate silver, at least to a certain extent, and thus will tend to afford relief to the agricultural and other interests of this country which are naturally affected by the appreciation of gold. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has alluded to the opposition which has been offered in anticipation of this remission of taxation by the traders of Sheffield, and some other centres of the silversmiths' art in England. These manufacturers fear to meet the competition of the Indian artificers in their own trade, but I venture to submit that their fear is based on an entire misapprehension. The silver manufacture of India is entirely unique, being mainly composed of filagree work, grotesque and otherwise, requiring very laborious hand labour, of a kind certainly not likely to be carried on to any large extent by the silversmiths of this country. Having said this I should like to pass to another part of the right hon. Gentleman's Statement, which deals with a subject of vital importance to the people of India, and that is the proposed remission of the duty on tea. I feel bound to say, as being myself a proprietor of tea gardens in Ceylon, that the Indian and Ceylon tea industry will not gain, but will rather lose, by the proposed remission of duty, because it is probably not understood in England that the remission of duty will act, to a certain extent, as a bounty or premium on the low-priced China teas, and to that extent we should be discouraging the growth of the superior and higher-priced Indian and Ceylon teas. But my right hon. Friend fore-shadows that the Empire will gain by the proposed remission of taxation. He puts it that the consumers may possibly gain 2d. per pound by the remission. I hope they may; but I doubt whether they will gain anything like that amount. I am afraid that a good deal of it will stick to the middleman on the way. Nevertheless, that the consumer may possibly gain something I am free to confess, and I would sooner see my working-class friends giving up their gin and other alcoholic drinks, and taking to tea, even if they took to the low-priced and inferior brands of China. I consider the Budget of my right hon. Friend is distinctly a temperance Budget, and as such I hail it most heartily. The provision which is made by the right hon. Gentleman under which the County Councils will be able to control the supply of temptations to drink is, in my opinion, a most statesmanlike provision. The local veto has hitherto, as we all know, generally been hampered by this dilemma, that it involved a heavy local expenditure, in order, in the exercise of that veto, to stop the supply of temptations to intemperance; or, on the other hand, it meant the distinct robbing of the licensed victuallers, by depriving them of their licences without any compensation whatever. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman's proposals clearly postulate the principle of compensation to those whose licences are to be taken away from them. That, in my opinion, is the only principle which is compatible with national honesty. It is the principle which was laid down in the most emphatic manner by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, in the published letter which he addressed some years ago to a licensed victualler in my own constituency of North Kennington, and it is a principle that I trust this House will maintain. The proposals of the right hon. Gentleman will at once, and perceptibly, reduce the number of licensed houses. It may be said, in fact, that this Budget of my right hon. Friend greases the wheels of temperance, whilst it acts honourably and justly by the licensed victuallers, and to every other class of the community, and as such, Sir, I hail it with the utmost enthusiasm.

Sir R. Lethbridge

(9.20.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): Mr. Courtney, the surplus at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is £3,500,000, and that surplus is brought about by the increased consumption of spirits and beer. The question is in what way is that surplus to be disposed of. I venture to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a very great mistake in not availing himself of this opportunity of giving Free Education to England, equally with Scotland. A contest will arise at the next election with regard to this question of Free Education, and then the country will be told that there is no surplus for the purpose.

MR. GOSCHEN: What election?

MR. CALDWELL: The General Election. For Free Education in the three countries £2,250,000 would be required. That would absorb so much of the surplus. Then, as to the Inhabited House Duty. That would take £540,000, which still leaves £750,000 to be disposed of in any way the Chancellor of the Exchequer might think fit. As to the reduction of the Tea Duty, it is a question how far the consumer will reap the benefit of it. We know that in the case of the London Coal Dues, the consumers have not reaped the benefit yet. Therefore, we should take care that the surplus really confers benefit when benefit is intended. The reduction of the Tea Duty will benefit the family man, not the workman who has to attend a coffee shop to get his meals. But if you abolished the School Fees the family would thus directly get the benefit of the money. And there is great reason why the surplus should be applied in this way. The consumption of spirits may be taken to have remained stationary among those above the rank of the working classes, and the increased revenue from the consumption of spirits has been derived from the working classes. If the House is really to look to the proper application of the money, I would contend that the families which have been impoverished by this increased contribution to the Revenue, for alcohol, should be benefited by the application of part of the surplus to Free Education. It is evident that the system of the Conservative Government is to give grants in aid to local taxation, of which the landlords get one-half of the benefit. I contend that this money having come from the working men should go back to them, to benefit their families, and not to the pockets of the landlords. We have got the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a difficulty. In dealing with the distribution of the Probate Duty between England, Scotland, and Ireland he proceeded on the basis of population. It has, curiously enough, been left to a Conservative Government to deal with the three Kingdoms separately. The result has been that the richer country got the larger grant, and Ireland, the poorer, got the least. You are going now to deal with a surplus raised from Excise. Is it not a notorious fact that Scotland pays more for excisable liquors than England? Yet what does the Chancellor of the Exchequer propose to do? To give Scotland less than her share. In this case the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that the money is to be divided between the three countries, according to the precedent of the Probate Duty distribution.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman is not correct. The amount of the Probate Duty paid by England is far larger in proportion than that paid by Ireland and Scotland, but the Probate Duty was distributed according to the total contribution of Revenue from each country. Though England paid by far the larger share, we arranged that it should be changed in the direction of easing Ireland and Scotland by distributing the duty in a manner more satisfactory.

MR. CALDWELL: The population of England is seven times that of Scotland, and the amount granted to England exceeds that granted to Scotland in proportion to the population. It may not exceed the actual amount of Probate Duty paid, but that it, in point of fact, exceeds the amount paid in proportion to population is undeniable. With regard to this new surplus, Scotland will pay an inordinate share, yet she will not get a proportion equal even to her population. I do not suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer means to do the slightest injustice to Scotland, but, by giving Local Government to Scotland a year in advance, he did us out of £80,000. I do not suppose he will take anything from us this year. I think the Budget, so far as regards two points, at any rate, will not meet the expectations of the country. I had hoped that when the Local Government Bill for England was before the country, and the Government were compelled to withdraw the compensation clauses, we had, once for all, heard the last of compensation to publicans. I do not know why the Government should have entered on a case of this kind at this moment. I do not suppose that the cause of temperance is weaker now than at other periods, and I think that this, like the Van and Wheel Tax, will militate very much against the Government. As to police superannuation there may be a considerable difference of opinion in the country on the matter, and I think it is a pity that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have mixed up his Imperial Budget with an attempt to manage and control Local Bodies who are to receive grants in aid. He would have saved himself a great deal of trouble, if, having money to hand over, he had given it to the Local Authorities, without instructions as to how they were to dispose of it.

*(9.33.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his Budget from the point of view I indicated last year, namely, that it is a step towards making the incidence of taxation fairer between the richer and poorer classes of the community. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Northampton laughs, but there is no doubt it does do that. I have always held that, under the present incidence of taxation, the richer classes pay a smaller proportion than the poorer classes, and I think, when the figures are gone into, it is impossible to deny that. I do not say the Budget equalises the incidence, but

and to that extent we should be discouraging the growth of the superior and higher-priced Indian and Ceylon teas. But my right hon. Friend fore-shadows that the Empire will gain by the proposed remission of taxation. He puts it that the consumers may possibly gain 2d. per pound by the remission. I hope they may; but I doubt whether they will gain anything like that amount. I am afraid that a good deal of it will stick to the middleman on the way. Nevertheless, that the consumer may possibly gain something I am free to confess, and I would sooner see my working-class friends giving up their gin and other alcoholic drinks, and taking to tea, even if they took to the low-priced and inferior brands of China. I consider the Budget of my right hon. Friend is distinctly a temperance Budget, and as such I hail it most heartily. The provision which is made by the right hon. Gentleman under which the County Councils will be able to control the supply of temptations to drink is, in my opinion, a most statesmanlike provision. The local veto has hitherto, as we all know, generally been hampered by this dilemma, that it involved a heavy local expenditure, in order, in the exercise of that veto, to stop the supply of temptations to intemperance; or, on the other hand, it meant the distinct robbing of the licensed victuallers, by depriving them of their licences without any compensation whatever. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman's proposals clearly postulate the principle of compensation to those whose licences are to be taken away from them. That, in my opinion, is the only principle which is compatible with national honesty. It is the principle which was laid down in the most emphatic manner by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, in the published letter which he addressed some years ago to a licensed victualler in my own constituency of North Kennington, and it is a principle that I trust this House will maintain. The proposals of the right hon. Gentleman will at once, and perceptibly, reduce the number of licensed houses. It may be said, in fact, that this Budget of my right hon. Friend greases the wheels of temperance, whilst it acts honourably and justly by the licensed victuallers, and to every other class of the community, and as such, Sir, I hail it with the utmost enthusiasm.

Sir R. Lethbridge

(9.20.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): Mr. Courtney, the surplus at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is £3,500,000, and that surplus is brought about by the increased consumption of spirits and beer. The question is in what way is that surplus to be disposed of. I venture to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a very great mistake in not availing himself of this opportunity of giving Free Education to England, equally with Scotland. A contest will arise at the next election with regard to this question of Free Education, and then the country will be told that there is no surplus for the purpose.

MR. GOSCHEN: What election?

MR. CALDWELL: The General Election. For Free Education in the three countries £2,250,000 would be required. That would absorb so much of the surplus. Then, as to the Inhabited House Duty. That would take £540,000, which still leaves £750,000 to be disposed of in any way the Chancellor of the Exchequer might think fit. As to the reduction of the Tea Duty, it is a question how far the consumer will reap the benefit of it. We know that in the case of the London Coal Dues, the consumers have not reaped the benefit yet. Therefore, we should take care that the surplus really confers benefit when benefit is intended. The reduction of the Tea Duty will benefit the family man, not the workman who has to attend a coffee shop to get his meals. But if you abolished the School Fees the family would thus directly get the benefit of the money. And there is great reason why the surplus should be applied in this way. The consumption of spirits may be taken to have remained stationary among those above the rank of the working classes, and the increased revenue from the consumption of spirits has been derived from the working classes. If the House is really to look to the proper application of the money, I would contend that the families which have been impoverished by this increased contribution to the Revenue, for alcohol, should be benefited by the application of part of the surplus to Free Education. It is evident that the system of the Conservative Government is to give grants in aid to local taxation, of which the landlords get one-half of the benefit. I contend that this money having come from the working men should go back to them, to benefit their families, and not to the pockets of the landlords. We have got the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a difficulty. In dealing with the distribution of the Probate Duty between England, Scotland, and Ireland he proceeded on the basis of population. It has, curiously enough, been left to a Conservative Government to deal with the three Kingdoms separately. The result has been that the richer country got the larger grant, and Ireland, the poorer, got the least. You are going now to deal with a surplus raised from Excise. Is it not a notorious fact that Scotland pays more for exciseable liquors than England? Yet what does the Chancellor of the Exchequer propose to do? To give Scotland less than her share. In this case the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that the money is to be divided between the three countries, according to the precedent of the Probate Duty distribution.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman is not correct. The amount of the Probate Duty paid by England is far larger in proportion than that paid by Ireland and Scotland, but the Probate Duty was distributed according to the total contribution of Revenue from each country. Though England paid by far the larger share, we arranged that it should be changed in the direction of easing Ireland and Scotland by distributing the duty in a manner more satisfactory.

MR. CALDWELL: The population of England is seven times that of Scotland, and the amount granted to England exceeds that granted to Scotland in proportion to the population. It may not exceed the actual amount of Probate Duty paid, but that it, in point of fact, exceeds the amount paid in proportion to population is undeniable. With regard to this new surplus, Scotland will pay an inordinate share, yet she will not get a proportion equal even to her population. I do not suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer means to do the slightest injustice to Scotland, but, by giving Local Government to Scotland a year in advance, he did us out of £80,000. I do not suppose he will take anything from us this year. I think the Budget, so far as regards two points, at any rate, will not meet the expectations of the country. I had hoped that when the Local Government Bill for England was before the country, and the Government were compelled to withdraw the compensation clauses, we had, once for all, heard the last of compensation to publicans. I do not know why the Government should have entered on a case of this kind at this moment. I do not suppose that the cause of temperance is weaker now than at other periods, and I think that this, like the Van and Wheel Tax, will militate very much against the Government. As to police superannuation there may be a considerable difference of opinion in the country on the matter, and I think it is a pity that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have mixed up his Imperial Budget with an attempt to manage and control Local Bodies who are to receive grants in aid. He would have saved himself a great deal of trouble, if, having money to hand over, he had given it to the Local Authorities, without instructions as to how they were to dispose of it.

*(9.33.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his Budget from the point of view I indicated last year, namely, that it is a step towards making the incidence of taxation fairer between the richer and poorer classes of the community. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Northampton laughs, but there is no doubt it does do that. I have always held that, under the present incidence of taxation, the richer classes pay a smaller proportion than the poorer classes, and I think, when the figures are gone into, it is impossible to deny that. I do not say the Budget equalises the incidence, but it goes a long way towards it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to have relieved in all directions those persons who pay a larger amount in the £1, on their incomes than they are entitled to pay according to the general incidence of taxation. The relief on the Inhabited House Duty, and the reduction of the Tea Duty, will sensibly affect the poor. As to Free Education, it is very easy when a Budget is produced to say, "If something had been done in this direction it would have been better." Of course we should all like to have everything relieved. I suppose every sort of taxpayer would like, out of the surplus, to get the whole of his taxation remitted, but, as we know, that is impossible, and it seems to me that the right principle to adopt is to do our best to so adjust taxation that all classes shall pay according to their means. I have worked it out, and I find that if the whole Revenue were raised by Income Tax, the rate would be about 1s. 2d. in the £1, but capital only pays 6d. in the £1, and whatever tends to diminish this inequality, is hailed with satisfaction. Something has been said about the licensing question. Well, I must say I commend the courage of the Government in tackling that question. I always regretted that the President of the Local Government Board did not stick to the provisions on the subject contained in his great Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman had done so, he would have deserved a greater monument from the advocates of temperance than even the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir W. Lawson.) I believe the only way to successfully deal with this subject is to go into it boldly. It is quite impossible to deal with public-houses without the principle of compensation, and it is absolutely necessary to grapple with the excessive temptations to drunkenness. The licensing question is one which, though troublesome, must be faced by some Government, and I doubt if our Friends opposite, when they come into Office, will care to touch it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, by introducing the system of raising the money out of the drinking habits of the people to pay out a number of the licensed houses, is doing a wise and proper thing. I believe the scheme will lead to the promotion of temperance; and, though I am aware that in my constituency, as elsewhere, our opponents will placard the walks with the declaration that we are going to buy out the publicans, at any rate these provisions will tend to make the people more sober. The superannuation of the police and the reduction of postage are, no doubt, matters of great importance; but the great feature of the Budget, as I have said, is the reduction of the taxation of the poor.

Mr. Bartley

(9.38.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Bright-side): I must take exception to a statement made by the last speaker that this Budget goes a long way to redress the inequalities of taxation which press upon the poor. There never was a more unwarranted statement. Whence comes the fund from which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to make these reductions? It is almost exclusively from the working classes; but the remissions of taxation which this surplus enables the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make will benefit rather the classes above them. I am not complaining of the reductions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes. It is true that the working classes will be benefited by the reduction of the duty on tea, but is that not a remission that affects the rich in greater proportion? I believe the reduction in postage will affect our merchants and trading classes very much more than the working classes. Every mercantile house in the City of London will send a hundred letters for every one sent by a member of the working classes. The idea is excellent in itself, and although the Chancellor of the Exchequer is making provision for a deficit which may arise from the reduction, there can be no doubt that, in a very short time, that reduction, instead of diminishing the amount of Revenue, will tend to increase it. I do not at all despair of seeing a penny ocean postage, although I know that every Treasury is opposed to Postal reductions. The contributions from that Service are getting almost beyond reasonable bounds, and more should be done to develop cheap postage. I rose mainly to say a few words as to the abolition of the Silver Duty. I congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on having the courage to abolish that duty and deal with that subject, and I hope and trust that his effort will not be abortive. I trust that this time we shall get rid of the Silver Duty. My hon. Friend and Colleague the Member for the Central Division of Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) is anxious to maintain the duty in the interest of the British manufacturer, as he believes. The idea is, that to impose a duty of 40 per cent. on the manufactured article is to encourage home manufacture. Nothing can be more absurd. It is the old idea the paper-makers and others entertained, but the very reverse of that which they feared has always been found to be the case. We have always found that when the Protective Duties have been swept away the home manufactures have extended year by year. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the course he has taken, but I do not know what he is going to do as to compulsory hall-marking. He advanced as one of the reasons for the abolition of the duty, that he was only doing justice to the fair claims of India. In that I quite agree, but you cannot have one uniform standard of compulsory hall-marking. You must allow some kind of elasticity, so that the standard adopted by India or any other country that may import silver will allow for the admission of manufactured silver into this country. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman recognises that something must be done in that direction, so as to admit the articles he contemplates admitting by the abolition of the Silver Duties. I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has reduced the Tea Duty, although he has been criticised on his own side for doing so. One of his supporters deprecated the "abandonment" of so important a source of Revenue. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is abandoning a source of Revenue at all; on the contrary, I think he is taking means to increase it. I have always felt that the reduction of duty has, within a certain time, compensated for itself by an increase in the consumption. I think we all agree that the price at which tea is sold to the poorer classes is most excessive. When the duties on sugar were reduced, it was found that the taking of a penny off meant a great deal more than the penny itself in the reduction of the price at which the article was sold. The public get better acquainted with the net value of the article, which is dealt in with much more freedom as soon as reduction takes place. I believe, therefore, that this is the first step towards a very considerable reduction in the cost of it to the people. I do not believe it is the last step by any means. Having reduced the duty by 2d., I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not remain there, but that he will have to go further, and the duty will probably be entirely swept away. We all regret that the surplus should have been derived almost exclusively from an increased consumption of intoxicating liquors. That increased consumption, however, has not been confined to one class. I notice that the increased duty on wine amounts to more than £120,000, which represents a selling value of between £1,500,000 and £2,000,000. It is also only fair to suppose that the middle and poorer classes have consumed their increased share of beer and spirits. It would be much to be regretted if there was any indication of an increased consumption of drink in the country, because we all believe, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the greatest curse of the country after all is drink. I wish to invite the Chancellor of the Exchequer to touch upon another question. I refer to the question of Free Education. When an hon. Gentleman suggested that this must stand over until the next election, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed anxious to repudiate the assertion. I am glad he should have done so. There never was a year in which the prospects of the Budget were so falsified as in the present instance. A short time ago nothing could be more explicit than the statement of the Prime Minister that we should have a free system of education if there was a surplus. The right hon. Gentleman himself (Mr. Goschen) also said that the moment Free Education was established in Scotland a great grievance and hardship was established in England and Ireland. Certainly, therefore, we had ample justification for thinking the right hon. Gentleman would have given us Free Education in this Budget. I certainly trust the time is not far distant when we shall have Free Education, for no greater boon could be conferred upon the working classes of the country. All that the right hon. Gentleman has done to-night, however we may appreciate it, falls far short of the great service he would have rendered to the country if he had given Free Education to the children of the people. Nothing can do so much to stop the tide of intemperance, and nothing has done so much hitherto to arrest that tide, as education. With regard to the question of licences, I would point out that the suspension of licences means making existing licences very much more valuable. That is a question that will have to be very carefully dealt with before we go much farther. I am sure we shall all be glad to pass the necessary Resolution to increase the price of spirits, and I am glad of what the right hon. Gentleman has done with regard to the Silver Duty and some other matters.

(9.53.) MR. SALT (Stafford): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down complained that we have not got Free Education. I am afraid that if we had Free Education the right hon. Gentleman would have complained that we had not got the Tea Duty reduced. We cannot have both things at once. We are told that we are to have a considerable sum of money given to the County Councils, in order to deal with the difficult question of Police Superannuation. I presume that the object of that grant is to make up a fund for Police Superannuation in various cases where the existing funds have proved to be insufficient. I wish to know how my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) is going to deal with those counties in which the funds are sound and sufficient. It would not be very fair to make grants in cases where the funds are insufficient and to do nothing for the few counties in which the funds are sound. A question with regard to sparkling wines has been brought to my attention. I am told that a great grievance exists respecting the surtax on sparkling wines being charged as an ad valorem duty, and it is said to give rise to fraud. I have no personal interest in the question, but I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will see his way to give it his attention. The proposal respecting the purchase of licences has my sympathy and support. I only wish that the suggestion made in this respect years ago by Lord Aberdare had been carried out. Had it been, very many difficulties in connection with the liquor trade would now have been cleared away. Very great difficulty will probably be experienced in applying the funds to the purchase of licences. The value of public house licences has, in the last few years, enormously increased—in many respects to quite an artificial value. The whole of the beer trade has drifted into quite a different class of business altogether during the last 10 or 15 years. Instead of being in the hands of a great number of small people, the trade is now in the hands of large brewers and capitalists, who are buying up retail houses at very much more than market value. The transfer of licences from one place to another is a matter which, no doubt, will also have consideration. The reason I mention this is, that if it has to be dealt with by the Local Bodies in the counties, they will, I think, require some rather distinct directions from Parliament as to the lines on which they ought to proceed. I must venture to warn hon. Members not to expect very great results from diminishing the number of public houses, as regards the amount of beer and spirits consumed in the country. I expect some good, however, from my right hon. Friend's proposal, and I think some of the worst public houses will be cleared away, to the great benefit of the community. Observation has naturally been made on the very large amount received from the Alcoholic Duties in the past year, but I think we are rather apt to get on the high horse and talk about how the poor people drink. What has happened is simply this: During the last few months working men, who, a little while ago were earning some 16s., or 18s., or £1 a week, have had their wages increased in some cases to 6s., 7s., or 10s. a day. These men, when they were receiving very low wages, lived upon tea. Now they are earning good wages they live upon beer.

Mr. Mundella

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): On brandy.

MR. SALT: Well, brandy. At all events, there is no reason why this increase in the consumption should be attributed to excessive drinking. I deplore excessive drinking just as much as hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, but I cannot say that I deplore the fact that working men are receiving such good wages that they are able to live well and comfortably, and as English working men ought to live.

(10.5.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I wish to draw the Chancellor of the Exchequer's attention to a blot on an otherwise excellent Budget. I have always been a very strong advocate of temperance. Ever since I entered Parliament I have supported extreme temperance legislation, and I have myself secured the passing of Bills which have much diminished drinking hours in public houses. I have no friend among the publicans. I have been constantly and persistently opposed by the publicans, and so long as I remain in Parliament am likely to be opposed by them. But, Sir, I am a friend of fair play. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he proposed to put a small tax on beer and a large tax on whisky. I opposed that as grossly unfair, and I regard the present proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the whisky duty as grossly unfair in the same way. I am in favour of taxing alcohol to the utmost extent of taxation it will bear without encouraging illicit distillation, but as regards whisky the Commissioners of Inland Revenue said it would be dangerous to add any taxation for fear of increasing illicit distillation. It is notorious that alcohol is chiefly consumed in England in the form of beer, while in Scotland it is consumed in the form of whisky. In the form of beer alcohol pays about 1s. 5d. a gallon of proof spirit, at present, whereas in the form of whisky a tax is imposed to the extent of about 10s. per gallon of proof spirit. You propose now to add 3d. per cask upon beer and to add 6d. per gallon on whisky. Is not this making people in Scotland through their favourite tipple pay enormously more than people in England through their favourite tipple? What makes the grievance more serious in the case of Scotland is, that we recognise no vested right in licences, and do not want you to assist us to purchase licences. In every step we have taken in the way of curtailing the trade of licensed houses, we have given no compensation. The law with us stands on quite a different basis from that which it occupies in England. The Magistrates who represent the people in Scotland have absolute control in the matter of new licences. If I thought you could diminish the consumption of whisky by any extra taxation, I should overlook a great deal in the way of unfairness in any proposal to achieve such an object; but I do not believe this proposal will have that result. We have a great deal of illicit distillation, as it is, and if you increase the tax you run a great danger of increasing this illicit distillation. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) brought forward his proposal it created so great an outcry that he was obliged to abandon it, and I shall be very much surprised if the present Chancellor of the Exchequer does not find himself in a similar position. It will not improve the feeling with which the people of Scotland will receive these repeated attacks upon their favourite beverage—a beverage which has been described as almost synonymous with freedom—when they remember that of the two Chancellors of the Exchequer who have made them, one was a Member, and the other an ex-Member, for the City of Edinburgh. I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he proposes to do with the £144,000 he intends to allocate to Scotland. The Probate Duty grant given last year aided the remission of school fees to a certain extent, but it has been insufficient, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to follow precedent in this matter, and complete the work then commenced. There can be no difficulty in the matter. The work has been half done, and Local Authorities have been led into extravagancies which will compel them either to impose heavy local taxation, or to retract the benefits which have already been conferred, and this £144,000 would be a most acceptable sum for the crowning of the edifice that has been raised.

*(10.15.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): It is perhaps well, before this debate closes, that one or two remarks should be offered by a County Member on this side of the House, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has dealt very generously—some people may think almost too generously—with County Finances. I understand that the Probate Duty has amounted to more than the right hon. Gentleman anticipated, and yet he is proposing to hand us over the proceeds of the Beer Duty. I would add one word of protest to what has fallen from my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), and other Members, on the question of Free Education. After the very distinct announcements of the Prime Minister in the autumn, the words in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to Assisted Education struck me as singular. He put the question of Free Education on a par with buying pictures for the National Gallery. He went on to say that if he yielded to such demands—if he did not sit tight on the lid of the chest—he would have the whole of his mighty surplus scattered, and still the burdens of the people would not be lightened. I am sure the country will take note of the position to which Free Education has been relegated by the right hon. Gentleman. On one subject I am sure the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman will meet with universal acceptance. I refer to the Inhabited House Duty. Those acquainted with Town Holdings might possibly object that this remission is only too likely to go in London, not into the pockets of the poor occupiers of small houses, but rather into the hands of house-jobbers and owners of small property. The class the right hon. Gentleman wishes to relieve is substantially the class whose incomes vary from £150 to £400, and a little over. We all wish to relieve them, but I venture to say it is time to consider this question of the taxation of small and precarious incomes on a somewhat wider principle than is contained in the Budget. I do think that when we have a surplus of

Dr. Cameron

£3,250,000 in one year, to be followed by a surplus of £3,500,000 in the next, a great opportunity has been afforded to a financier who has brilliantly distinguished his tenure of his present office of dealing with this question of small and precarious incomes. I hope that next year the question may come more to the fore, and that some relief from direct taxation will be afforded to small incomes. With regard to the temperance question, we must all feel some pleasure at seeing the right hon. Gentleman so conspicuously and so obviously running off with the Bill of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) under his arm. The right hon. Gentleman has, as far as I can judge, adopted all its principles and provisions. As to the compensation question, I was rather surprised that the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) did not protest more vigorously against the gross injustice of the Scotch having to pay for buying out English public houses. According to the proposals of the Government in the Local Government Bill two years ago, the compensation was to come first from the county rate-payers, and secondly from a fund raised by an increase, limited to 20 per cent. increase on the present licence duty. In the discussion on the Local Government Bill, if my memory serves me right, the right hon. Gentleman, or some defender of his proposals, went so far as to say that the increase of the duty would by itself form a sufficient fund for dealing with the question of compensation. The Government then sought to place the burden on the trade, but now they propose to place it upon the unfortunate consumer, and to tax the tempted instead of the tempter. I cannot help expressing my satisfaction at the lowering of tariffs obtained by the arrangement which has been made with Greece. I noticed that Gentlemen opposite cheered his announcement on that point, as if it was a grand victory of the principles of reciprocity. I venture to say it is just the other way. It is a victory of Free Trade, and an application of Mr. Cobden's principle of obtaining reductions of tariff in other countries by reducing the tariffs here. I welcome many of the proposals in the Budget. Everyone must consider it an advanced Budget ; at the same time, I think we have great reason to protest against the total failure of the Government to redeem its promises in respect of Free Education.

*(10.24.) Mr. GOSCHEN : There are a great many points on which I am asked to reply, and I will try to do so as briefly as possible. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down referred to the very important matter of assisted education, to which the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) alluded in his remarks on the Budget. I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the spirit in which he has discussed it. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken said that I put free education on the same footing as the buying of pictures. That is drawing an inference which is scarcely warranted from remarks which were intended to be somewhat jocular. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith), in the early part of the Session, said he reserved the question for next Session. It is not merely a question of giving money for assisted education, for enormous importance must attach to the conditions upon which the money was given. An hon. Member has spoken of the matter as being reserved for the next General Election. I do not know when the hon. Member thinks the next General Election will take place, unless he imagines it will be between now and next Session. I do not think that will be the case. Of course we are liable to the changes and chances of this mortal state, and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who does not seem to share my opinion, may be in possession of secrets with which I am not acquainted, but I do not think we need speak of postponing free education until after the next General Election. As far as I can calculate the chances of politics, it will fall to our lot to deal with the question, and we look forward to dealing with it next year. The right hon. Member for Derby thought we should have exhausted all our resources. I believe I see £500,000 which will be available next year, and which is not available this year. This year we spend £300,000 on barracks. Again, we have this year a drawback of £120,000 for silver plate, and that will not fall to be paid next year, and there is £100,000 for the Volunteers, not a recurring item. I can assure the Committee I have carefully considered our liability with regard to assisted education in framing my Budget this year. Supposing we do not realise greater advantage from articles of consumption than I have estimated, there is generally now a progressive increase from the Death Duties, which is almost automatic. I am bound to say that we consider ourselves committed to the question of assisted education, and I am afraid that the liability of finding the necessary funds will fall upon me. I trust I shall be able to meet that liability, which, in fact, I must meet. I hope now the Committee will consider I have made a categorical declaration with respect to assisted education. The hon. Member for West Nottingham spoke in terms of reproach and condemnation as to what I said about employers and employed, and went out of his way to draw an inference from the remarks I made. I repudiate the inference which the hon. Member draws from my words. I said, in language which I believe will be accepted and appreciated by almost every Member of the House, that I trusted the relations between employers and employed would be harmonious during the present year, and I pointed out that the internecine struggles between the employers and the employed are a drag on the prosperity of the country, and might fill us sometimes with alarm. No word fell from my lips in criticism or condemnation of either party in the struggle. I spoke with absolute neutrality, but surely I am entitled to say, as having an interest in the prosperity of the country, that we desire to continue and increase the harmony between capital and labour, between employers and employed. The hon. Member spoke with perfect courtesy, but I cannot accept the interpretation he put upon my declaration, and I would not have what I did say misinterpreted in any degree. The hon. Member also spoke about the exemption and non-payment of Income Tax on property which is held by Trade Unions. It is not a question as to the amount of money which the Exchequer would lose which would in any way induce me to oppose such a wish ; but the question must be considered with the general principles which attach to Income Tax on land. I am not able to enter into the subject minutely this evening, but I promise again to look into it. I strongly hold that every person not getting an income of £150 should not be called upon to pay, but, on the other hand, I do not think as Trade Unionists they should receive exceptional treatment to other citizens as to the funds they possess; they must, with all other classes, be justly treated. The right hon. Member said something with regard to the currency, and hoped that the Government might undertake some measures with regard to £1 notes and the currency generally in connection with the Coinage Bill to be introduced. I have been studying the question of reforms in the currency, and I should be very glad if before we leave office it should be in our power to deal with the question. I do not despair of it. I do not say of the question of £1 notes more than that I must reserve myself, but there are questions connected with the currency I should be glad to deal with while I have the power to do so. I omitted to refer earlier in the evening to my statement last year that the cost of restoring light gold coinage should not be put on the taxpayer at large, but that the remedy should be looked for in banking directions. We have now been saved from the necessity of further legislation at the present moment on that subject by the large profit which we have realised on one form of banking transaction—namely, on the issue of silver. The right hon. Gentleman also complained that the Revenue Returns did not show the aggregate amount which is realised by different forms of taxation. I admit the inconvenience, but I think it is a temporary one. Comparisons have been complicated and difficult during the past few years, but as soon as the new system has been inaugurated I think that the complexity and difficulty will cease to exist. I attach great importance, however, to this point. Sums which are raised for local purposes should not be considered as raised for Imperial purposes, and they should not figure twice in the national accounts. I promise to see whether we can keep the local finance separate from the Imperial finance, in order to meet the legitimate wish of the right hon. Gentleman, and to present Returns in a form which will admit of a convenient comparison. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Floating Debt. I do not know that any special measures will be necessary for dealing with the Floating Debt, because I believe by the funds in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners we shall, within a reasonable time, be able to bring the Floating Debt back almost to the point at which it stood before. A large Floating Debt exposes us to fluctuations of interest which might be extremely inconvenient. The right hon. Gentleman said, but not with perfect accuracy, that there was a time when this country had to pay more than 4 per cent. on the Floating Debt. That was not the case, because it was only on £1,500,000 of the Floating Debt that we were obliged to pay four per cent. But the general rate at which we have raised funds under the Floating Debt has been, I think, £2 14s. The fact is that our Floating Debt securities are extremely popular in the whole banking world. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, however, in not desiring to have a too large Floating Debt, because three or four years out of five we may be able to make considerable money upon it, but we might be caught in one year, and the loss might wipe off the profits of preceding years. There is something that grates on the national feeling in having to pay, even temporarily and on a small amount, a rate above the rate paid in the funds. Therefore, although we have done extremely well as regards the Unfunded Debt, having been continually able to borrow at 2 per cent., and sometimes at $1\frac{1}{2}$, under this form of securities. Still it undoubtedly is not our wish to multiply them, or even to maintain them at their present amount. I trust I have explained myself sufficiently to the right hon. Gentleman. I feel very strongly the necessity of keeping the Floating Debt within moderate limits. Then I turn for a moment to the Tea Duty, upon which much has been said. One hon. Member objects to the reduction of the Tea Duty, and would rather, he says, have had assisted education. But if the reduction of the Tea Duty should be followed by assisted education, I think he would have no cause to complain, for then he would have the advantage of a reduction of the Tea Duty one year and the advantage of assisted education would be realised in the next year. But my hon. Friend behind me (Sir R. Fowler) complains of the manner in which the Tea Duty has been dealt with, on the ground that we are parting with a permanent source of Revenue. But we have not parted with it, and we do not intend to do so. By putting the duty at 4d. there will be a chance, if we should ever have to make a special effort, of calling upon the consumers to contribute something to that special effort. If we treat it, on the one hand, as a permanent source of Revenue, but at the same time put it, if I may say so, on a peace footing by reducing it considerably, we retain it as a source of Imperial Revenue, as I, for one, desire to retain it. Here is a short letter which I have received on the subject, which amused and interested me very much, and which I think is genuine :—

Mr. Goschen

"Sir,—Being a non smoker and a non-drinker, not eligible for Income or Property Tax, not able to stand coffee drinking, but withal a patriot though a Radical, I would like to know how I am going to stand my 'corner' in regard to the expenses of my country if I do not pay something through my teacup, if you take off the Tea Duty."

I call that a sensible letter. I have not—but not in consequence of that letter—taken off the whole of the Tea Duty: I place it at 4d. I keep it as a source of Revenue, a national reserve, and though some hon. Members may wish to abolish it altogether, I protest earnestly against diminishing too much the number of our sources of Revenue. My theory is that having reached a certain point, though we may remit when we can in order to lighten the general burden, we should keep what I may call the skeletons of our regiments intact, so that, to quote the writer of the letter, every man should be able to stand his "corner." The right hon. Member for Derby regretted that we had not seen our way to deal with the Death Duties. I may remind the Committee that last year the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian declared that a real adjustment of the whole of the Death Duties would require almost a Session to itself. But this question does not stand alone. The re-construction of the Income Tax in certain respects would have to go in any case hand in hand with a re-construction of the Death Duties, and that is a task which we think the dimensions of the present Session forbid us to undertake, especially looking to the warning we have received. With regard to one of the most important proposals of the Budget—namely, the increase in the duty upon Spirits—I am not surprised that a protest has come from Scotland based on the assertion that whiskey is the favourite tipple of that country, and that the Scotch people drank more whiskey in proportion than the English people do, and that, therefore, they will have to pay more in proportion in consequence of the increase of the Spirit Duties than the English people will have to pay. A large portion of the money so raised, however, will be applied to various local purposes, and I am glad to find that the hon. Member for Glasgow is already looking forward with great pleasure and content to the manner in which a part of the extra duty is to be applied in Scotland. It must also be remembered that the extra duty is in some degree compensated for by the large proportionate share which Scotland obtained two years ago in the distribution of the Probate Duties, the greater portion of which are paid by England, while Scotland and Ireland largely participate in them.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Not according to population.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I repeat that while England pays the larger share of those duties, Scotland and Ireland are allowed to have the advantage of their distribution. In these circumstances I do not think that either Scotland or Ireland have any reasonable cause of complaint. Ireland especially, as being the poorer country, has always received the utmost consideration, and she has always received the benefit of the doubt when there was a question as to which way the scale inclined.

COLONEL NOLAN: On what figures does the right hon. Gentleman found that statement?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am afraid the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not accept my assurance, but I can assure him that my statement is founded on thoroughly impartial calculations.

COLONEL NOLAN: By whom?

*MR. GOSCHEN: By those who collect the Revenue, and the impartiality of whose statistics are above suspicion, and who have been consulted on these subjects by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian.

COLONEL NOLAN: Have they put these calculations above my Returns?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am afraid I cannot accept the figures of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who is undoubtedly a partial man and evidently holds strong views upon the subject. I, however, believe in the impartiality of the calculations before me, and in the position in which I am placed I have felt bound to look very carefully into the figures. With regard to the disposal of the fund in Scotland, that is a matter that is not yet finally concluded, and it will receive the most careful consideration in connection with the whole circumstances in the case of both Ireland and Scotland. It is not proposed to deal with Ireland and Scotland in precisely the same way as England, and separate arrangements will have to be made with regard to each country, which I hope to be able to place before the House at a very early time. With regard to the application of this new tax, observations were made by the hon. Member for Stafford, who referred to the question of police superannuation. The hon. Member's observations were very pertinent, and we had clearly before us the point to which he has called attention—namely, what would be the just way of securing the distribution of the money among counties some of which have already taxed themselves, while others have not. It is a difficult problem which the Government will endeavour to solve with equity. In reply to the hon. Member for Essex, I may say that the County Councils will get £393,000, besides £300,000 for the police; together £693,000. Then there is £160,000 for pleuro-pneumonia, which will lieve the ratepayers in the Three Kingdoms to a very considerable extent. If those figures are added together it will be found that, irrespective of the advantage to be derived from the sum set apart for licences, there is a sum of about £850,000 applied to the Local Taxation purposes. The hon. Member will admit that that is an ample redemption of the pledge given by the Government. Mention has been made of the arrangements with Greece, and here let me take the opportunity of stating that much credit is due in the management of these affairs to my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who has given great attention to questions of tariff, and also to the talented representative of the Greek Government in this country. The matter stands thus: the Octroi Duty on currants is still levied by the Greek Government, but that Government have very fairly met us by reductions on imports of English manufactured goods, so I do not think we have a right to press them any further. There is one point I have to mention in connection with the change in the duty on silver plate. I omitted to state that while we shall leave the law as to hall-marking practically in the state in which it now stands, we shall make special arrangements in regard to India. India exports to this country her manufactured silver, and, generally, I think, that silver is of the same standard as her rupee, and somewhat below the standard adopted in this country. We propose that the Indian goods shall be specially hall-marked and shall be allowed to be imported at the Indian standard. We propose also that the Indian Government shall be allowed to establish assay offices for this purpose, and certified by Indian authority that they are up to standard, Indian silver goods will be allowed to be imported here. In this way I hope we shall satisfy India. In other respects we do not propose to interfere with arrangements under the existing law, or change the practice as to hall-marking. One important matter I must not omit to mention, and I am glad to be reminded of it. The Committee will bear in mind the proposal that a certain sum should be placed at the disposal of the Local Authorities for the purchase of licences; and it has been pointed out, though it was a matter which had not escaped us, that it would be no legitimate consequence of that arrangement, but, on the contrary, a consequence we should deplore if the value of public houses should be raised by the very measure we are introducing to give the power of purchasing these licences. We acknowledge it would be perfectly right to introduce some limitation by which any increased value which is given to public houses owing to the enactment of the measure which we shall have the honour to introduce, shall not be taken into account in any future compensation that may be given. With regard to the ad valorem duty on wines, I have been asked as to the result of the change made last year, which was exactly equivalent to the imposition of an ad valorem duty in some respects. We were anxious that the change should not operate against the importation of the cheaper sparkling wines from Germany and from the Saumur country, and I am glad to say that, although there have been some objections raised, our plan has, on the whole, worked with great smoothness. I know that all wine merchants will not be ready to admit that; but it is the fact that the anticipated importation of wine paying the 2s. 6d. duty has not diminished with a corresponding increase of the wines under the 1s. duty. It was thought that higher class wines would be introduced under the 1s. duty; but the watchfulness of the Customs and the bona fides of the trade have prevented that result, and the proportion remains practically as heretofore. With regard to the Tea Duty, it was proposed that the reduction should come into operation on an after May 1. Sometimes a longer period has been given; but I am led to believe that stocks have been rather exhausted, and the date I mention I think will be convenient to all concerned. I appeal to the Committee to allow the Resolution to be passed. ["No, no" from Colonel NOLAN.] It would be according to precedent on previous and similar occasions. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh, when he proposed an increase of the Spirit Duty, though it was subsequently rejected by the House, was allowed to take it on the first day. Great inconvenience would result from the uncertainty to the trade if the Resolutions are not passed to-day.

Mr. Goschen

(11.1.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not know any precedent for the Budget Resolutions being taken exactly at 11 o'clock. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken as if he occupies a freehold of his seat on the Treasury Bench, and the cheers of his friends show that they think so, although he may be too modest to say so. He has been explaining what he is going to do next Session; but while he was doing so I ventured to interject a remark as to the possibility of a General Election before then. The right hon. Gentleman said that I might possess some secrets unknown to the Government. Sir, I possess no secrets; but I do know that the constituencies are anxious to pronounce a verdict on the conduct of the Government. Now, Sir, I am bound to say that I think this is a peddling Budget: it tries to satisfy everybody, and it satisfies nobody. I could understand it if it proposed to abolish the Tea Duty altogether; but, instead of doing that, it only takes away one-third; it takes off 2d. per lb., and nobody will profit by it. This is a middleman's and a capitalist's Budget. The right hon. Gentleman said he would have abolished the Tea Duty entirely, but that he had not a sufficient surplus to do it. But, Sir, he would have had a sufficient surplus to make the abolition of the Tea Duty an easy thing, had it not been for the enormous expenditure of the Government in preparations for war and war armaments. This year, and for several subsequent years, the country will have to pay £1,430,000 for the increase of the Navy, and to spend further money in erecting new barracks for our soldiers. A considerable sum is to be given to the County Councils for the superannuation of the police and other general purposes. Nothing could be more objectionable, in my opinion, than giving large sums from the Imperial Treasury to the County Councils, because the money is collected principally from the inhabitants of the towns, and it will be expended chiefly in making roads and generally improving the property of the landowners. Then a large sum of money was to be given in order to compensate the publicans. I object to this insidious way of dealing with that question. Let the right hon. Gentleman bring in a specific Bill saying that the publicans have a freehold, and that they are to be compensated out of Imperial taxation, and then the country will know what it means. I am astonished that more notice has not been taken of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's little bargain with Greece in relation to currants, because the statements of the right hon. Gentleman in that connection amount to the enunciation of a new fiscal policy. I very much regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not made alterations in the Income Tax, a tax which operates very unjustly upon professional men and those engaged in trade; and I urge the Chancellor to consider whether he cannot, as they do in America, make some distinctions between income derived from investments and casual income derived from professions and trades. I think that this is a Tory Budget. I have done my best to protest against the excessive expenditure of the Government in civil matters and in preparations for war. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has pointed out that he has reduced the National Debt to a considerable extent; but I am one of those who consider that it may be reduced too much. I do not possess so very great an interest in my grandchildren as to save them from paying all these debts. The right hon. Gentleman has not pointed out that he is going to increase the National Debt by a sum of £30,000,000, should the Government be able to carry a certain Bill now before the House.

(11.20.) COLONEL NOLAN: I think the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer show not only that the right hon. Gentleman has a knowledge of finance, but that he is also an accomplished electioneer. I admit that it is not a bad electioneering Budget. I hail with pleasure the reduction on tea, but I do not understand why the duty on raisins should not be reduced as well as that on currants; they are both made from grapes, and I do not see how a distinction is to be made; the result will be endless confusion. Then the right hon. Gentleman has taken off these duties at the expense of Scotch and Irish whisky. I consider that the tax is put most unequally upon spirits as compared with beer. I object also to the system of creating fictitious surpluses followed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Labouchere

Why should only 1s. duty be paid on claret and 9s. 6d. be paid on spirits, seeing that it is the poor who drink spirits? You have got a majority in England and a minority in Ireland, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in bringing forward his Budget, is simply going with the majority. Why should poor people have to pay 10s. instead of 9s. 6d. per gallon, while the claret drinker is not taxed so heavily? Then as to the distribution—Could you have any more iniquitous distribution? I will leave out the case of Scotland, which is similar to that of Ireland, only that the case of Ireland is much stronger than that of Scotland. The origin of this distribution is to be found in what the Chancellor of the Exchequer did two years ago in the division of the Probate Duty between the three countries in relief of local taxation. I contended that it would be fair in allotting the duty to divide it according to the amount paid on Probate Duty by each country, for Ireland in proportion paid far more than the other two countries. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply, said that the division would be made, not in proportion to the amount paid in Probate Duty, but according to population. But in this instance nearly double the amount is given to England in proportion to population, compared with what is given to Ireland. England gets something over £1,000,000, and Ireland gets only £118,000. Though England has by far the larger population, yet the difference does not warrant such a discrepancy as lies between giving over £1,000,000 to one country and only £118,000 to the other. Though Ireland is not a great country like England, yet, when you come to deal with spirits, Ireland consumes a very much larger quantity of spirits in proportion to population than does England. But you are going to give her the least share. Ireland will pay much more than England in consumption of spirits, and will get very much less. Ireland not only consumes, but she exports whisky, and her chief customer is England. You are not only taxing whisky in Ireland, but you are checking the consumption of Irish whisky in England. I suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer expects the people of Ireland to be grateful to him for this contribution to local needs by putting a tax of 6d. per gallon on whisky. I think they will be the reverse. Nineteen-twentieths of the taxation go to England; and every Irishman, when he drinks his glass of whisky, will think of the extreme unfairness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in taxing Irish resources for the English majority. The Irish Members have had no opportunity of consulting about this matter, and I speak simply for myself personally. I do not oppose the Tea Tax; I take what is good in the Budget; but I oppose all the bad parts, such as that relating to silver. People have got up in this House and talked as if drink was a frightful iniquity. It is perfect hypocrisy. Why, in Sweden, where you have the best educated people, and in North Russia, where you have not the best educated people, they drink more than we do. I believe the consumption of alcohol is simply a question of latitude. It was proved by an eminent statistician lately that wherever alcohol is drunk you have very much less crime. You will never make very much difference in the consumption of alcohol. I would draw the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to one matter. Ten years ago I obtained a Return, signed by Mr. Courtney, and I have no doubt it was correct, which showed that Ireland contributed a larger share to the Imperial Revenue than the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated. Subsequently, a Return was made by the Treasury. It was compiled at the time of the Home Rule Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) a time of heat and conflict, and when the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to make a good bargain with Ireland. Every Irishman who understood the subject knew that the right hon. Gentleman in his Home Rule Bill was driving a terribly hard bargain with Ireland. What I wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do is to compare the two Returns and see where they vary from each other, and ascertain what is conveyed by the one and the other as to the proportion which Ireland contributes to the Imperial Revenue compared with England.

*(11.40.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Sir, I wish to make an appeal to the House. Unless these Resolutions are carried forthwith great inconvenience will result. Hon. Gentlemen will have a full opportunity of discussing every question on the Bill which will be based on the Resolutions, and I trust, therefore, the House will allow the Resolutions themselves to pass.

*(11.41.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): Sir, I will not detain the House more than a couple of minutes. I am not going in any way to criticise the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I think it right to say, inasmuch as he alluded to my criticism on the disposal of a previous surplus that it favoured the direct rather than the indirect taxpayer, that the right hon. Gentleman has to-night done very fair justice to indirect taxation. Sir, you are going to put a Motion from the Chair for adding 6d. per gallon to spirits, and 3d. per barrel to beer, and I want the House and the Committee to understand that we are this evening imposing an additional Imperial alcoholic taxation. We reserve to ourselves the absolute right to discuss the appropriation of that taxation. Look at it in any way you like, the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is simply a subsidy from Imperial funds for certain local purposes, among others, compensation to publicans for the purchase of their licences. In voting to-night for the addition to this duty, I want it to be distinctly understood that we are voting for an Imperial duty, and if alcohol will bear it, I shall be only too happy to put it on alcohol. It will be for the House, hereafter, to decide whether this increased taxation, amounting to a million and a-quarter, which, added to the surplus of 3½ millions, gives a surplus of 4½ millions, is to be applied as a subsidy to local purposes. The other remark I wish to make is in consequence of the ironical cheers with which the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. Labouchere) were received with respect to the Naval and Military expenditure. It is all very well for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to justify, in powerful and eloquent language, his disposition with reference to those items. When Lord Beaconsfield was in the height of his power the ordinary expenditure on our Army and Navy was £25,000,000. When Lord Beaconsfield left Office in 1880 it was only £25,250,000; but this year the House is going to vote £33,000,000, making, together with the £20,000,000 for the Indian Army, a normal annual expenditure of £53,300,000 in a time of peace. There may be reasons why we should endure that expenditure, and no doubt hon. Members opposite think there are; but when you have a normal military expenditure of £53,000,000 in a time of peace I defy any hon. Member to furnish a parallel to it from the Expenditure of any country in the world. I think that this is a fact that ought not to escape the attention of the House and the country.

(11.46.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I shall wish, at the proper time, to take a Division on the question of the Tea Duty.

(11.46.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think that in some respects the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman manifest injustice to Ireland, and though I do not propose to divide the Committee against the Resolution before it, I desire it to be understood that the Irish Members reserve to themselves the right of taking such steps as they may hereafter deem desirable in defence of the interests of their country.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I presume that the Government do not propose to take the Report of Supply to-night?

MR. W. H. SMITH: We propose to take Report of Supply, but not to go into matters of a controversial character.

Question put, and agreed to.

CUSTOMS.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in addition to the Duties of Customs payable on Spirits under "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881," there shall be charged and paid the Duties following (that is to say):—

	£	s.	d.
For every Gallon computed at proof of Spirits of any description as in the said Act mentioned (except Perfumed Spirits)	0	0	6
For every Gallon of Perfumed Spirits.	0	0	9
For every Gallon of Liqueurs, Cordials, and other preparations entered so as to be chargeable under the said Act with the Duty of Fourteen Shillings	0	0	8 and so in proportion for any less quantity.

And the Duties of Customs on the articles hereinafter mentioned, being articles of which Spirits are a part or ingredient, shall be proportionately increased, and shall be as follows:—

	£	s.	d.
Chloroform . . the pound	0	3	1
Collodion . . the gallon	1	5	0
Ether Acetic . . the pound	0	1	10
Ether Butyric . . the gallon	0	15	8
Ether Sulphuric . the gallon	1	6	2
Ethyl, Iodide of . the gallon	0	13	7

and so in proportion for any less quantity."—
(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

COLONEL NOLAN: I should like to point out in reference to this Vote that the Government are proposing to tax a most useful and beneficent anæsthetic. The man who invented chloroform probably conferred greater benefit on the human race than any other inventor who ever lived. Why, I ask, is chloroform to be made the subject of taxation? Perhaps the Government will furnish some explanation of the reason why such articles are to be taxed.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Excise Authorities find it impossible to make any difference in regard to the taxation of spirits. No change is made in regard to the law, and the increase on the existing duty is not large. I am quite sure that hon. Members will not expect me to enter into a scientific discussion on such a subject at the present moment, even if I were competent to do so.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co., Mid): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman takes into consideration when he proposes to increase the tax on anæsthetics how important these things are in surgical operations. He has apparently forgotten that already the price of these articles is exceedingly high, and it seems to me to be unwise to still further enhance the cost of materials which are only used for the purpose of relieving pain, notably in the case of poor persons who are subject to surgical treatment. Hon. Members may not object to proposals making the consumption of intoxicating liquors as expensive as possible; but at the same time I think it will be generally granted that articles like chloroform, which are merely aids to humanity, ought to be made as cheap as possible. In increasing the cost of these things there is some risk of doing harm by adding to the inducements to adulteration.

Question put, and agreed to.

METHYLATED SPIRITS.

3. Resolved, That no drawback shall be allowed to a Rectifier of Spirits in respect of Duty-paid Spirits Methylated, after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety.

EXCISE LICENCE.

4. Resolved, That every Excise Licence to carry on any trade or business (except the trade or business of an Appraiser, Auctioneer, or Hawker), which shall hereafter be granted, shall only authorise the person to whom the Licence is granted to carry on the trade or business mentioned therein, in one set of premises to be specified in the Licence.

PLATE DUTIES.

5. Resolved, That, from and after the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety, the Stamp Duties and the Duties of Customs now payable on Plate of Gold and Plate of Silver shall cease to be payable, and the Drawback now payable upon the exportation of Plate shall cease to be allowed; and in respect of Plate of Silver manufactured in the United Kingdom, which has not left the stock of any manufacturer or other licensed dealer in Plate, an allowance, by way of Drawback, shall be made out of the Consolidated Fund or the growing produce thereof, subject to (amongst other provisions) the provisions following (that is to say):—

- (a) Every licensed dealer in Plate who is entitled to make any claim for allowance shall, on or before the seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety, give notice of his intention to make such claim upon a form to be immediately provided and delivered to him by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue;
- (b) If the aggregate number of ounces of Plate of Silver, in respect of which claims are sent in and proved to be valid and correct, is not such that the amount required to repay the Duties paid thereon would exceed the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, the whole of such Duties shall be repaid, but, if otherwise, that sum shall be distributed rateably amongst the claimants according to the number of ounces in respect whereof each of them has established his claim.

INCOME TAX.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say)—

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of Sixpence;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,—

In England, the Duty of Three-pence;

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Duty of Twopence Farthing;

Subject to the provisions contained in section one hundred and sixty-three of the Act of the fifth and sixths years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-five, for the exemption of persons whose income is less than One Hundred and Fifty-five Pounds, and in section eight of ‘The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876,’ for the relief of persons whose income is less than Four Hundred Pounds.”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I was under the impression that the Government did not propose to take this Vote to-night, and I trust it will not be insisted on.

MR. GOSCHEN: Under the circumstances, I do not propose to press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

TEA.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in lieu of the Duty of Customs now chargeable upon Tea, there shall be charged and paid, on and after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety, the Duty following, and such Duty shall continue to be charged and paid upon Tea imported into Great Britain and Ireland until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one (that is to say):

Tea the pound . . . Four Pence."
—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. PICTON: This is a proposal to alter a duty which has been in existence for a very long time, and I think the Committee ought to have a full opportunity of discussing it.

MR. GOSCHEN: That opportunity will be afforded on the Report. The date fixed for the remission is the 1st of May, which is not very far ahead, and it is important that the trade should know what it has to expect.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I think, under the circumstances, this Motion ought not to be pressed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [1st April] reported (see page 416) and read the first and second time.

Resolution 1.

*(12.3.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I have an Amendment on the Paper "to reduce the Vote by £500 (part of Vote for Restoration of Westminster Hall)." It is not my intention to repeat the observations I have made before on the Vote, except as to one point. I, on a former occasion, called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works to the fact that there was no accommodation for the carriages of Members of this House in Palace Yard, except a sort of cave at the North entrance, which is extremely inconvenient of access. The right hon. Gentleman then told the Committee that that cavern or receptacle was intended for horses and not for carriages at all. It will be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman that he promised to consider the matter to see if some arrangement could not be made for the convenience of hon. Members. I find that an Order has been issued from the Board of Works, forbidding carriages to enter the cave, and, therefore, though 8 or 10 carriages were some time ago able to seek refuge there, there is now no protection whatever for them. I should like to know why that Order has been issued? There is no danger in the matter of driving into the cavern. I tested the matter by driving a carriage into it myself, and I came to the conclusion that any well-conducted schoolboy could drive a carriage down without the least chance of accident. Therefore, I do not see why Members should not be allowed to use that receptacle if they think fit. I would point out that the interior is by no means so dangerous as the descent from the Strand, say down Buckingham Street, and I therefore do not see why we should be prevented from using this cave. I would also point out that this cave is lighted up at night. At this moment there are 14 gas lights burning in it for the sole delectation, it seems to me, of messengers belonging to the Standard newspaper. I have great respect for that newspaper, but I do not see why we should burn gas lights for its advantage alone, and I find that the only occupants of this place are four bicycles or velocipedes with their riders belonging to that journal. I think we might have some part of the space at the end of Westminster Hall converted into a refuge for carriages. Another point I desire to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to is the staircases in Westminster Hall. I do not wish to repeat the arguments I have already used: but as the right hon. Gentleman has followed my advice with regard to the southern end of that Hall, I would urge him also to adopt my suggestion with regard to these staircases. The area of the Hall need not be interfered with, nor its structure, for the alteration I propose could be brought about by removing the return staircases. For the purpose of raising a discussion, I move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £500.

Amendment proposed to the first Resolution, to leave out "£165,767," and insert "£165,267,"—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck),—instead thereof.

Question put, "That '£165,767' stand part of the Resolution."

(12.10) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): In my opinion the buildings to which the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has referred are more suited to a carriage-shed than anything else, and I hope he will be able to come to terms with the First Commissioner of Works with regard to them. I do not like this Vote to pass without raising a word of protest with regard to the restorations of Westminster Hall. I do not think anything in the way of real restoration has been done; but we have had a building put up more like a second-rate dissenting church than anything else—a structure which is a disgrace to this House, which has no perspective, and which is as defective in architectural beauty as any average dissenting church. As to the interior of Westminster Hall, I would ask whether it would not be possible to reduce that meretricious piece of architecture which has been called "Spurgeon's pulpit" there?

*(12.12.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I will undertake respectfully to consider any plan the right hon. Gentleman may suggest for the improvement of the interior of Westminster Hall or any other building. If the hon. Member (Sir G. Campbell) has any design to propose to improve the beauty of that part of the Hall lately restored, it shall receive every attention if he will lay it before me. As to the accommodation for horses, I should be very glad if something could be done, and I will take care that the matter is not lost sight of. I should be sorry, however, to set up any temporary shed which would have the effect of disfiguring the place. Also I am afraid it would be impossible to provide any large amount of accommodation for carriages—especially carriages with pairs of horses. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) says in regard to the "cave" to which he has referred that he himself has driven down it, and that there is no danger in so doing; but I certainly think it would be dangerous if a large number of spirited animals were congregated there. If the right hon. Gentleman can suggest an alternative scheme to that we have carried out, I shall be very glad to consider it.

(12.15.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I do not think there is any good in crying over spilt milk. We must make the best of what we have got. I think the right hon. Gentleman might make a way for carriages to go into this place by taking down the low wall in front of it, lowering the level of the yard, and making an exit at the end opposite the present entrance. It is really useless in these days to provide accommodation for the horses of Members. It is, however, highly desirable that some shelter should be provided for carriages. A suggestion has been made that a temporary shed should be put up opposite the entrance to the House of Commons for the accommodation of carriages. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider that suggestion, and endeavour to provide accommodation.

(12.17.) The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Akers-Douglas and Sir William Walrond were appointed Tellers for the Ayes, but no Members being willing to act as Tellers for the Noes, Mr. Speaker declared that the Ayes had it.

Resolution agreed to.

Second, Third, and Fourth Resolutions agreed to.

Fifth Resolution postponed.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

Postponed Resolution to be considered upon Monday next.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (BOROUGH OF BELFAST) BILL.—(No. 153.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Macartney.)

DR. TANNER: I object.

MR. SEXTON: This is a Bill to adjust, I believe in an equitable sense, the cost of the registration of voters in the Borough of Belfast, in consequence of an addition to the borough, and I think my hon. Friend might agree to the Second Reading.

*MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I am quite willing to name a day which will give time for considering Amendments. I intend to submit them to the hon. Member for West Belfast in case the Second Reading be taken to-night.

DR. TANNER: Of course, if my hon. Friend is willing, and if the hon. Gentleman will acquaint my hon. Friend with all the steps that are taken, I will trust him so far.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and Committed for Monday, 5th May.

POST OFFICE MAIL CONTRACTS.
(AUSTRALIAN MAILS.)

Resolved, That the Contracts with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, dated the 19th January, 1888, and the Orient Steam Navigation Company, dated the 23rd January, 1888, for the conveyance of the Australian Mails, be approved.—(Mr. Jackson.)

LAND PURCHASE AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL, 1890.

Return ordered—

"Showing approximately the Amounts and Distribution of the Imperial Annual Grants to Ireland for local purposes, proposed to be dealt with under the Cash and Contingent portions, respectively, of the Guarantee Fund."

"And, Table illustrative of the operation of the proposed provision for creating a 'Tenants' Insurance Fund.'—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

Return presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.
[No. 134.]

MOTIONS.

TOWN HOLDINGS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Lawson, Bill to give compensation to occupying tenants of Town Holdings for beneficial improvements, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Lawson, Earl Compton, and Mr. James Rowlands.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 227.]

ROCHESTER BISHOPRIC BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Gorst, Bill to amend "The Bishopric of St. Alban's Act, 1875," as regards the Bishopric of Rochester, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Gorst, Sir John Mowbray, Mr. Cobitt, Mr. Edward Knatchbull-Hugessen, and Mr. Causton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 228.]

IRELAND—FUNERAL OF MR. M.
HARRIS—CONDUCT OF POLICE.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House:—

MR. SEXTON: I should like to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has any information as to the circumstances of the funeral of a late Member of this House, Mr. Matthew Harris, whose death is, I am sure, regretted by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I am informed that a body of policemen, armed with batons, and accompanied by a note-taker, broke into the churchyard and remained there during the interment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have no information to that effect. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put a question down for to-morrow.

DR. TANNER: Has the right hon. Gentleman any information concerning the action of some drunken policemen who followed and insulted the hon. Member for Spalding (Mr. Halley Stewart) while driving to Cashel?

MR. MADDEN: I have no information.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 18th April, 1890.

SAT FIRST.

The Lord Ashburton, after the death of his father.

LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL BILL—(No. 12.)
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: The Bill which I ask your Lordships to read a second time to-night is so simple in its character, and so obvious in its purpose that it will require the fewest possible words of explanation. By various Statutes passed within the last 150 years, some of the prebendal stalls in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield have been attached to Canonries, and some to benefices, for the purpose of increasing the endowment of these benefices. As the prebendal stalls have now ceased, as your Lordships are aware, to have any income attached to them, the purpose for which they were thus annexed has come to an end, and it is very desirable that appointments may be made to fill up the number of Canonries in the Cathedral. That really is the whole purpose of this Bill, and the method by which it is proposed to proceed is, to authorise and give power to the Lichfield Cathedral Chapter to frame a Statute or Statutes with a view to accomplishing these objects. I move, my Lords, that this Bill be now read a second time.

Read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from, That the Committee have added the Lord Bishop of Lichfield to the Standing Committee for General Bills for the consideration of the Lichfield Cathedral Bill; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 18th April, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the fact that in some places where the population is less than 10,000, there exists more than one branch of the Volunteer Service; and whether, since such an arrangement may interfere with the efficiency of the several corps affected, he can provide a remedy?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): In the early days of the Volunteer Force the raising of corps was sanctioned in particular localities mainly with reference to local wishes. Now, however, that mobilisation for home defence is the principal consideration, only those corps are allowed which suit the scheme of defence of the particular district. There are difficulties in changing a corps from one arm of the Service to another; and local prejudices have also to be fully allowed for. But I cordially sympathise with the suggestion of my hon. Friend, and shall be glad to consider in any particular case whether we cannot do something to meet the difficulty.

THE BELL ROCK LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any detailed statement explaining the circumstances attending the explosion of a fog signal at the Bell Rock Lighthouse, on the night of the 5th April, which extinguished the lights, and is reported to have shattered the glass, wrecked the dome, and deranged the lighting apparatus; whether he will state for how many successive nights the usual lights have not been exhibited, and whether this is the first occasion on which the lighthouse has been in darkness since its first illumination on the 10th February, 1811; whether the regulations of the Board of Trade permit that explosive fog signals should be worked in proximity to the lighting apparatus; and whether precautions will be taken for the future in this and other lighthouses against the recurrence of a casualty which, by extinguishing an important light, might be followed by serious peril to vessels approaching the British coasts?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Scottish Lighthouses are under the management of the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, who have forwarded a lengthy Report upon the subject, from which it appears that the usual light was not exhibited at the Bell Rock from the 5th to the 12th of April, that is, for eight nights, and that this is the only occasion on which the lighthouse has been in darkness since it was first lighted. The regulations made, not by the Board of Trade, but by the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses, do provide for the explosive signal being fired only when at a due and safe distance outside of and above the lighting apparatus. The regulations were, however, not carried out, and the Commissioners have directed their engineer to report whether such a modification of the fog signal apparatus can be made as will render impossible the recurrence of a similar accident.

THE CARLISLE RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he proposes to take respecting the fatal railway accident at Carlisle on 4th March, with special reference to the evidence given that the defective brake had proved defective at Northampton in 1889; and also having regard to the following sentence in the verdict of the Coroner's Jury:—

"We are further of opinion that the London and North-Western Railway Company incurred a very grave responsibility in using a brake of such an uncertain and unreliable character?"

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Until I have received and had time to consider the Report of the Inspecting Officer appointed to inquire into the circumstances attending the accident referred to by the hon. Member, I am not in a position to make any statement. I am informed that the Report will be ready in a few days, and I will at once lay it on the Table of the House.

Mr. Leng

PARCELS POST—DEFECTIVE SERVICE.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether complaints have reached him that a parcel of winter underclothing was sent from the Strand to Upper Street, Islington, a distance of two miles, on the 20th December last, but was undelivered up to the 8th January; whether the Post Office Authorities refused to make any compensation, as other carriers must have done, for the loss caused by the delay; and if it be true that the Departmental excuse was that the parcel had no address on it; and, if so, how it found its way to the Northern District post office; and whether, prior to its delivery, its original wrapper had been removed and another substituted?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The non-delivery in due course of the parcel referred to by the hon. Member arose from the absence of an address. How the address became detached in course of post is not known. It was apparently written on a label, which, presumably, was not firmly attached to the parcel. The enclosing of the parcel in a fresh cover was an act of grace on the part of the Post Office for the greater security of the parcel, and for enabling the address, when ultimately furnished by the sender, to be written upon it. No blame attaches to the Department, and no grounds for compensation exist.

IRELAND—THE REV. J. BROWN, C.C.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Rev. J. Brown, C.C. of Ramsgrange, County Wexford, has received a communication from the Resident Magistrate of the district, informing him that he would be followed by the police if he did not refrain from holding meetings of the National League; and whether, in pursuance of this threat, it is true that a police constable followed Father Brown into the house of a dying woman; and, if so, whether the police acted in accordance with their instructions; and whether this part of the County Wexford is quite free from crime?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that the communication referred to in the question was made, not by the Resident Magistrate, but by the Divisional Commissioner. It was to the effect that the rev. gentleman would be watched if he did not refrain from holding unlawful meetings. That part of the County Wexford is free from crime classed in the Returns as agrarian. Whether it is free from intimidation or other illegal conspiracies I cannot say without further inquiry.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): A criminal prosecution having failed against this rev. gentleman, is it desirable that he should be spied upon and followed by the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume that the usual course has been followed where a person is suspected of holding illegal meetings.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is the right hon. Gentleman in possession of evidence that this gentleman has been engaged in holding illegal meetings; and, if so, why have not proceedings been taken against him in the ordinary way? Why should his life be rendered miserable by the police dogging him about day after day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say whether this gentleman has not persisted in holding illegal meetings or not.

LAND COMMISSION—FERMANAGH.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that great dissatisfaction exists amongst the tenant farmers of Fermanagh owing to the fact that the Sub-Commissioners have not been to the County Fermanagh since November, 1888; and whether it is a fact that there were several cases in which notices to fix fair rents in Fermanagh were served as far back as October, 1887, and which have not yet been heard?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that a Sub-Commission sat in the county in October, November, and December, 1888. There are in the county 69 cases undisposed of, in which the originating notices were received before the 31st October, 1887. A Sub-Commission will shortly sit in Enniskillen to hear cases from the county.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman, in view of the great dissatisfaction which exists, will use his influence in having these cases heard at once, especially those which originated so far back as 1887?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no control over the movements of the Land Commission; but I have no doubt that the Commissioners will take into account the circumstances of the case.

ORANGE JURORS AT DERRY ASSIZES.

SIR CHARLES LEWIS (Antrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, with reference to the trial and conviction at the recent Derry Assizes of the parties found guilty under "The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1887," for offences in the nature of intimidation and boycotting, as to which it was alleged that the greater number of the jury who tried the prisoners were Orangemen, he has been able to make inquiries as to the truth of such allegation; whether his attention has been called to the declaration signed by the whole of the jury engaged in such trial in the following terms:—

"We, the undersigned members of the jury in the case of the boycotting of the Great Northern Railway at Carrickmacross, beg to say that we are not Orangemen, nor have we ever had any connection with the institution;"

and whether he has reason to believe in the truthfulness of such declaration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The trial referred to was under the ordinary law. I have no official information as to the religious denomination or particular party to which jurors may belong. But my attention has been called to the declaration in the public Press mentioned by my hon. Friend, in which all the members of the jury engaged in the trial referred to deny specifically as a matter of fact the allegation that any of them happened at the time or previously to belong to the Orange Institution. I have no reason to doubt the truthfulness of such declaration.

MR. SEXTON: As the Society is a secret one, what reason can the right hon. Gentleman have either one way or the other? Is he not aware of the secret nature of the organisation of the Orange Society?

*MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Is there any reason to believe that, if the gentlemen referred to had been members of the Orange Institution, they would have disregarded the sanctity of their oath?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I feel quite unequal to answering all these questions. I know nothing of the constitution of the Orange Society. What I said was that I had no reason to doubt the truth of the declaration made by the jury.

CAPTAIN RYE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor has been directed to the fact that Captain Richard John Rye, D.L., of Rye Court, Cookstown, County Cork, has, after three days' trial before the Cookstown Bench of Magistrates, been returned for trial to next Cork Assizes charged with a felonious assault; and whether it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor to continue Captain Rye in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Lord Chancellor is aware of the fact mentioned; but he is of opinion that it would not be proper for him to take any present action which would be calculated to prejudice the trial of the case.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this is not the first accusation of a similar assault against Captain Rye?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware; but even if it were true it would not affect the decision of the Lord Chancellor.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that on the 26th March last, Mr. John Rye, D.L., moved and succeeded in carrying the rejection of a poor man named Corcoran's application for outdoor relief at the Bandon Board of Guardians, which application was made in consequence of Corcoran not being able to work, being severely wounded by Mr. Rye's father, Captain R. Rye, D.L., who was lately returned for trial for this felonious assault; and whether it is in his power to take any action in the matter?

Mr. Sexton

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member will refer to the reply given by me to his question on this subject asked on 31st March, he will find that the allegation he now makes as to Corcoran's application for relief having been rejected on 26th March is not a fact. On the contrary, this man's allowance of 5s. a week was then continued, and has since continued.

DR. TANNER: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. John Rye moved and succeeded in carrying the rejection of relief to this poor man on the day in question? If he will make inquiry he will find that the application for outdoor relief was made and officially rejected on the 26th of March. Will the right hon. Gentleman cause some inquiry to be made into the action of Mr. Rye on this occasion in endeavouring to defeat justice in the case of his father, Captain Rye, now charged with a felonious assault and attempt to murder?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of the facts of the case.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand, from the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, that Captain Rye did not fire upon this man on two occasions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman put a question upon the Paper in regard to the refusal of relief, and he now puts a rider to the question about somebody else—a third person.

DR. TANNER: Mr. Speaker, I must ask—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: But I want to know—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE FUNERAL OF MR. M. HARRIS— CONDUCT OF THE POLICE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, yesterday, at Ballinasloe, the police demanded accommodation for a police reporter at the funeral of Mr. Matthew Harris, M.P., and upon being informed that such a demand was regarded as an outrage, broke into the graveyard in force, armed with batons, and accompanied by a body of detectives and of note-takers, and remained there until after the interment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet been able to receive any information upon this matter. If I receive it in time I will answer the question later on.

MR. SEXTON: I must protest against the delay, seeing that London is in direct communication with Dublin and Ballinasloe, and I beg to give notice that I will raise the question of the indignity offered to the dead body of my hon. Friend on the Motion that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair for the purpose of going into Committee of Ways and Means.

THE ASHBOURNE ACTS.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the 12 holdings which are stated to have been the subject of default after sale under the Ashbourne Acts, if he will state their original sale price under these Acts, and the amount advanced on them, also whether they were all put up for sale again after the default; how many were re-sold; how much did they realise as compared with the original sale price; and, if any loss has been incurred, to what account has it been debited?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners do not resume possession of holdings under Section 3 of the Act of 1885. All holdings put up for sale for default in payment of instalments are so put up subject to the future instalments of the annuity payable in redemption of the original purchase-money. Of the 12 cases referred to in the question nine have been sold, and three, as I understand, remain unsold. In the nine cases the purchase money was £9,579. The fresh purchasers paid £501, subject to the redemption of the original purchase money, as above stated.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain to the House why, instead of the Return moved for by the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) of the names of the landowners in Ireland, "the purchase of whose property has been sanctioned by the Irish Land Commission," a Return, No. 115, has been presented giving the particulars of "completed sales" only; whether this circumstance explains the fact that the total amount shown to have been advanced under the Ashbourne Acts, both in the Return in question and in No. 81, of which it is a continuation, is £5,123,479 only; and whether he will lay upon the Table the additional particulars necessary to show how and to whom the remaining funds available under the above-named Acts, amounting to nearly £5,000,000, have been or are now being allotted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Return was limited as described because the provisional sanction of the Commissioners is not always followed by a completion of the transaction, as it sometimes happens that one or other of the parties either cannot or will not fully comply with the necessary conditions. The Commissioners considered that the names of the applicants in cases not yet complete should not be included. All finally sanctioned cases are included, and they make up the total figure given in the Return. A monthly Return is laid on the Table of the House, and the latest of these Returns shows that up to the end of February the total amount applied for was £8,393,000, while the advances provisionally sanctioned amounted to £6,760,000.

THE CLONGOREY PRISONERS.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the following Report of Mr. McCarthy, Visiting Justice to Grangegorman Prison on the condition of the infant child of Mrs. Morrissey, one of the Clongorey prisoners—

"I notice a marked change for the worse in the appearance of Mary Morrissey's child. Long confinement in a small cell is evidently telling on her, and if continued will, in my opinion, have a very serious effect;"

and whether, under the circumstances, he will recommend the immediate release of both mother and child?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the Medical Officer of the prison does not entertain a serious view of the condition of the child. Should, however, he be of opinion that further confinement would endanger its health the matter will be at once brought before the committing Judge. It is not the case that the prisoner and her child are confined in a small cell.

The prisoner is treated as a first-class misdemeanant, and, as a matter of fact, is permitted to have a small range consisting of four cells during the day. The cell in which she and the child are placed in at night is of good dimensions and well heated and ventilated.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not the fact that this woman is in prison for contempt of an order in regard to a farm of which she was not the tenant, and that the child is only about two months old?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From the answer I have received from the Prison Authorities, it appears neither the mother nor the child is in danger; and as the woman is in prison for contempt of Court it is a matter which is entirely in the hands of the Judge who committed her.

THE LANDED ESTATES COURT.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table a Return of Irish Estates in the Landed Estates Court for sale, showing the location of each estate, the name of the landlord, the rateable valuation, the actual present rental, the highest offer made in each case in which there has been any offer of purchase, and the period for which each estate has been in the hands of the Court? I have put down this question again in order to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman what part of the information he is prepared to give.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Registrar to the Land Judge reports that the means do not exist in this Court of giving the rateable valuation, the actual present rental, or the highest offer made in each case in which there has been any offer. The rest of the question could be answered, but would take a long time, and would probably show no useful information, as it would include both sold and unsold land, and all kinds of tenures, life estates, short leases, &c., as well as fee-simple estates. If it were required to give only unsold lands it would take a still longer time to make the Return, which in no event could be completed before the end of the present Session, as each case would have to be minutely examined to ascertain what, if any, part of it had been sold. The Argyll Return might possibly give some information on the subject.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. SEXTON: I submit that in considering the Land Purchase Bill it is indispensable that the House should know what prices were offered in Court; and I would press on the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of furnishing this information in some form or other.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be glad to give every information to the House in regard to any part of the Land Bill that will tend to elucidate the measure; but, from the answer which the Land Court has given me, I am not very hopeful that this particular information can be given.

THE COINAGE.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware of the great inconvenience that is at present caused by a large part of the coinage of this Country not having on either the obverse or the reverse side the value clearly marked; and whether he will undertake that all coins to be issued from the Mint in future shall bear legibly upon either the obverse or the reverse side the denomination of their exact value?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I would refer the hon. Gentleman to an answer given by me on the 14th of March of this year, in which I pointed out that the question of the denomination of the value of silver coins was under consideration.

MR. COGHILL: Is not Great Britain the only country in the world where the gold coins are not marked with their value?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Every one knows what a sovereign is, and I have never before heard any complaint with reference to its value not being marked.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): When will the decision with reference to the silver coins take effect?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The existing stock must be dealt with first, and there are other matters connected with the design, &c., which will be attended to at the same time.

MR. COGHILL: Is not the Australian sovereign marked with its value?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; but I do not think that the Australians can give us lessons with regard to our coinage.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Scotland if he will state to the House the total amount of assessment levied in Scotland under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act in each of the last five years, giving separately the amount raised by assessment by Burgh and County Local Authority in each of said five years?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. M. T. STORMONTH DARNING, Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews): The amount of assessment levied under these Acts in Scotland, as shown by the Local Taxation Returns, was—In 1884-5, counties, £7,802, burghs, £3,232; 1885-6, counties, £10,637, burghs, £2,401; 1886-7, counties, £12,570, burghs, £4,722; 1887-8, counties, £29,931, burghs, £8,776; 1888-9, counties, £27,286, burghs, £9,580. The totals for these years respectively being—£11,034, £13,038, £17,292, £38,707, £36,866.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board the total amount of the assessment raised under the Contagious Diseases Animals Acts in England and Wales during each of the last five years, stating separately the amount raised during each of said five years by Burgh and by County Local Authority?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The only information which I can give is as to the expenditure of the Local Authorities in England and Wales under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts during the five years 1884-1888 according to the Local Taxation Returns. The expenditure of the County Authorities during each of the years was:—1883-4, £78,334; 1884-5, £49,558; 1885-6, £68,464; 1886-7, £81,347; 1887-8, £63,334. The expenditure incurred in Municipal Boroughs, in other Sanitary Districts, and in the Metropolis was:—1883-4, £14,705; 1884-5, £13,018; 1885-6, £17,471; 1886-7, £17,573; 1887-8, £17,784.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Does that include payment for animals slaughtered?

MR. LONG: It includes the entire expenditure.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will put a stop to the practice which exists, contrary to the spirit of the Prison Act, of placing three prisoners in one cell, in consequence of which practice one prisoner was murdered about two years ago in Armley Gaol, Leeds, and which same custom called forth a public protest from Mr. Justice Hawkins, at the Derbyshire Assizes held this month, when it was stated in evidence that in Derby Gaol recently two prisoners had, for more than a week, been placed in the same cell with a man who had committed murder, and was insane?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The case alluded to by my right hon. Friend as having occurred at Derby is now under investigation by an Inspector, who has been sent down specially to inquire into all the circumstances. The practice of placing prisoners in association when one of them is epileptic or requires supervision is expressly allowed by the Prison Act of 1865, which leaves it to the medical officer to determine the cases in which it is proper to resort to the system of association. The Orders of the Home Office have since 1884 provided that where a prisoner is insane he shall be under the personal supervision of officers or hired attendants, and not of other prisoners. The Prison Commissioners are informed by the medical officer of Derby Gaol that the man alluded to was not insane. This is one of the matters that the Inspector is inquiring into.

MINES INSPECTORS' REPORTS.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will inform the House when the Statistical Abstract of the Mines Inspectors' Reports for the year ending 1889 will be issued; and whether he will hasten the issue of the complete Reports of the Mines Inspectors for 1889, so that they may be in the hands of the Members of this House before the Votes on the Home Office are taken?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Abstract has been presented to Parliament, and will be ready for distribution in the course of next week. Steps have been taken to forward as much as possible the printing and issuing of the Reports of 1889.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Reports for 1888 were not issued until the House had risen last year? A promise was given by the right hon. Gentleman that he would use his best efforts to accelerate the presentation of these Reports.

MR. MATTHEWS: I said that I would do all in my power to press forward the Reports, and I have done so.

HALL MARKING OF GOLD AND SILVER PLATE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the compulsory hall marking of gold and silver plate shall continue, in the interests of the public, and of honesty of manufacture, regulations will be framed, notwithstanding the remission of the duty, to provide for the British hall marking of imported plate?

*MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): Why is it that imported foreign silver plate is not required to be marked? Why should it be treated in a different way from gold watch cases and other articles that are imported, and why should it not be marked with different standards?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not prepared to answer the questions of the hon. Member for Whitechapel (Mr. Montagu). In regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Member behind me (Mr. H. Vincent), it is our intention to retain the present system of compulsory hall marking for foreign imported silver plate, subject to the remarks which I made yesterday as to the hall marking of Indian plate at the rupee standard.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: As the Government deprived me of the opportunity of raising this very question early in the Session, will the right hon. Gentleman give me an opportunity of making a representation to him of the objections felt to compulsory hall marking, especially as affecting Indian silver?

Mr. Pickard

*MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to make a representation, either formal or informal, I will give him every consideration; but the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of being heard if any change of legislation is required in consequence of the abolition of the Plate Duty.

CLERKS TO COUNTY JUSTICES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General when he proposes to introduce his promised Bill to prohibit clerks to County Justices from conducting prosecutions at Assizes or Quarter Sessions in cases committed by the Bench of Magistrates for whom they act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. and learned Member I have to say that the matter has been carefully considered; but it involves so much difficulty in connection with the due conduct of cases in remote country districts that Her Majesty's Government have not, at present, been able to devise any scheme which is entirely satisfactory, and I cannot undertake to introduce any Bill this Session.

THE BUDGET PROPOSITIONS.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON: Considering that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a large surplus, will the Government be willing to grant better postal facilities for Wick and the North of Scotland?

*MR. RAIKES: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of that question.

In reply to Mr. HOWARD VINCENT,

*MR. GOSCHEN said: The allocation of the Scotch portion of the grant has not yet been finally determined. The Scotch Office is considering the matter.

*MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Are we to understand that the mode of distribution in Scotland is not prejudged by the fact that in England a portion is to go in buying up licences? Will the distribution in Scotland be dealt with by a Bill, so that the Scotch Members may be heard upon the question?

*MR. GOSCHEN : No, Sir ; we propose that Scotland, England, and Ireland shall be dealt with in the same measure, which will facilitate the proceedings ; but the same principles may not be acted upon in regard to the three countries. There may be such variations as circumstances may suggest. The hon. Member need not think that the question has been settled yet, as far as the distribution in Scotland is concerned.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.) : May I ask whether, as the right hon. Gentleman states that the application of the money in Scotland has not yet been determined, he means that the Scotch Members will have an opportunity of expressing their views on the subject before the question is settled ?

*MR. GOSCHEN : The Scotch Members must take their chance in the same way as other Members of the House. The Government have paid special attention to the case of Scotland in the matter, and the allocation must be proposed on our own responsibility.

In reply to Sir W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth),

*MR. GOSCHEN said : I must answer the question of the hon. Baronet with caution. He asks me whether it is intended that public money should be paid for the supposed value of licences, the renewal of which is in the discretion of the magistrates. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am in the habit of taking considerable notice of the houses in question as regards Probate Duty and Income Tax, Schedule A. A particular value is considered to attach to public-houses, and I must, therefore, demur to the expression "supposed value." A portion of the money which I described last night is intended for the purchase of houses which are considered to be of a known value, not a supposed value.

SIR W. LAWSON : Is it intended by the Government scheme that licences granted annually shall be treated as a freehold ?

*MR. GOSCHEN : No ; I should demur to any such inference. The value would depend on what business was done. It will be dealt with as a matter of commercial regulations. It is voluntary on the part of the County Councils to purchase the licences ; but it is well-known that these houses have a certain value which for years has been subject to taxation.

THE IRISH LAND PURCHASE BILL.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton) : Will the Chief Secretary for Ireland give an assurance to the House that the Paper which has been referred to in connection with the state of the Irish Church Funds will be presented on Monday morning ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I believe that every Paper will be in the Vote Office in the course of an hour or two.

MR. SEXTON : Will the Land Bill be taken as the first Order on Monday ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Yes, Sir.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

Copy ordered—

"Of Returns of Accidents and Casualties, as reported to the Board of Trade by the several Railway Companies in the United Kingdom, during the year ending 31st December, 1889, together with Reports of the Inspecting Officers of the Railway Department to the Board of Trade upon certain Accidents which were inquired into."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Copy presented accordingly ; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.—(No. 137.)

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection that they had discharged Sir Robert Fowler from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, in respect of the Bankruptcy Bill, and had appointed in substitution Mr. Gainsford Bruce.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 5).

Order for Second Reading (30th April) read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BI-METALLISM.

* (4.15.) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): In moving the Resolution of which I have given notice, I ask the indulgence of the House while I try to lay before it, as succinctly as I can, a very intricate and, at the same, a very important question. The subject was discussed last year briefly and inadequately, and I raise it now in order that we may have a more exhaustive debate and that I may take the sense of the House upon it. To show the keen interest felt in it, I may say that no fewer than 140 Petitions had been presented to the House in favour of my proposal from many of the most important industrial centres of the Kingdom, from chambers of commerce and chambers of agriculture, from working men's societies, and various industrial interests, and the signatures attached amount to no fewer than 60,000. For the sake of clearness I will divide the subject into three heads—first, the advantage of the old bi-metallic system of Europe; secondly, the evils which arose from its rupture; and thirdly, the practicability and desirability of re-establishing it. The custom of mankind since the origin of civilisation has been to use gold and silver alike as standard money tied together by a ratio fixed by law. This ratio did not vary much from 10 or 11 of silver to 1 of gold, or as 11 to 1 under the Greek and Roman Empires, and during the Middle Ages down to the discovery of America, it remained very steady. For nearly 2,000 years silver was the money of the world. Then, owing to the enormous supplies of silver from the mines of Potosi, it gradually altered in the course of a century to 15 to 1, at which it continued with little alteration for 200 years prior to 1873. So steady was the ratio that the Royal Commission on the Currency, which reported two years ago, unanimously stated (page 2)—

“From the middle of the 17th century the relative value of the two metals did not vary much more than 3 per cent in either direction until the recent divergence began to manifest itself in 1873.”

We have frequently had, in a single year, since 1873, greater variations between gold and silver than in the whole 200 years before that date, and it must be obvious that a totally new influence has come into play. Let me point out the distinction that existed between the bi-metallism that prevailed before this century, and that which came into force in France from 1803 to 1873. The old bi-metallism of Europe was a very rude and unscientific system. There was no unity of action among the nations; each adopted and changed its ratio at will; one nation had 15 to 1; another, like England in the last century, had 15·21 to 1, as fixed by Sir Isaac Newton in 1717; others had 14½ to 1, and so on. Silver was the principal money, and gold was rated to it; besides there was no open Mints, with unlimited coinage of either metal, which is the absolute condition of effective bi-metallism. The various countries coined a certain amount of either metal as suited them, and each metal naturally gravitated to the centres where it was most highly valued. No doubt many and great inconveniences resulted from this form of bi-metallism, yet it gave the world the inestimable advantage of keeping both metals in circulation at very nearly a fixed par of exchange. The second period of bi-metallism was the French system from 1803 to 1873, which was far more scientific, and far more successful in binding the two metals together. The ratio adopted was 15½ to 1, and so successful was that system in preventing fluctuations, that the extreme variation in the London Market between the metals in 70 years was from 15·21 to 15·90, and these variations are easily accounted for by the fact that England became a gold using country by the Act of 1816, and when silver was wanted for export to India it had to be imported from France at a considerable cost of transit, insurance and other exchange charges. These charges fully explain the slight fluctuations in the London market. There must also be borne in mind the extraordinary strain to which the French system was put during these 70 years. In the early part of that period the yield of gold was extremely small, say £2,000,000 a year against £6,000,000, of silver. England resumed specie payments in 1821, and so drained the Continent of gold, and there were times when a small premium on gold was charged in France for export, very seldom going as high as 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. Then came the gold discoveries of California and Australia, which raised the yield of gold to £30,000,000 annually against £8,000,000 of silver, and in 20 years doubled the gold supply of the world, yet the ratio remained unchanged. The French system acted as an equalising machine, and the vast supply of gold was diffused through the world without disturbing the relative values of the metals. In 1865 a combination of States joined France, and formed what is called the Latin Union, under similar conditions of coinage. Can anyone doubt that the French system saved Europe from a violent dislocation of gold and silver at the time of the Californian and Australian gold discoveries. If gold had then been demonetised to the extent that silver has recently been demonetised, we should have seen just as heavy a fall in gold measured by silver as we have recently seen in silver measured by gold. The ratio would have gone to 10 to 1 in place of remaining at $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1. We should have seen gold debts lightened and silver debts enhanced, just as we have recently seen gold debts enhanced and silver debts lightened. Can anyone doubt that the maintainance of the French system was an enormous gain to the cause of justice and fair play, as well as to international commerce. This country reaped all the advantages of bi-metallism, though mono-metallic itself; it had only to send its gold to Paris and get silver; or send silver and get gold, and so it could carry on its trade with India and China and South America as safely as if they all had identical money. We had virtually a par of exchange all the world over, to the enormous advantage of this country, the chief trader with the silver-using countries. I know that the great objection brought against our plan is that we attempt to do what is impossible. It is alleged that we are trying to tie together by law two commodities which constantly vary both in extent and cost of production. We are constantly told that the law can no more fix the ratio between gold and silver than between coal and iron, or between wheat and barley. I reply that the experience of the French system proves that the thing can be done in spite of the greatest fluctuations in supply ever known in the history of the world. And the reason is this: Monetary Law constitutes the chief demand for the precious metals. The tastes or desires of individual consumers constitute the demand for other commodities, but the Mint is the chief demand for either gold or silver. If the leading nations close their Mints against gold, it goes down relatively to silver; if they close their Mints against silver it goes down relatively to gold; if they keep open large bi-metallic Mints, with unlimited coinage of both metals at a fixed ratio, they virtually fix that ratio for the whole world. The finding of the Royal Commission on this head is clear and unanimous. They say:—

“Now undoubtedly the date which forms the dividing line between an epoch of approximate fixity in the relative value of Gold and Silver and one of marked instability is the year when the bi-metallic system which had previously been in force in the Latin Union ceased to be in full operation; and we are irresistibly led to the conclusion that the operation of that system, established as it was in countries the population and commerce of which were considerable, exerted a material influence upon the relative value of the two metals. So long as that system was in force we think that, notwithstanding the changes in the production and use of the precious metals, it kept the market price of silver approximately steady at the ratio fixed by law between them, namely, $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1.”

That is the finding of the Commission, presided over by Lord Herschell, and signed by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock). I cannot imagine how any fair-minded person who has studied the evidence can come to any other conclusion. Nothing more clearly illustrates the inveterate prejudice of the banking and financial class on this subject than their refusal to admit for many years that the French system had anything to do with the stability between gold and silver prior to 1873, I freely grant that there are some things which the law cannot do; it cannot fix the value of the precious metals as compared with other commodities. That depends upon many things, one of which is the supply of the precious metals. In the Middle Ages so scarce was that supply that a quarter of wheat sometimes sold at five shillings, and labourers' wages were two shillings per week. Then the discovery of the South American mines took place in the 16th century, and a great flood of the precious metals went through Europe, and prices rose fourfold. Again, after the gold discoveries in California and Australia, when once more a great flood of the precious metals flowed over Europe, prices rose 40 per cent., and I would especially call the attention of the hon. Member for Leeds to this fact, and also to the fact that this occurred simultaneously with a great reduction in the cost of production, owing to such modern inventions as railways, steam boats, and telegraphs. According to all ordinary laws, prices ought to have fallen; but instead of that they steadily rose, with occasional fluctuations, until, in 1873, they were 40 per cent. higher than they were in 1848. Then, I would ask attention to this fact. There followed a strain on gold and the demonetisation of silver, and prices kept falling for 15 years until they got below the point at which they stood in 1848. Articles have been written in the magazines to prove that the whole fall in prices is due to the fact of the discovery of economising expedients—better machinery. I would ask the House why prices steadily rose for 25 years to the extent of 40 per cent., whilst the modern economising systems of production were in operation—how came it that the values governed by gold and silver rose under these economising processes? The House must feel the force of this query. All that the law can do is to give monetary power to gold alone, or to silver alone, or tie both together under a bi-metallic system. Now, let me ask the House to look at the advantages of the old bi-metallic system. We are the great traders with the silver-using countries, which contain a population of nine hundred millions of people. They are our best customers, because they have light duties and few manufactures of their own; they need capital to develop them, we have it to spare; they are constant borrowers in the London market, and so long as gold and silver were tied together they could safely borrow, with interest payable in gold, because they always knew that a certain amount of silver would exchange against a fixed amount of gold. India borrowed largely under this system, and a vast amount of private capital was invested in all these countries, and no inconvenience was caused until the bi-metallic system was abandoned in 1873. I may mention that the exports from the United Kingdom ran up, under that system, from £63,000,000 in 1849 to £255,000,000 in 1873, from which they fell back to £212,000,000 in 1886, and last year recovered to £248,000,000. We had no trouble with the finances of India

Mr. Samuel Smith

up to that date, whereas the House knows well that since that time we have had endless deficits and the greatest difficulties. I think I have proved my first point, that the old bi-metallic system worked well for the whole world, but especially for England, the great trader with the silver-using countries. Now let me deal with the second point, namely, the evils that arose from the rupture of the bi-metallic system. It is not necessary to remind the House of the intolerable depression of trade that set in about 1874, when the Mints of France and the Latin Union were practically closed to the coinage of silver. This depression lasted, almost without interruption, till 1887. It was accompanied by an enormous fall of prices, say 30 to 40 per cent., bringing up to the lowest level known in this century; and it produced immense suffering in nearly all our industrial centres, and among the agricultural population. Wages and profits alike fell greatly. Vast numbers of workmen were thrown out of employment—estimated at one time to reach 700,000 men. Our social system was more severely strained than at any time since 1848. The Commission on the Depression of Trade collected a vast mass of evidence on the subject, and recommended that a Special Commission should investigate the monetary aspect of the question, believing that that had much to do with it. The result was that the Commission on the Currency was appointed, which has produced a most valuable Report, and which is largely confirmatory of our opinions. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the singular fact that the fall of prices and the fall of silver proceeded almost pari passu; and the years of the heaviest depression of silver were the years of the heaviest depression in trade. There can be no doubt that these two phenomena were closely connected. Silver fell, as measured by gold, 30 per cent. to the lowest point, and commodities to about 35 per cent.; but all silver-using countries escaped this depression. Prices in them remained unchanged, and commerce went on as before. When the trade of our country was dwindling in value, year by year, that of India was increasing by leaps and bounds. All other gold-using countries suffered similarly; in all there was intense depression, great social discontent, much increase of Socialism, a falling Revenue, and an increase of protection. I wish especially to call attention to this fact, as some persons try to stigmatise our course as secretly favouring Protection. I assert that the great fall in prices in gold-using countries, caused by the demonetisation of silver, enormously increased the sentiment in favour of Protection, and caused a great increase in Import Duties in France, Germany, Russia and Italy, of late years. The policy of the Bi-metallic Party undoubtedly makes for Free Trade. And now I would allude to another point. I would ask attention to a matter I dealt with last year when we debated this subject—and I repeat myself because I see hon. Members present who were not here during the former debate. I may be permitted to touch again on the matter to which I refer, because it lies almost at the root of our contention. I say that the demonetisation of silver was a commercial injustice to the debtor class in all gold-using countries. The creditor class were favoured by the appreciation of gold and the depreciation of silver. Is the House aware of the heavy burden under which the trade of this country is carried on? I do not think many people are aware of it, but I have taken pains for years past to ascertain what the charges upon our trade and commerce really are, and I put it that the trade of this country is carried on under a vast burden of fixed charges, payable in gold, amounting certainly to not less than £150,000,000 a year, and probably as much as £200,000,000 a year. These include national and local debts, mortgages, ground rents, mining royalties, railway debentures and preference shares, long leases, annuities, pensions, &c. The purchasing power of gold, even after the recent revival of trade, is about 40 per cent. greater than it was in 1873, that is to say, 40 per cent. more of the products of human industry have to be sold to raise the money needful to meet these charges. This is a tax levied by the drones on the working bees of society, and surely it cannot be for the well-being of society to add to the incomes of the idle non-producing class, at the cost of the toiling masses. I hold that one-half of this extra burden is the result of the demonetisation of silver. There are about equal amounts of gold and silver in circulation; had these metals continued to be tied together by the Bi-metallic Law of 15½ to 1, the fall of prices would have been equally diffused over both gold and silver using countries, and the fall of prices in gold-using countries would have been just half of what it has been. The creditor class, the wealthy bondholders, money lenders, mortgagees, &c., would have lost one-half of their unearned increment, which would have remained in the pockets of the working industrial class, who constitute 90 per cent. of the nation. This one-half cannot be put at less than £30,000,000 a year. In fact, there is much reason to suspect that there was a kind of conspiracy among the financial class in Europe and America to get altogether rid of silver, as full valued money, in order to increase the value of gold, in which their Revenues were paid. There arose, simultaneously, a cry for the demonetisation of silver in Germany, France, the United States, and England, from 1870 to 1878. It was advocated by the newspapers in the interest of the financial class. Their aim was to bring about a universal gold standard; they calculated on the ignorance of the masses about all monetary questions, and very nearly succeeded, for a time, in what I could only call a nefarious plot. In America they succeeded, by a kind of trick, in demonetising silver for a short time; but the American people were too shrewd to be long hood-winked; they insisted on silver being re-monetised, and they have wisely coined and put into circulation, in the shape of silver certificates, about £70,000,000, and so greatly relieved the strain on gold, the ratio being 16 to 1. Within the past few days a Bill has passed the Committee of both Houses of the Legislature enormously increasing the coinage of silver, and requiring the Government to coin, not $2,000,000 monthly, but $4,500,000, with the result of causing a great rise in the price of silver. The American people thoroughly understand that the contracting of the money supply of the country makes only in the interest of the fixed investment classes. Our object is to make our people understand the subject as well as the Americans—and when they do so, we shall find that whatever the House may arrive at as to our proposal to-day it will then respond heartily to the proposition we make. I believe that it is largely owing to the efforts of the Bi-metallic Party that the tendency to demonetise silver has been checked, and a gigantic fraud against civilisation has not been fully consummated. The agitation which we have carried on has made the masses understand that their interest lies in a full circulation of money, not in a contracted one. It has made them understand that the contraction of the currency makes only, as I say, for the interest of the fixed investment class, and is opposed to the well-being of the whole nation. I claim in support of my views the great authority of the Currency Commission. They put in the clearest light the immensely increased strain put on gold at the time when silver was demonetised; they point out that just at that time the new requirements for the United States, Germany, Italy, and other countries to fill up their circulation with gold caused a demand for £200,000,000 sterling. At that time the whole production of gold in the world was only £20,000,000 a year, of which one-half was used up in the arts: that is to say, only £10,000,000 was available annually for purposes of coinage, and to meet this sudden demand for £200,000,000. This was the moment chosen to demonetise silver, just when there was a great scarcity of gold. Need we wonder that gold was appreciated in value, just as silver was depreciated? Its supply obeyed the laws of all commodities; as the supply fell off and the demand increased it rose in value, but the increased demand was largely the product of unjust and unwise legislation, which excluded silver from the joint work it had hitherto discharged along with gold, and artificially raised one metal and lowered the other. The operation of this principle is clearly explained by Professor Thorold Rogers, in these words:—

"It will be clear that just as a very great fall would take place in the value of existing stocks of gold were this metal absolutely demonetised, so e converso a considerable rise would occur in its comparative value if in the economical history of any community, or rather of a large number of communities, gold were increasingly adopted as a measure of value and a means for carrying on commerce."

All the best economists maintain the advantage to mankind of a full supply of money, and the evil of its artificial contraction. The historian, Hume, writes—
Mr. Samuel Smith

"We find that in every kingdom into which money begins to flow in greater abundance than formerly everything takes a new face. Labour and industry gain life, the merchant becomes more enterprising, the manufacturer more diligent and skilful, and even the farmer follows his plough with greater alacrity and attention."

McCulloch wrote—

"Though like a fall of rain after a long course of dry weather an increase of the precious metals may be prejudicial to certain classes, it is beneficial to an incomparably greater number, including all who are actively engaged in industrial pursuits, and is, speaking generally, of great public and national advantage."

Chevalier says—

"Such a change will benefit those who live by current labour. It will injure those who live upon the fruits of past labour, whether their fathers' or their own; in this it will work in the same direction with most of the developments which are brought about by the great law of civilisation, to which we give the noble name of 'progress.'"

Jevons strongly maintains the same view, and Allison, in a remarkable passage, points out how the resurrection of mankind from the sleep of the Middle Ages was largely owing to the increased supply of money from South America, which greatly diminished the weight of debts and taxes, and gave hope and buoyancy to mankind. Exactly the same effect was produced by the gold discoveries of California and Australia, which gave Europe 25 years of extraordinary prosperity. I should like to add that no one has written more ably on the subject of the appreciation of our gold standard and the injury that it does to the debtor class, than Mr. Giffen, who has lately shown such unaccountable hostility to our movement. I have only time to glance at two other great evils which have arisen from the demonetisation of silver. The first of these is the disturbance of the finances of India. As all the House knows, the Indian Government collects its revenues in silver, but has to pay about £15,000,000 sterling annually in gold in London for fixed charges. It is obvious that just as silver falls more and more must be parted with to meet these charges. It is clearly set forth in the Report of the Royal Commission. They show that every fall of 1d. in exchange imposes an extra burden of say 10,000,000 rupees on India, increasing as the exchange falls. Now, as the exchange has fallen in India from 1s. 11d. to 1s. 5d. per rupee since 1872, the extra burden to India is nearly 60,000,000 rupees, say of upwards of £4,000,000 at present rate of exchange. There is dispute about some minor points, but all the Indian financial authorities declare that the Revenue has suffered by several millions sterling, and the greatest confusion has been caused to Indian finance. They have had innumerable deficits since 1873, and have had to suspend the Famine Insurance Fund for several years, and add to the cruel and oppressive Salt Tax, which is now about 15 times the prime cost of the article. There is, it seems a surplus on this year's Budget, partly caused by the rise of exchange. It is said that the people of India gain just as their Government loses. I allow that there is some truth in this. Its trade is stimulated by the same cause that injured ours for so long. Its cotton manufacture has, no doubt, been galvanised by the low exchange which has hurt Manchester so much. But, on the other hand, a great impediment is put in the way of borrowing in England for railways and other re-productive works; and, when this and the increased taxation is taken into account, it is very doubtful whether India on the whole is a gainer. It must also be remembered that a great part of the savings of India, for hundreds of years, is invested in silver. India holds at least £200,000,000 sterling in coined silver, and, perhaps, as much in the shape of ornaments; and this vast mass has fallen nearly 30 per cent., as compared with the gold money of Europe. Were silver universally demonetised it would fall very much more; and were India to adopt a gold standard, as some have proposed, it would be almost confiscated. I am sure that, in the long run, a bi-metallic system would conduce to the benefit of India; and all that I have said of India holds equally true of China and other silver-using countries. I can only glance at the last great evil which has sprung from the disuse of the bi-metallic system, namely, the injury inflicted on the cotton trade of Lancashire. This industry is the greatest but one in the country. It gives a maintenance, directly and indirectly, to two millions of people, and has suffered more than any industry in England during the past 15 years, except, perhaps, the wheat growing districts. It is not experiencing the revival of trade which has visited most other industries; its progress has almost ceased, while that of our great competitors is proceeding by leaps and bounds. Will the House allow me to give some figures from Mr. Thomas Ellison's Annual Circular, which is the best authority on all questions of cotton statistics? In the 18 years from 1871 to 1889 the consumption of cotton increased in Great Britain, 25 per cent.; Continent of Europe, 107 per cent.; United States, 141 per cent.; India, 901 per cent.; in other words, it increased in India from 87,000 bales to 871,000 bales. One result of that increase has been almost to transfer a vast trade in yarn with China and Japan from Lancashire to Bombay. I can put this before the House in a single sentence. In 1874 we exported to China and Japan nine times as much yarn as was sent from India; now India sends three times as much as we do, and will apparently extinguish our trade in the course of time. Now, I assert that one chief cause of this gigantic increase of trade, is the virtual bounty given to India by the constant fall of silver and exchange. Whatever other advantages India possesses, Lancashire can easily cope with; but this bounty handicaps her hopelessly in the race. I do not intend to go into this complicated subject, as I shall be followed by a gentleman who thoroughly comprehends it in all its bearings. I will simply say that the manufacturing population thoroughly understand it; they know it is a matter of life and death to them; and they will make their influence felt in this House, either now or at the next General Election, in a way that will surprise some politicians. I will now ask the House, to turn with me to the last division of the subject, namely, the practicability and desirability of re-establishing the bi-metallic system internationally. Let me remind the House that two Conferences have been held in Paris for this purpose; the first in 1878, and the second in 1881. These Conferences were called at the joint invitation of France and the United States, and the object was to try if an international agreement could be come to for the restoration of the bi-metallic system. Germany was not represented at the First Conference, but was represented at the second one, which, practically, embraced all the principal nations of the world. It is not too much to assert that the refusal of England to alter her system was the main reason of the failure of these Conferences. There is every reason to believe that if England had agreed, then the United States, France, and Germany would have concurred, and probably nearly all the States of Europe. The great evils arising from the demonetisation of silver were admitted by all, and by none more than the English Delegates, of whom the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was one, in 1878. He said—

"A campaign against silver would be extremely dangerous, even for countries with a gold standard. Though England had a gold standard she had great interest in the maintenance of silver as currency. One or two States might demonetise silver without serious results; but if all demonetised there would be no buyers, and silver would fall in alarming proportions. Thus all, or nearly all, States were interested in silver. If all States should resolve on the adoption of a gold standard the question arose, Would there be sufficient gold for the purpose without a tremendous crisis?"

The subject is far better understood now than it was then; it would be easier now to get a general agreement. Germany has very much altered her views, and it is believed to be now ready to join if England will be a party to International action. All turns upon the policy of this country; we can prolong the era of confusion, or we can close it. I ask, which is the nobler rôle to play? Now, let me deal as briefly as possible with the main objections against our scheme. In the first place, the weightiest objection is the supposed impossibility of fixing by law a permanent ratio between two articles which constantly vary in the rate and cost of production. No one has laboured as much as Mr. Giffen, and, I allow, with great ability. Mr. Giffen's great object has been to show that the French ratio did not secure fixity. I think I have proved that it did so practically in spite of the extraordinary strain to which it was subjected, first, by the small gold supply early in the century; secondly, by the inundation of gold after 1850; and thirdly, by the fact that France stood alone between England, a gold-using country, and Germany, a silver-using country, and thus was first drained of one metal and then of the other. If England, Germany, and the United States had been parties to the bi-metallic system of France, these slight variations would not have occurred. The judgment of the Currency Commission was practically unanimous on this point. Even the six members who were not in favour of this country becoming bi-metallic came to the following conclusion:—

Mr. Samuel Smith

(Sec. 107.) "We think that in any conditions fairly to be contemplated in the future, so far as we can forecast them from the experience of the past, a staple ratio might be maintained if the nations we have alluded to (the United Kingdom, Germany, the United States, and the Latin Union) were to accept and strictly adhere to bi-metallism at the suggested ratio. We think that if in all these countries gold and silver could be freely coined and thus become exchangeable against commodities at the fixed ratio, the market value of silver as measured by gold would conform to that ratio, and not vary to any material extent."

I am aware that two Members (Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Birch) put in a mild caveat against this view; but even if we exclude them, 10 out of 12 Members fully adopted this conclusion, supported by the great name of their Chairman, Lord Herschell. One right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), while admitting the efficiency of the French ratio, feels difficulty in believing in International bi-metallism, on the ground of the great fall of silver in the sixteenth century, namely, from 11 to 1, to 15 to 1 of gold. Let me reply that the principle of International bi-metallism could not then be tested, as the nations had not then their Mints open to the unlimited coinage of both metals at a common ratio, and this is the indispensable condition for success. Each nation then acted solely for itself. Coinage was made from time to time as each Government thought best and at what ratio it thought fit, and the coins were excessively clipt and worn, and often debased by unscrupulous Governments. For instance, at the time of the great English re-coinage of 1695 so clipt and worn were the coins that, on the average, they fell short 50 per cent. of their proper weight, and the Exchequer lost £2,400,000 on the operation. It is absurd to compare such a chaotic system with our perfect coinage regulations of nowadays. If a true and uniform bi-metallic system had existed in the 16th century, it would have tided over the influx of silver from South America, just as the French system tided over the influx of gold from California and Australia. Then it is objected by some that if an International agreement were made, gold, being the over-valued metal, would gradually leave the bi-metallic countries, and silver would alone remain. Have these persons ever succeeded in showing where the gold would go to? The area we propose would contain a currency of £500,000,000 of gold coin, and £200,000,000 of full-valued silver coin, not counting token coins, which, of course, do not come within the purview of the question. I am supposing that the Union embraces France, Germany, the United States, and Great Britain, even without our Colonies and India. Is it possible that this large sum of £500,000,000 could go anywhere else, or be all used up in the Arts? The thing is absurd. These are the great creditor nations of the world; at least, the European ones are; money constantly flows to them from all other places; they can always keep what they need for their currency requirements. Besides, the other nations of the world which are mostly silver-using could have no motive in getting one metal rather than another, as both would be of exactly the value fixed by International agreement. The annual product of the mines at present is thought to be about £24,000,000 a year of gold, and about the same of silver. It is supposed that nearly half the gold is used in the Arts, or hoarded in India; and half the silver is used in the Arts and in the silver-using nations of Asia. There only remain for all Europe and America, for purposes of coinage, about £12,000,000 of gold and about the same amount of silver, which is little enough to supply the wear and tear of these Continents and to meet the growing demands of so vast a population and so great a trade. It only represents an addition to the existing Stocks of 1 or 2 per cent. annually, and is quite insufficient to disturb the equilibrium between the metals. The fact is, that under a bi-metallic system the currencies of the principal nations would hardly be affected at all. Each country would keep the metal it preferred, and England would remain mainly gold-using, with this difference—that silver could be sent to the Bank when required, as is now the case with the Bank of France, and form a basis for note issues as well as gold. We are told that silver is inconvenient for large payments. This has been humorously called the “wheelbarrow” argument. The reply is that large payments would be made then as now by means of bank notes and cheques, just as is the case in France, the only difference being that the bank reserve will consist of two metals in place of one. If needful, it could be stipulated that silver coin should not be legal tender between man and man beyond £2, though of course no limit could be put upon its payment by banks. Another objection is that the legislation we propose will benefit the silver miners, especially in the United States; and a foolish prejudice is caused by this paltry argument. In fact, no benefit would accrue unless the present market ratio of 21 to 1 were raised. It is quite doubtful what an International Conference would do; it might agree to accept the present ratio or take 20 to 1, or 18 to 1, as the future ratio. Some intermediate ratio would probably be adopted. Suppose it is 20 to 1, how would that affect the American miners? America produces £9,000,000 of silver and £5,000,000 of gold. The surplus of silver is £4,000,000 annually. If that were raised 5 per cent. it represents a gain of £200,000 annually; if 10 per cent. it comes to £400,000 a year. The figures are so trifling that it is hardly worth talking of them when we contrast them with the National Debts and fixed charges which would be affected by the standard in which payment is made. The fact is, the whole silver product of America is worth no more than the annual yield of eggs! Great use is made by our opponents of the argument that England, being a creditor country, it is her interest to be paid in gold rather than in silver. That is the pith of the Amendment in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair). But the great bulk of the annual remittances to England represent not gold interest, but industrial investments and freights; both of these would come to us quite the same, whatever the standard money might be. English investments abroad are mainly in mines, plantations, tea, coffee, and sugar estates, and those innumerable forms of enterprise which open up the new or backward countries of the world. The income from them in no way depends upon the money employed as the standard. The amount coming home for freights is supposed to be £50,000,000 annually. The total annual surplus of imports over exports, which is roughly supposed to measure the indebtedness to England, exceeds £100,000,000 a year. I doubt whether the remittances for gold interest, after deducting silver interest, exceed £25,000,000 annually, and that goes to a very small class of the richest people in this country. Let me quote from the Currency Commission (page 35)—

"The only gain is in connection with loans made in gold at fixed rates of interest, and the total gains from this class of investments should be reduced by the loss on similar investments made in silver or other currency which has depreciated in comparison with gold. A large portion of this gain is made at the expense of British colonies and dependencies such as India, and does not accrue to the country at large, but to a very limited class."

This puts the whole case in a nutshell. The Member for Leeds seems to dread a torrent of silver coming into this country to re-pay debts contracted in gold. Let me assure him that the fear is purely imaginary. Payments to this country are all made in commodities, and will continue to be so made, whether the currency is gold, silver, or bi-metallic, just as they are made to France, which is also a creditor country, and annually receives a surplus of imports over exports. An Amendment is to be moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Sir J. Lubbock) implying that the trade of this country has prospered because we have had a gold standard. It has already been pointed out that the great prosperity of our trade came to an end about 1873-74, and did not experience a real and solid revival until last year, or the year before. Now, we virtually enjoyed the benefits of the bi-metallic system until 1873-74. We could always get a fixed exchange between silver and gold at Paris, and this gave us identical money in all the world of commerce and wonderfully facilitated our trade with Asia. Between 1874 and 1887 there was a period of extraordinary depression. It is true that we are now experiencing a revival which would have come long before but for the suicidal contraction of the world's money through the demonetisation of silver. Another objection brought against our scheme is that London is the financial centre of the world, partly owing to its gold standard and the certainty that a bill on London can always be turned into gold. London is the financial centre because it has the largest reservoir of capital, and money can be borrowed here more freely than anywhere else. Were London, Paris, New York, and Berlin to be under the same monetary system, of course London would suffer no disadvantage, neither would there be any demand for gold rather than silver, as each metal would be equally useful in settling International balances. Some bankers dread a financial crisis of this great monetary change be made. Mr. Giffen has drawn an appalling picture of all bank depositors suddenly clamouring for payment in gold. This fear is quite imaginary. No such crisis occurred when the United States began coining silver as full legal tender, nor when the Currency Laws of many other countries have been altered. The change we propose would only come slowly after long deliberation by a Conference of the leading nations, and one may venture to predict that the price of silver in the open market would reach the ratio agreed on long before the time fixed for making it a legal tender. It would no doubt be agreed that the Mints of all the contracting Powers should be opened simultaneously at a certain date to the unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at a fixed ratio, each metal to be full legal tender for all debts; and the knowledge of this would equalise the value of the metals long beforehand, and take away all motive for creditors to call in their debts. If they were foolish enough to withdraw their deposits they would soon have to replace them, as they could not make any use of them otherwise. It is said the compact will not be kept, and it will give way under stress of war, or national bankruptcy. There possibly might be a temporary suspension of specie payments by some nations of the group, just as France suspended for a short time during the war of 1870-71, but the treaty would stipulate that when specie payments were resumed it should be on the old basis. It should be remembered that the French ratio lasted 70 years in spite of numerous suspensions of specie payments. The United States suspended specie payments during their Civil War, and all their specie was exported to Europe, without disturbing the French ratio. Italy and Austria suspended without any injurious result. The same result would be witnessed again, with this difference: that the plan we propose would be far wider and more secure in its foundations. The whole tendency of the time is towards International action, and there is no kind of action more necessary and beneficial than monetary legislation. The most plausible objection brought against us, and the one which most easily excites vulgar prejudice, is, that we favour Protection. I must ask permission to say a word or two about this. I utterly disclaim, for myself, the slightest desire to bring about Protection; all I wish is a just monetary standard, which will be best attained by using the two metals jointly, in place of either of them singly. I defy anyone to point out what article is "protected," except, perhaps, wheat, in the slightest possible way; but wheat would not be affected unless we alter the present ratio of 21 to 1. Suppose the ratio is altered to 20 to 1, or 18 to 1, a slight check would be given to the import of wheat from India; but Indian wheat forms but a small part of our whole import. The great bulk of our wheat comes from America and Russia, and the check to Indian wheat would probably not add more than 1s. or 2s. to the general price of wheat; and that would not arise from imposing a Protective Duty but from taking off some of the bounty which is practically given to Indian exports by the low rate of exchange. If the question of Protection is to be introduced into this discussion, then it will be found to tell far more forcibly against our opponents. What do they seek but the protection of gold against silver? They wish, as far as lies in their power, to "boycott" silver, and throw the world upon gold alone, even though such a course should double the value of gold, and double the weight of the £4,000,000,000 of National Debts payable in gold, and the far larger volume of private debts in the gold-using countries. In trying to "boycott" silver, they are giving Protection to the wealthy capitalist class, just as clearly as the old Corn Laws did to the landowners of this country. The only difference is that the amounts involved are much larger, and the protected class much richer, and the confiscation of the fruits of the toilers far more sweeping than under the old system of Corn Laws. When the masses of this country awake, as those of America have awaked, to the magnitude of this question, they will brush away this idle talk that we are trying to restore Protection. They will discover that our protected classes are the wealthy money lenders and bondholders who, through the demonetisation of silver, have robbed the debtor class as much as if 20 per cent. had been added to the weight of the sovereign. Lastly, we are charged with a desire to raise prices artificially. I reply, we really want to prevent forcing them down artificially by contracting the money supply of the world. We want to use the two metals which Nature gives automatically, and let prices fluctuate naturally according as Nature gives us more or less money. We wish to minimise the operation of human law, and accept as far as possible the law of Nature. That is true Free Trade. To use both metals is true Free Trade, while laws preventing the use of one of them is Protection. We wish to use both metals, and in doing so we believe trade will be most stable and least affected by currency legislation. Besides, our plan will make it much easier for countries like Austria, Russia, and some of the States of South America to resume specie payments. At present they must resume, if they do it at all, in gold alone; but if bi-metallism were adopted, they could resume in both gold and silver; they could draw their supplies of specie from the whole money of the world instead of from only one-half of it. The plan we propose makes in favour of hard money, that is honest money all the world over. Our scheme is equally opposed to inflating the currency or contracting it. We believe in the convertibility of the bank note and in a uniform and honest standard of value all the world over; and we believe that the two metals tied together form a more stable standard than either separately. Gold discoveries and silver discoveries seem to be made alternately, and each metal fluctuates more violently by itself than the two when joined together. I have trespassed on the time of the House for too long; my only apology is the magnitude and difficulty of the subject. I have sought to put the main features of the case as clearly as I could before the House, and I hope it will be seen that the scheme we advocate is theoretically, as well as practically, the most perfect. It cannot be denied that the recent revival of trade tells against our cause. The Budget Statement shows clearly a state of general prosperity; but this prosperity will not last for ever. Fresh monetary dislocations may again upset the trade of the world. Had America repealed the Bland Act, and ceased coining silver, we should have had another cataclysm; fortunately, she is going in the other direction, and tending more and more towards the re-monetisation of silver. France still holds a very large stock of silver; we have no security how she will act with it until an International agreement is arrived at. Germany still holds a considerable quantity of its old silver, circulating like that of France, at its old ratio of $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1. The whole situation is provisional and uncertain, and no one can guess what developments may occur within the next few years. We may have entire re-monetisation of silver in America, coming along with a great yield of gold in South Africa, which may bring back the old ratio of the metals; or we may have fresh demonetisation of silver which may force it down much lower than has yet been seen. The present is a favourable time for International negotiations. The Temple of Janus is closed. Peace and goodwill reign among the nations of the world. Is not this a fitting time to call a Conference to settle this vexed and complicated question? We have had an International Labour Conference with good results. Can we not have an International Monetary Conference with even better results? I appeal to the House to give a vote in favour of Progress, Peace, and Free Trade, and to lead the way in a policy that makes for justice all the world over.

Mr. Samuel Smith

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House the evils which have resulted from the divergence in the relative value of silver and gold following the monetary changes which took place in Europe in 1873, can best be dealt with by a Conference of the chief Commercial Nations of the World called to consider whether a bi-metallic system can be re-established by International agreement in the interest of all the Nations concerned,"—(Mr. Samuel Smith,) —instead thereof.

Mr. Samuel Smith

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(5.10.) SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I desire to second the Motion. There are two propositions in the Resolution which will be generally accepted—first, that about 1873 there took place a great monetary change in Europe; and, secondly, that from that date an unprecedented divergence in the relative value of gold and silver occurred. There is a third proposition intimately connected with the other two, namely, that certain evils have resulted from that divergence between silver and gold. The monetary change to which I refer was the closing of the Mints of France and the Latin Union to the free coinage of silver at a fixed ratio. The divergence in the relative value of silver and gold which followed was continuous and extensive. In 1872 silver was at 60d.; in 1889 it had fallen to 42d. These are facts which cannot be denied. There is, however, a further question, which I admit may be a subject of controversy, although I should have thought that after the Report of the Royal Commission, supported as it is by the unanimous opinion of all the political economists of the day, it would have been finally set at rest. That question is whether any connection existed between the monetary change of which I have spoken and the great divergence that took place. Our argument is this: Before 1873, when Mints were open in Europe for the free coinage of silver at a fixed ratio, that circumstance tied gold to silver, and, as a matter of fact, the relative value between them remained constant. But in 1873, when those Mints were closed, new conditions arose. Silver then became a commodity, and was left entirely to the action of the laws of supply and demand. The finding of the Royal Commission on this point is absolute and unanimous. The Commissioners arrived at these two conclusions—first, that during the period before 1873, there must have been some steady influence, apart from the laws of supply and demand, that kept the relative value of gold and silver approximately stable; and, secondly, that after 1873 that steadying influence must have been removed. After looking over the whole field that was brought before them, they could discover no other steadying influence which could produce this effect except the Bi-metallic Law of France. It was due to bi-metallism that the ratio between gold and silver was maintained between 1803 and 1873. In their investigations of the variations in the value of silver in the 40 years preceding 1873, between the highest and the lowest point, they found the difference was only 3d. When they came to the 14 years after 1873, they found the difference between the highest and the lowest point was 15d. If they had continued their investigations to 1889, they would have found it reached 17d. Further, the Commission found that the maximum fluctuation in 1872 was not more than five-eighths of a penny, whereas in 1886 it was not less than 3d. Seeking for the causes of these facts, the Commission found that while in the 10 years, from 1831 to 1840, the production of silver was double that of gold, in the years from 1851 to 1855 it was only one-fourth of gold, and yet, notwithstanding these fluctuations of supply, the market price of silver remained about the same during the whole period. Next, taking the period after 1873, they found the supply of gold and silver had been about equal, and yet the fluctuations in the market price of silver varied from $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 to 18 to 1. With results such as these before them the Commissioners unanimously came to the conclusions I have mentioned. Those conclusions have been contested in the public Press, and by no less an authority than Mr. Giffen, to whom reference has already been made. Mr. Giffen has denied that bi-metallism had any effect whatever in maintaining the ratio before 1873, and that the rupture of the system did not cause the fall in the price of silver. Now, Mr. Giffen's position on this subject is rather peculiar. He gave very valuable evidence before the Commission, and presented statistics which are the foundation of our conclusions, and I do not desire in any degree to disparage that eminent and useful public servant. But it is to be regretted that he declined to give the Commission any assistance in the investigation of the practical part of this question, and absolutely refused to lay his views before the Commission. The excuse he gives, apparently, is that he was asked to come before the Commission as the champion of mono-metallism. All I can say is that the Commissioners, as a body, certainly never asked Mr. Giffen to appear in that capacity, though, of course, I cannot speak for the views of individual Members of the Commission. Mr. Giffen may, however, have had good reasons for not assisting us in our investigations. But, at any rate, I think it was a very questionable proceeding on his part when, immediately the Report was published, he violently attacked that Report, and certain of the Commissioners personally. And when Mr. Giffen went so far as to characterise the Report of the Commission as a scandal of the first magnitude, I can only say that his views on this subject would have had more weight if he had addressed himself to a consideration of the Report in a more judicial spirit. The main argument of Mr. Giffen is, that during the period of bi-metallism, there were variations in the ratio, and this he urges as if it were in itself destructive of our theory of bi-metallism. Mr. Giffen went back as far as the year 1581, and certainly gave figures showing variations between that year and 1803 of 23 to 27 per cent. But we decline to accept that period as one of effective bi-metallism. From 1803 to 1873, which bi-metallists are willing to accept as a scientific period of bi-metallism, though it was only in operation over a limited area, the variations only ranged from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent. But it is an entire mistake to suppose that variations are inconsistent with bi-metallism. It does not follow that the market ratio is always the same as the legal ratio. The legal ratio is not an absolute, but a controlling force, keeping the variations in the market ratio within certain definite limits. It acts like the governor of a steam engine, and the effect of bi-metallism is clearly manifested during the years between 1803 and 1873 by the fact that the variations of ratio were very slight compared to what they had been formerly and to what they have been since. Mr. Giffen's opinion carries weight, I know; I would therefore like to strengthen our case by quotations from undoubted authorities on such subjects—Professor Walker, Professor Jevons, and Mr. Bagehot.

[Here follow quotations.] Thus I think I have shown that the Bi-metallie Law is a real power which can bind the legal ratio and the market ratio together within certain variations; and that is the basis of our application to the House of Commons to-night to entertain and consider the question. I will now proceed to say a few words on what, perhaps, the House will consider of more importance, and that is the evils which we believe have arisen from this divergence in the relative value of gold and silver which has undoubtedly taken place since 1873. I notice that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London says there is no justification for any fundamental change in the standard of value. Well, I am rather at a loss to understand fully what he means by "no justification." Does he mean that no effect whatever has been produced by this divergence between silver and gold since 1873? Does he mean to say there has been no injury, no loss, no effect whatever upon trade? I cannot think he for a moment would make such an assertion, because it is utterly opposed to the Report which he himself signed. It is there distinctly acknowledged by the Commissioners, in that portion of the Report to which the name of the right hon. Gentleman is attached, that there had been a serious amount of loss and embarrassment and injury to trade. If he means that there has not been sufficient justification for this change, then I should like him, when he addresses the House, to tell us what amount of injury, damage, and loss he thinks is necessary in order to justify the change which we propose. It can be proved both from personal knowledge, and also from statistics, that, during the last 18 years, the country has been going through a period of depression which has been more intense and more peculiar than any that has preceded it for many years before, and it has not been accounted for in any way except by monetary causes. A Commission was appointed to examine carefully into the cause of the depression of trade in 1882. It took an immense amount of evidence, yet it could not put its finger upon any real reason why there should have been such a depression. But the moment that the Currency Commission met, as will be found from their Report, paragraph after paragraph show they acknowledged that monetary causes had produced injury and loss and depression. I know there is a prevalent opinion that trade is in a satisfactory state at the present moment, but I think a great deal more has been made of the late improvement than is justified by the facts. I still hope that the improvement may not pass away, but I noticed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, last night, seemed to be more sanguine than I am as to the improvement. He used the expression, "trade was reviving." From my knowledge, I should rather say that trade had revived, and that it is again declining. Whether that decline will go on or not I do not wish to anticipate, but we have had this very peculiar experience during the last 18 years, which we never had before in commercial centres, that while we have had slight periods of improvement, they have only continued for a month or two, and then they have passed away. We have had what the Chancellor of the Exchequer, last night, very happily called "false dawns." During the last 18 years, when there has been an improvement in trade it has lasted only for a few months at a time, or 12 months at the outside. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has noticed the Returns of the exports for last month. They are very startling, because they show a falling off of £100,000,000. I do not wish to make too much of this. I do not think it represents a real decline of trade. To a large extent it may be accounted for by other causes, but, at the same time, from my own knowledge of the state of trade both in the iron industry and in the cotton industry, I have no hesitation in saying, that if the present state of things continue the Board of Trade Returns during the next month and the month after will be materially affected. There is no doubt that not only have prices fallen, but the visible demand from abroad, and from the home markets, in both the cotton and the iron industry is perceptibly less than it was. Take a longer period. Last year was a good year, the best year we have had for some time. The imports and exports then reached £740,000,000. But go back to 1883;

Sir W. Houldsworth

we then had exports and imports as large. That is to say, we have made no progress whatever since 1883, and in the intervening period of years the total amount of exports and imports was materially less. I should just like to refer the House to some statements that have appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, some sensational paragraphs which I think I ought to notice. A statement has been made that the cotton industry of Oldham is making large profits. Some of these profits are given. One remarkable case is mentioned — one amongst others — of a firm which has, so it is said, made 39 per cent. profit. To say the least, that is a most misleading statement, because, as far as it is accurate, it only means that profits have been made at the rate of 39 per cent. for the last quarter. It is a mistake to assume that this was the profit of the past twelve months. They have made nothing of the sort.

An hon. MEMBER: The statement says so—per annum.

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH: Then it is untrue. But the only way in which 39 per cent., even for the quarter, could be brought out is by calculating the amount of profit on the share capital only. Now, it is well known that in many cases, especially in Oldham, the borrowed capital is two or three, or even four times more than the share capital. The consequence is that if the profits that have actually been made were divided over the whole of the capital employed in the business, the percentage would be reduced very materially. And a curious fact is this, that although that statement is put forward to induce people to believe that the cotton industry is doing well, yet out of the 19 mills which were referred to in the Pall Mall Gazette, in 12 of those mills the shares are actually at a discount, and out of 92 mills in the Oldham Official List, in 54 the shares are similarly at a discount. It is perfectly clear, therefore, these figures do not give a true representation of the state of affairs. But these figures would have to be considered from another point of view if accepted as real profits made in this industry. I have a case here of a spinning business, which shows a profit for the last quarter of £3,385, but the way in which that profit has been made was, at any rate, as far as £2,500 was concerned, by speculating in cotton—not by legitimate working. Now, I should like to bring before the House some figures, I think, of rather an astonishing character. I do not adduce them for one moment for the purpose of showing what the effect of the divergence between silver and gold has been; but I think they are sufficiently startling to induce the House to consider the state in which our industries are, as compared with those of foreign countries. The statement I have is a comparison between 1870 and 1884, and I find that, taking the imports and exports of 11 of the large Continental nations, they have increased by no less than between 50 and 60 per cent. in those years, whereas those of this country, in the same period, have only increased by 11 per cent. Now what the divergence in the relative value of silver and gold really did, especially when there was a heavy fall in the value of silver, was to dislocate the whole machinery of trade. From the merchants down to the workpeople they are all, more or less, affected the moment you have anything like a serious divergence in the relative value of the two currencies, gold and silver. It is very simple to see how it affects our own country. Silver, the House will remember, has fallen 30 per cent. Whenever a fall takes place in the gold price of silver one of two things must occur. Either the gold price of commodities must fall, or the silver price must rise, or an adjustment must be brought about by both these operations combined. You must have an adjustment of some sort or another. The gold price of silver fell 30 per cent., but did silver prices rise? We find they did not. The consequence is, the whole weight fell upon gold, and an adjustment had to be brought about, and, as a matter of fact, was brought about, by the fall in gold prices. Silver prices remained as they were. Now, what is the effect of a fall in gold prices of anything like 30 per cent? Three classes are specially affected. The merchants, the agricultural industry, and the manufacturing industry. The merchant, to a great extent, is not in the same position as the capitalist or the wage-earner, who is engaged in industrial operations. The merchant is more independent. What he really suffers from is not so much the fall in silver as the fluctuations in the rate of exchange. His business is quite different from what it was a few years ago. It was not then so dependent on the slight variations which take place in prices from day to day. But now transactions are carried out by telegraph from Calcutta to Manchester direct, and generally the transaction from the buying of the cotton to the selling of the article produced is completed in one day. The consequence is that the profit which the merchant receives is very small indeed, being nothing more than a small commission for his trouble in carrying out the transaction; and unless, day by day, there is constant business he suffers considerable loss; and he finds exchange varies frequently, that business, instead of being steady from day to day or from week to week, according to the variations of demand, is subjected to a series of fits and starts. Whenever a new fall takes place business is stopped until the exigency of the manufacturer forces him to take the lower gold price, and so, from time to time, there are checks upon trade which are fatal to the successful carrying on of the merchant's business. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has fully recognised this, because in the Conference alluded to, and which he attended, I noticed he put in the forefront, in regard to the difficulties which had arisen at that time through the fall silver, the case of the merchant. Since then the evil has been intensified. I put the case of the agriculturist and the manufacturer together, for, in most respects, they may be considered in conjunction for the present purpose. The effect of the fall in the gold price of silver has been to drive down gold prices in this country, and those engaged in industry, whether agricultural or manufacturing, have had to accept a lower gold price. It has not been the case of one fall of 30 per cent., but it has been a gradual going down of prices during the last eight, 10, or 15 years, and lower, step by step, has fallen the gold price which the manufacturer receives for his goods. The House should understand that this gold price comes down instantly if a fall has taken place in the gold price of silver. Those who deal in wholesale markets are aware that they are very sensitive to any action or any rumour which has a tendency to affect prices, and the consequence is that the moment there is anything in the atmosphere which ought to lower gold price immediately the gold price goes down in the wholesale market. But what position is the manufacturer in? If the manufacturer has to reduce the gold price which he receives in exchange for his goods by 5 or 10 per cent. he suffers immediately loss unless he can at once reduce the cost of his production by a similar amount. The items which make up the cost of production are—first, his rent, including interest to bankers and to mortgagees; secondly, articles consumed in the business; and, thirdly, wages. With regard to rent and interest on mortgages the manufacturer cannot get the rate reduced immediately, as he is often under a contract for years. With regard to articles of consumption, he is often under contract for 12 months, or has to deal with a middleman, who does not freely give him the benefit of the lower gold prices. As to wages, they are not adjusted day by day, and cannot be adjusted at all except with a considerable amount of friction. I have here some figures as to the effect of this fall in gold prices upon a particular business. In 1874 I find that the selling value fell from 100 to 88, and the cost of production, exclusive of raw material, only fell from 100 to 99; in 1875 the selling value fell to 81, and the cost of production to 94. Then, in 1876, the selling value fell to 65, whilst the cost of production fell only to 86. During that period, therefore, the manufacturer was reduced to cost price, or possibly something below it, and so was gradually adding to his indebtedness to his bankers and others, and getting a millstone around his neck which he could not throw off. This explains the depression which has been prevalent in the textile and mining and iron industries during the last 18 years, while there has been this steady fall in the gold price, attributable to the fact that there has been a fall in the gold price of silver. It will be said, I have no doubt, by some Members that this is, after all, only a question of a little loss to the capitalist which he can very well bear. But it is a much larger question, because, although the brunt falls upon him first, the effect goes downwards to the wage-earner, who, year after year, has been called upon to suffer some loss of wages. Then no doubt it will be said—I think it was said before the Royal Commission—"Yes, but although the wage-earner has less wages, still he cannot be any the worse off, because the price of commodities will also be lower." I think it will be found, however, that the wage-earner does not get the benefit in the fall in the price of commodities; certainly not for a very long time, and that is the reason why the working classes join their employers so heartily in this movement, believing it is at the root of the depression and of the loss which they have sustained during the last 18 years. I should like to strengthen my observations by a quotation from the Report of the Royal Commission signed by those Members of the Commission who do not recommend bi-metallism. They say—

Sir W. Houldsworth

"So far as the fall in prices can be connected with the currency, it must tend to diminish the margin of profit, or even to cause it to disappear altogether. This necessarily results in an effort on the part of the manufacturer to economise the cost of production by reducing the wages of the operatives. Even if the manufacturers could succeed in reducing wages sufficiently to maintain their former position, this could only be done after considerable struggles, and an amount of friction very undesirable."

Again—

"It seems by no means clear that there has been a fall in the price of all that the wage-earner needs, and upon which his wages are expended, equivalent to the reduction of wages which has, in fact, taken place."

I think that there can be no doubt that, although the brunt of the loss may fall upon the manufacturer and the farmer, the wage-earner is ultimately the greatest sufferer. That is the reason why the wage-earning classes have joined the employers in this movement. They believe that they have discovered in our present system of currency, the cause of the depression from which they have suffered. This is especially the view taken by the people of Lancashire. Although trade has improved, upon the whole, the improvement in Lancashire has been very slight and very shortlived. Another point I ought to mention is the stimulus that has been given to cotton spinning in India. This question was examined by a Committee of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, and their Report shows that a great part of the cotton spinning industry of Lancashire has been transferred to India, where, as an effect of the fall in exchange, spinning mills have been stimulated to an unnatural extent, and while the exports of yarn from India, to China and Japan, have increased between 1876 and 1887 from 70,000,000 lbs. to 113,000,000 lbs., the exports from Lancashire to these countries have remained stationary, and, during some periods, have actually decreased. I find, in point of fact, that in 1887 the exports to China and Japan were considerably less than in 1881, and while the trade of these English mills has been taken away from Lancashire, Lancashire has found nothing to put in its place. For the total exports of cotton yarn from England has decreased in 1887 as compared with 1881 by 4,000,000 lbs. I ought perhaps to notice, however, that, within the last few months, a reaction has taken place in India, as, according to the Bombay Gazette, the cotton industry is now in a somewhat critical state in that country, owing to the fact that too many people have been tempted to engage in it. This is the natural consequence of an artificial stimulus. What we want, in order to correct the evils I have attempted to describe, is not inflation or protection, but stability. But how we are to get stability in our standard of value, as long as we have no connecting link between gold and silver, it is impossible for me to conceive. One half of the British Empire uses silver, while the other half carries on its dealings in gold. And, consequently, it will not be too much to say that it will be absolutely necessary, in the course of a few years, to establish some connecting tie between the two currencies employed in the British Empire, to say nothing about other silver-using countries. In one sense, I may say, we bi-metallists are mono-metallists, because we believe that if there could be one metal which would serve as a currency for the whole world, that would be the best system we could adopt. As it is, however, one-half of the world uses, and will use, silver, and the other half uses gold. The question to be solved is, whether we can so connect the two currencies as to tie silver and gold together, so that, although you may have different currencies and different coins, you will have but one standard of value. I have to thank the House very much for the patience with which it has listened to what, I am afraid, has been an exceedingly dry statement, full of matters of detail, but the question is certainly a very serious one. It is said that the price of silver is being raised in America, but what we have really to look at is, whether the price of silver will be maintained in a stable condition? As far as I am personally concerned, I do not care very much what ratio may be accepted as long as a stable ratio is established. If a Conference is called to establish a ratio, I have no doubt it will be able to do so; but that ratio will probably not be widely different from that which exists between the two metals at the time the ratio is fixed. The main point is, that whatever is done should be done with as little change as possible, and, having said this, I trust that the House will very seriously consider this important question as one which vitally affects the interests of trade.

*(6.45.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Sir, I join with my hon. Friend behind me and the hon. Member who has spoken from the other side of the House in attributing the highest importance to this question. I think the House is indebted to them for the moderation with which they have stated their case, and the evident desire which they manifested to reach a sound and satisfactory conclusion. But their speeches have only shown the great difficulties which surround the question. My hon. Friend has stated that the fall in prices is attributable wholly to the fall in the price of silver. It is, no doubt, attributable to that, concurrently with other causes. But I have not been able to find any evidence, either in the arguments addressed to this House or in the Report of the Commission, or elsewhere, which is absolutely conclusive to show that the fall of silver is, in point of fact, intimately connected with the fall in the value of commodities in different parts of the world. We must ask those who desire this enormous change in the currency of this country, upon which our great commercial transactions rest, in what way they connect the one result with the other? I have been at some pains to examine our Trade Reports during the last few years. There has been a fall which is most distressing to many of those interests which have been engaged in the production of particular commodities. But the fall has not been uniform or constant. There have been variations in prices; there are now variations of a very remarkable character. I will refer to some prices of our imports and exports between the years 1885 and 1889. Many articles have fallen considerably; others, like coffee and fish, have risen. Animals—oxen and sheep—have fallen 16 and 19 per cent. But these very articles, which in 1889 had fallen, will be shown in 1890 to have risen. I believe wheat is now dearer than it has been for some years. But coffee, fish, hemp, jute, have risen from 13 to 31 per cent. Copper ore is dearer than it was in 1885. Iron ore has risen 12 per cent, and manufactured articles are considerably dearer than they were. These variations in prices are shown to exist notwithstanding the continued fall in silver. Some articles have thus risen, while others have fallen in value. But I think my hon. Friends will be prepared to admit that if a universal law had applied to the value of a great number of articles which are abstracted from the ground or grown on the ground, or manufactured, uniformly with the fall or rise of silver, we should have had a different return from that which is shown in the public documents to which I have referred. My hon. Friend has said that what he desires is stability. We all recognise the force of that. But he proposes to link silver with gold, in order that this stability shall be maintained. That is to say, that the metal which has fluctuated in price shall be joined with gold, which has not fluctuated. ["No, no."] I have not heard any proof that there has been a fluctuation in the value of gold. I think I have not unfairly stated the view which my hon. Friend takes. He has argued with great ability that the owner of silver ought to be able to take a bar of silver to the Mint and insist that it shall be turned into coin at a fixed rate. It has been profitable for the owners of silver mines to produce an enormously increased amount of silver during the last 20 years. The production has quadrupled and reached 24 millions a year. It has been possible for them to sell this silver at 42d. an ounce. If it is profitable to sell at that price it would be possible, if a fixed ratio were established, by tendering at a higher value than 42d., to make a larger profit and increase the quantity tendered to the Mint and request that it should be returned in coin. The result would be to produce that excess of silver coinage which it was the object of the Latin Union in 1873 to put an end to. Why should the members of the Latin Union decline to continue the system which prevailed up to 1873? I can only assume—I do not positively know—that the increase of the stores of silver alarmed the members of the Latin Union. The German Government declined to continue the coinage of silver. My hon. Friend behind me has referred to the Indian mills and the bounty which the fall in silver confers upon them. I quite agree that the Indian producer is at some advantage as compared with this country. Admitting that the English merchant is at some disadvantage as compared with the factory owner in Bombay, we cannot generalise from that on the whole trade with India. The statistics show that in 1873 990,000,000 yards of cotton goods were exported from the United Kingdom to British India. That figure increased in 1877 to 1,305,000,000 yards; in 1882 to 1,522,000,000 yards; and in 1887 to 1,812,000,000 yards. In other words, in spite of the enormous development of the cotton trade in India, our exports to India of cotton goods increased 50 per cent. between 1877 and 1887.

Sir W. Houldsworth

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH: May I explain that the Indian mills do not manufacture piece goods to any great extent? The question is as to the yarns they produce.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: My hon. Friend is in possession of technical knowledge which I do not possess, and I am quite sure he is accurate in his statement; but I may at least rely on this: that notwithstanding all the disadvantages which I admit the exchange imposes on the English merchant, there has been during the last 15 years a very considerable increase in the cotton trade with India, although during that period the rate of exchange has fallen from 1s. 11d. to 1s. 5d. Therefore the trade must have been, on the whole, profitable, and no doubt it has been conducted with the wisdom and skill which Lancashire merchants always display in their business. The value of the exports of the United Kingdom to India—and that means largely the export of Lancashire goods—shows an increase of 14 per cent. during the quinquennial period ending 1882, and another increase of 14 per cent. during the quinquennial period ending 1887. I admit that there has been an enormous increase in the number of spindles and looms in India and a great increase in the export of yarn. In 1876 the spindles numbered 1,100,000, and in 1887 they numbered 2,200,000. Seeing that we share in the prosperity of India, I ask whether that is a circumstance to be deplored—whether we have any right to regret that India is developing manufactures and supplying so largely that part of the world with its manufactures? Would it be right, by adopting any change in our financial policy, to check an industry which appears to be so successful? My hon. Friend said that the ratio to be determined by any particular international agreement was a matter of no consequence. I think it is a matter of very considerable consequence. The very first question that would be asked of us if we proposed a Conference would be, "What ratio do you propose to fix between the values of silver and gold? We are very large holders of silver, and we shall be largely influenced by the view which you take. Silver at the present moment is 45d. or 46d. an ounce. Before we enter this Conference we want to know whether you are prepared to re-monetise silver at the price which it cost us some 10 or 15 years ago." If a man had debts owing to him he would, I think, hesitate to receive payment for them in silver forced 20 or 30 per cent. above its present value. I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who opened the debate, and I observed that he was of opinion that, somehow or other, those to whom debts are due are exacting by fraud something like £30,000,000 a year from their debtors. I have not been able to see how he arrived at that conclusion. I do see that he would propose to pay them in a currency and metal which would probably be worth less by £30,000,000 a year than the metal and currency in which they are at present entitled to be paid.

*MR. S. SMITH: My argument was that £200,000,000 are annually paid by this country for fixed charges, contracted mostly when gold and silver were at a ratio of 15½ to 1. The demonetisation of silver lowered the value of silver 30 per cent. and increased that of gold 40 per cent.; and as the increased purchasing power of gold is due to this circumstance, creditors are now receiving 20 per cent. more than they are entitled to on the basis on which the debts were contracted.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should like the hon. Gentleman to go into a court of morals and endeavour to prove his case. I should be glad to listen to the argument that would be urged on both sides, and to the decision that would be given. He says that these debts were contracted on a bi-metallic basis. They were contracted upon the basis of the currency which was established in 1816. Everyman who has borrowed in gold is bound to pay in gold, and even in America there are gold debts and silver debts. This is not the first time that the House of Commons has debated the subject of bi-metallism. My attention has been drawn to a Motion made by Mr. Attwood just 60 years ago. He moved—

"That it is expedient to repeal so much of the Act 56 George III., c. 68, as declares gold coins the only legal tender in payment of all sums beyond the amount of 40s., and to establish that gold and silver coins of the realm, coined in the relative proportion of 15½ lb. weight of sterling silver to 1 lb. of sterling gold, shall be a legal tender in all money engagements, as directed and ordered by the Proclamation of the fourth year of George I."

When the hon. Gentleman opposite is prepared to put a distinct proposition before the House as to the value at which silver is to be re-monetised we may understand what it will involve. It was pointed out by Mr. Herries, in the debate on Mr. Attwood's Motion, that—

"Every man who had claims payable upon demand, every man who held notes of small or great value, every man who had debts outstanding would, if he secured the amount of what was due to him before this Resolution passed into law, get the whole of his money; whereas if he delayed beyond that period he could only get £95 for every £100."

To pass such a Resolution, Mr. Herries said, would be the greatest of disasters to a mercantile country. It would result in this: that all those who were entitled to demand money advanced by them would instantly require that it should be paid, and in the coin and currency in which the debt had been contracted. Mr. Herries pointed out, with overwhelming force, that the inevitable result of such a sudden change in the basis of our circulation and mercantile transactions would be to produce a panic, with absolutely disastrous consequences. A change is proposed to be made because it would be advantageous to the debtor. But if that be so, the creditor has a right to say, "I will not wait for this change. I insist upon having while I can all that belongs to me." I appeal to hon. Gentlemen, considering the vast credit transactions which go on in this country, considering the transactions which we have with the whole world, to form some idea of the disasters which would result from such a desire on the part of the creditors to claim what was due to them before such a change was made. Sir Robert Peel, on that occasion, said the notion of a double standard was utterly fallacious and would be found utterly impracticable. I entertain the same view. I believe that the proposal is impracticable, and that any attempt to carry it out would produce a terrible state of disaster. I need not apologise for quoting the words of Lord Althorp, when he said—

Mr. S. Smith

"He was perfectly satisfied that it would be utterly impossible to alter the value of our money without producing an effect upon the commerce of the country that, with reference not only to our exchanges with foreign countries but to our domestic affairs, must be in the highest degree mischievous and destructive. It was of the utmost importance that the measure of value should remain fixed, and he, for one, therefore, would not consent to any further alteration in our monetary system."

There has been throughout the discussion a suggestion of the scarcity of money, and the necessity of monetising silver in order to afford sufficient currency for the transactions of the world. I speak with great humility, because I am not a great financial authority; but it does appear to me that silver and gold have little to do beyond constituting a measure of value—a measure of value something like that famous standard yard locked up in the Board of Trade. Within the last few years there has been a development of our banking system all over the world to such an extent that gold for the purpose of actual commerce and trade has become simply the measure of value, and I am not able in the slightest degree to detect any evidence of a deficiency of gold. One of the first means of detecting it would be in the discounts. A scarcity of gold raises the rate of discount. But during the last 15 years the rate of discount has been extremely low in this country. There has been no absence of credit, and there has been no deficiency in that material without which enterprise cannot proceed. I have looked into the average rates of discount from 1874 to 1888, and I find that in only one year, 1882, when it was $4\frac{1}{2}\%$, did the average exceed $3\frac{3}{4}\%$. It ranged from 3 and $3\frac{1}{4}\%$ to 2, $2\frac{1}{2}\%$, $2\frac{3}{4}\%$, and $2\frac{3}{8}\%$. That is a conclusive proof that there was plenty of what I should call mercantile money for the purposes of the business of the world. There has been a great fall of prices in wheat, and many other articles; but I venture to maintain the opinion that that fall is due rather to the abundance of money than to its deficiency, to the enterprise which has prevailed throughout the world in a time of general peace, and the facility with which men can enter into vast commercial transactions. We are told that railways and steamboats existed before 1874. They did exist; but the development of the world by railways and steamboats has been something absolutely enormous during the last 15 years. There is no comparison between 1890 and 1874 in the facilities afforded to the trader, the merchant, the producer, in all parts of the world. Railways bring produce from distant parts of India, for instance, to the coast, steamers bring it from the coast to our wharves and quays at a price which hardly exceeds the cost of transit from New York 20 years ago. These changes account largely for the great fall in prices which has taken place. But that fall is not universal. It is confined largely to articles of universal production, which can be brought to our markets from all parts of the world. But articles limited in production, such as articles of art, have increased, and will continue to increase, in value. If that be the case, the argument based upon the fall of silver is not a sound argument. I agree with the paragraph in the Report which says that the change proposed would be a leap in the dark. I feel that it would be a tremendous leap in the dark, and that we have no evidence that the change proposed would be a sound one, or that it would not produce disastrous consequences. On these grounds, not that I am indifferent to the views expressed by the Lancashire operatives, or that I do not sympathise with those who are in distress, I must for myself individually decline to assume the responsibility of recommending to the House a change which I regard as dangerous, and as not justified by any of the facts or elements involved in the case.

(7.26.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I was glad to hear the sentiments of strong common-sense that fell from the First Lord of the Treasury. But I confess I was a little surprised that the head of the English Treasury, on a subject which affects so greatly English commerce and credit, says that he speaks for himself only and individually. I entirely agree in the views the right hon. Gentleman has expressed; but I have also to convey to the House opinions much more valuable than any I could offer. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) has also very clear and definite opinions on the subject, and, occupying the position which he holds, it is right that those opinions should be known. This question goes to the root of the existence of a great commercial country. I confess I have never been able myself to grasp the transcendental formula of "tying two metals by a ratio." That is really a sort of philosophising phrase to express that you want to pay a debt in a metal of less value than that in which the debt was supposed to be contracted. These scientific formulæ of tying metals together by a ratio only conceal what is a very simple fact. It is said that we lived some 15 years ago in the halcyon days of bi-metallism; but if we did, we did not live in that condition by any will or judgment of our own. The judgment of the whole of English statesmen at that time, and down to the present time, was, that there should be a mono-metallic standard. It is supposed that the bi-metallism of France controlled the commercial relations of the world. How could it be that a country which had only a limited foreign trade should be able to operate so immensely on the commercial relations of the world? If this is so admirable a system, why has the Latin Union abandoned it? I have never heard an answer to that question. Why is it that the world, instead of imitating the admirable example of the bi-metallism of France, has rushed to copy the disastrous and ruinous mono-metallism of England?

You may, or you may not, obtain an agreement with other countries; but after you have got an agreement, what security have you that that agreement will be maintained? Supposing that you can get an agreement with the other Powers of Europe in order to make this enormous change, where would you be if one of the Powers in some great crisis, such as a European war, abandoned this agreement? It would knock the keystone out of the whole of the monetary and commercial system of England. At present you have your own financial basis, your own commercial system, which have been unparalleled in the history of the world, founded as they are on the principles on which we now rely. But you are asked to abandon that system and to adopt a system which the advocates of bi-metallism admit can only exist by an almost universal agreement with other Powers. That is to say, you are to go into a partnership with all the other Powers of Europe with respect to your trade, finance, and commercial prosperity. I say that this is a most dangerous thing for you to attempt. Suppose we had been in the position of having an international agreement in 1870. France and Germany were going to war. Supposing Germany had conceived that it would have been of advantage to her in that life struggle to attract a great deal of gold to Germany; and supposing she had been a party to this international agreement, and had thought it would be to her advantage to terminate her connection with the Bi-metallic Union, would she not have done it at once? Of course she would, and the finances of England would have been thrown into a condition of confusion by resting on an agreement of this character. Why is this general agreement wanted? If you choose to overvalue your silver, and to say it shall bear a ratio of 1 to 15 instead of a ratio of 1 to 22, the gold will, of course, go away from the country. But the bi-metallist answer is that if you get a universal agreement the gold has nowhere to go to. Yes; but in the event, say, of Germany receding from the agreement, there would be a place for the gold to go to, and there it would go at once. The result, therefore, is that you place yourselves in a position which depends on a universal agreement, and if one or two of the parties to it withdraw, the whole of your reserve of gold at once goes to them. I protest against making the commercial interests and the financial system of England dependent on an international agreement. It never has been so, and we cannot safely make it so now. The condemnation of the bi-metallic theory is that international agreement is, from the bi-metallists' point of view, absolutely indispensable and necessary to their system. The financial system of England has stood upon its own basis and has not been dependent on international agreement, on the permanence and stability of which no reliance can be placed. You will never get stability in international arrangements. In old days you had the balance of power, which depended on international agreement. How long was it before the Treaties were broken, and then what became of the balance of power? Very much the same fate would overtake you with regard to the balance of metals. I do not understand why, if silver is to be declared by Act of Parliament or International Statute to be of the same value as gold for all the purposes which have been indicated, we should have any gold at all. It seems to me that, if the two metals are to be declared to be of equal value, gold may as well disappear. I remember, during the brief period I was at the Exchequer, that I had the opportunity of talking with Sir Stafford Northcote, and I never shall forget the quiet, humorous contempt with which he treated the subject. He said—"If it be true that you can settle the value of anything by international Statute, why should we have either silver or gold at all? Why not have an international agreement, to the effect that all transactions should be done with leather, as in ancient times?" Why have we had this theory propounded for the revival of prosperity? Men of business want to pay their debts in an appreciated currency; and one of the reasons why I oppose this system is because I am not prepared to raise prices either by Act of Parliament or by international agreement. Unfortunately, I belong to the consuming class: I am not an enemy of low prices: I experience the benefit of them, and I value the low prices of commodities. We are told there is no question that the great disaster which has befallen the world is owing to low prices. But this is not the first time that we have heard this. It is not since bi-metallism was abandoned by the Latin Union that the waves of low prices have appeared. I was reading the other day an instructive book by my friend Mr. Spencer Walpole, in which the author gives an account of the prices in 1820, and the commercial disasters which took place at that time. Exactly the same remedies were proposed then. The first thing which the people who suffer from low prices say is, "Let us tamper with the currency;" and no doubt periods of considerable distress will always induce people to seek strange revenue. That is the reason, no doubt, why these remedies have become more or less popular now. Take the case of India. I am not at all surprised that in Lancashire and elsewhere there should be a certain jealousy at the increase of native Indian production, and I do not complain that those who suffer should complain. But I do complain of the language used on this subject by the Government of India. The Government of India, in the despatches which I have seen, have treated this question as if it was one solely of exchange upon the salaries of Anglo-Indians. ["No."] I have seen appeals to the Protectionist prejudices which are supposed to exist among the English producers; but there is a class of people which the Indian Government might have some consideration for, and that is the native population of India, who are the producers of these commodities. During the short time I was at the Exchequer I wrote a despatch in answer to one from the Indian Government on this question of bi-metallism. The First Lord of the Treasury has hit the nail on the head when he asks, "What is your ratio going to be?" If this theory is true, it may be anything you like. If the philosophical theory is correct, you may declare to-morrow that the value of silver is equal to that of gold. If, when the market value is 1 to 20, you can say it shall be 1 to 15, why should you not say it is 1 to 10, or 1 to 5, or 1 to 1? As the First Lord of the Treasury has said, the great inducement to countries to hold large stocks of silver is the hope that the ratio will be restored to 1 to 15. Now, it is said, "Let us put it at 1 to 20," or at whatever the market price may be. That is exactly what is done on board ship. A man takes an observation of the height of the sun to ascertain when it is 12 o'clock. He reports to the captain that it is 12 o'clock, and the captain says, "Well, make it so." If you had the power of Joshua you might be true bi-metallists. If you are going to take the existing ratio, then your proceedings are totally unnecessary; but if you are going to take something different from the market ratio, then you are going to disturb the whole commercial relations of the world. You cannot get out of that difficulty, which lies really at the bottom of the whole thing. I do not think it is at all a question which depends upon scientific disquisitions. I observe that upon the Royal Commission the men who have practical dealings with money were the men who pronounced against the bi-metallic theory. As far as I know, the principal authorities of the City of London conversant with dealings in money have condemned this experiment. When you are comparing our situation with that of other countries, you must remember that, in proportion to the greatness of our wealth and population, our wealth and prosperity depend in a far greater degree on foreign trade than do those of any other country in the world. The internal trade of America, Germany, and France is of much more importance than the foreign trade of those countries; but it is not so in the case of England. I believe the mono-metallic system which we have adopted is a sound system. It is the system under which we have prospered, and in which we have been followed by the other nations of Europe in very recent times. With Pitt, in that famous sentence of his, we may say of our financial system that "we have saved ourselves by our firmness, and Europe by our example." The nations of Europe have been disposed to follow the principles which have led to the great prosperity which has placed England upon a commercial pinnacle. I confess I should see any departure from that system with the greatest alarm. Occupying the position we do in the commerce of the world, I do not see how we are to go round to the nations of the world and enter into a sort of Dutch auction with them, in which we are to fix the ratio. Are we to go to one country and ask them what they want, and to another country and ask them what they want? Is it possible you are going to place the commerce of England in such a position as that? I will not say that that would be a most undignified position; but I think it would be a most dangerous one for a great commercial nation like England to occupy. I share with the right hon. Gentleman opposite the sympathy he expressed for the distress which has existed in Lancashire; but, as the right hon. Gentleman said, exports have increased to India, which shows that the relation between the gold of England and the silver of India has not prevented the increase of exports to the latter country. I find that in Lancashire there were in 1870 33,000,000 spindles at work, while in 1885 there were 40,000,000, and that the numbers of power looms in the same years were respectively 440,000 and 506,000. No doubt you might have hoped for, and we should have been glad to see, greater progress than that; but during the whole of that period the advance has been continuous, both as regards power looms and spindles. The same advance appears in the number of persons employed. In 1870 the total number of persons employed was 450,000, as against 504,000 in 1885. That does not look to me like a drooping or a ruined industry. Let us hope, then, as in former times of distress, so it will be now, that the period of distress may pass away, and that we may see, as we have seen before, times of reviving prosperity. Do not let us, after a few years of distress, overthrow that sound financial system which I believe has been the keystone of the prosperity of this great Empire.

Sir W. Harcourt

*(8.30.) MR. T. H. SIDEBOTTOM (Stalybridge): I do not often trouble the House with any observations; but, after deep study, I am convinced that this currency question is of such transcendent importance to every one of us, and so vitally affects every man and woman in this country, that I hope the House will allow me to make a few remarks. I was first induced particularly to consider this subject by the depression which began to make itself seriously and acutely felt in the general trade of the country, especially in the great cotton industry, in the year 1878. I was at that time Member for the large manufacturing constituency I have now the honour to represent; and being also myself an extensive cotton spinner and manufacturer I felt impelled, alike by duty to my constituents and by self-interest, to endeavour without prejudice, and with an entirely open mind, to investigate, and, if possible, find out what really lay at the root of the mischief. And I came then to the deliberate conclusion that our troubles were mainly to be ascribed to the suspension of the coinage of silver in France and the Latin Union, and the consequent fall, fluctuations, and uncertain value of that metal as measured by gold, and to the great appreciation of gold thereby caused. The subject at that time was but little appreciated or understood, and if a man ever mentioned bi-metallism he did so only with bated breath and whispered humbleness. But I entertained such a strong and decided opinion upon it that I ventured to bring the subject under the attention of this House in May, 1879, when, after alluding to the decreasing supply of gold, I stated that it seemed to my mind certain that the great depression throughout the world in nearly every interest and every trade was, to a great extent, due to the contraction of the currency caused by the demonetisation of silver, and the degradation of that metal to a mere commodity, such as iron, or tin, or lead; and, consequently, that the true remedy for our misfortunes—the true, plain, and direct way to revive our waning trade, to arrest the ruinous fall in property, and to bring back general prosperity—was to restore silver to its former position as a partner with gold in the currency of the world. This was more than 10 years ago, and my view has been strongly confirmed by everything which has since occurred. It would ill become me to occupy the time of the House by entering into a long dissertation on the details of this silver, or, rather, gold and silver question; every Member has had a copy of the final Report of the Royal Commission. The arguments on both sides are stated in this Report with perfect fairness, and considered, criticised, and dissected with consummate ability; and I venture to say that a more able and exhaustive treatise on the subject was never written. I have read it every word, and earnestly commend its perusal and study to every man who wishes to thoroughly grasp and comprehend the subject. He cannot then fail to form a clear conception of the evils brought upon us by the fundamental changes which have of late years taken place in our currency conditions, and will, I am sure, agree that the thanks of the country are owing to every member of that Commission. But whilst abstaining from entering into details, I hope the House will permit me briefly to consider a few of the aspects of this great question. From 1803 to 1873 the Mint of France was ready to convert into coin all silver brought to it, such coin being legal tender at a fixed ratio with gold of $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1; and in the States forming the Latin Union a similar law was in force from 1865 to 1873, the fixed ratio being also the same, that is, $15\frac{1}{2}$ ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold; therefore, no person possessing silver would, of course, part with it for less. This ratio virtually controlled the market, and, as a matter of fact, for the first 70 years of this century the extreme variation in the market value scarcely exceeded 3 per cent. in either direction; but in consequence of the large amount of silver coined in 1873, owing to the monetary changes in Germany, a Convention was entered into in January, 1874, between France and the States of the Latin Union, limiting the coinage; and the consequence was that silver went down in value from about 60d. per ounce to a little over 42d. or over 28 per cent.; and though it has now somewhat recovered, in consequence of the anticipated legislation in America, no one may say how much lower it is still destined to fall. I beg the House specially to note this fact. From the beginning of the century till 1873 the gold price of silver practically never varied, although the variations in the relative production of gold and silver were far greater during that period than they have been since or are ever likely to be again; but the marked divergence in value of the two metals only occurred when the free coinage of silver by the Mints of Europe ceased, but then began immediately. It must also be remembered in this connection that the precious metals do not perish as other commodities perish. Their aggregate accumulation in use at present is estimated at £1,900,000,000 of silver and £1,500,000,000 of gold; consequently a variation in their annual production constitutes merely a fractional difference of the whole. Concurrently also with France and the Latin Union closing their Mints to silver, there has been a tremendous falling off in the gold production of the world, just when a much larger quantity was required, and the result has naturally been a very great appreciation of gold. Previous to the discovery of the gold mines of California and Australia, the annual production of gold in the world was about £6,000,000; but these discoveries increased the supply six-fold, to £35,000,000 or £36,000,000, and the consequence was great and general prosperity, not to say inflation. It has now fallen, however, to under £20,000,000, whilst at the same time Germany has recently introduced a gold currency of £80,000,000, the United States have resumed specie payments requiring £100,000,000, Italy £20,000,000 for a like purpose, and £4,000,000 have gone annually to India; and the Mints of Europe having been also at this most inopportune moment closed to silver nearly half the money supply of the world has been cut off, and we have seen the natural effect in the decreased value of commodities and the heavy fall in property. But, with the permission of the House, I will endeavour to show a little more in detail the disastrous consequences which have resulted from this state of things, from this dislocation of silver and gold, and then indicate what seems to me the obvious remedy and the only course calculated to rescue our commerce from the ruin with which it is threatened. As has been well stated by the hon. Member for Flintshire, the total fixed charges payable out of the industry of the country are estimated at from £150,000,000 to £200,000,000 a year. Now as this is a permanent and fixed load, and gold is the scale by which the wealth of the country is measured, it is evident that if gold becomes dearer, if it appreciates, as it has done since the free coinage of silver was suspended in 1873, this tremendous load becomes greater and presses more heavily on the productive resources of the country. The appreciation of gold and the great fall in prices have, in fact, transferred about 10 per cent. of the wealth of the country to the money-lending and annuitant class, made a small class of rich people still richer, but robbed the hard working, toiling, industrious class for the benefit of those who toil not neither do they spin. It seems to me that both my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury and also the hon. Gentleman opposite are labouring under some confusion of ideas; because our belief and contention is that, under a system of bi-metallism, it would make no difference whatever whether debts were paid in gold or silver, for the two metals would have a relative fixed value to each other, and be mutually interchangeable at that value. No doubt contracts ought to be held sacred; but the right hon. Gentleman and others will not, I hope, forget that many contracts have been made under practically the same circumstances and conditions as those we wish to restore; and surely some sympathy ought to be spared for the unfortunate debtors who, during all these long years, have, as a matter of fact, been paying about one-third more than they expected or virtually contracted to pay. I entreat the House to consider, for a moment, the intolerable hardship which, quite unwittingly and without the least design or intention, has been inflicted on debtors and upon everyone who has charges of any description to pay. The debts and charges have been incurred under totally different conditions to those now existing, and when an entirely different state of things prevailed. The stupendous changes which have taken place in our monetary arrangements have been quite unforeseen and unexpected, and, of course, without the knowledge or assent of the unfortunate debtors; and yet there is but too much reason to fear that, in consequence of these changes, there is no prospect but absolute irretrievable ruin for many of these unfortunate persons. It is all very well to moralise and say people must take the consequences of their acts; that the laws of political economy must not be interfered with; the property and wealth and land of the country must change hands, and all the rest of it; but I think the House will be of opinion that if, without injury to anyone, something can be done to remedy or mitigate the injustice, and to bring back and restore the same conditions as approximately prevailed at the time the unfortunate debtors contracted their obligations, any legislation to accomplish this, however imperfectly, will be only equalled in its beneficence by its wisdom and justice. But I should like, with the permission of the House, to consider how and in what way our industries in this country are particularly affected, and also briefly to glance at the hardships and injury inflicted upon India. The two largest industries in this country are agriculture and the cotton trade. Much of the cotton trade is with India, or other silver using countries. In one portion of our own Empire, England, gold is the standard; in another portion, India, silver; and the difficulty of carrying on any satisfactory trade between the two under such conditions is very great indeed. There can be no doubt (as is stated in the Report) that an unstable and fluctuating exchange between gold and silver has tended to foster trade between countries having the same standard to the prejudice of those having a different standard; and English manufacturers have, in fact, had practically to pay the whole loss in the exchange by taking less price for their goods. It may be said—and this was, indeed, the argument of my right hon. Friend the leader of the House—how can this be so, with the large and increasing export of cotton goods to India? But the large exports are no proof to the contrary, for the production of Lancashire goods is so enormous, owing chiefly to the abuse of the Limited Liability Law, that they must go somewhere or our people starve, and they have long been sent to such markets as would consume them irrespective of cost, and in many cases at a continuous loss. The Indian trade has increased in spite of the difficulties in exchange owing to other causes; it has received a great impetus from the development of railways, the removal of the Import Duties, and similar matters; and at this moment it would doubtless have been far greater still if the exchange had remained steady, for it will be observed the same expansion of exports has not taken place with China, which is also a silver-using country, but where there has not been the same internal development. A few years ago, the Import Duties which were levied in India on cotton goods were felt to be an injury to Lancashire. Both employers and employed united against them, and they were happily abolished. They amounted to 5 per cent.; but the present state of the silver question, and the great fall in exchange, practically imposes a differential duty of nearly 30 per cent. upon Lancashire goods, as compared with goods manufactured in India. For example, if I, as an English manufacturer, send a piece of cloth to India for which to cover cost, I must receive back 10s.; and the Indian buyer pays, and has been in the habit of paying, 10s. for it, or in his money five rupees. When the exchange was at par, and the rupee worth 2s., I received my 10s.; but prices in India being about the same, and every single rupee there retaining the same purchasing power as before, the Indian buyer cannot afford to pay more than five rupees as at first, when the Exchange has fallen to 1s. 4d., which means 6s. 8d. for me instead of 10s. It would be indeed surprising if anyone possessing the hard head with which Lancashire men are generally credited could entertain the remotest doubt that if 3s. 4d. more was received for every piece of cloth sold at 10s. everyone in Lancashire would be proportionately benefited, for operatives, employers, agents, and merchants would have so much the more to divide amongst them. It may be argued that there really would not be this difference, because if the loss on the exchange was less the Indian buyer would then pay fewer rupees for the goods. Well, it is conceivable that the Indian buyer might secure a portion of the benefit; but even then, if he succeeded in obtaining his goods at a lower price, English manufacturers would be still benefited, because there would be an extended demand for our production as the rupee price was lowered, whilst it would be a distinct advantage to the consumer in India. But it may be said, why not invest the rupees paid for our goods in Indian produce and so recover with one hand what we lose with the other. Well, this may possibly be done by a few wealthy merchants who are prepared for such transactions; but it is not merchants who bear the loss, because, naturally, before purchasing and sending goods to India, or any other silver using country, a merchant ascertains and calculates how much he can realise home, and will only purchase the goods accordingly, and the greater the loss on the exchange the less he will pay; so that the real losers are English spinners and manufacturers, who are compelled to work their mills at any cost for the sake of keeping their people together, keeping down their very large fixed expenses, and finding employment for the manufacturing population of the country. It appears, therefore, that the loss in exchange amounts to a differential duty of about 30 per cent. in favour of the Indian manufacturer. He has already other advantages, owing to his geographical position, the low rate of wages paid, and the being allowed to work almost unlimited hours, whilst we in England are restricted to 56 hours; but these advantages, great as they are, are by no means equal to the other, and cannot explain the enormous increase which has taken place in Indian mills, because this increase has only occurred since the fall in the exchange became so pronounced, and when, as a matter of fact, the geographical advantage was lessened owing to the fall in freights. But that the English manufacturer has a real, tangible, and decided advantage is proved by the hard fact that the exports of cotton yarn from India to China, Hong Kong, and Japan during the last six or seven years have increased between 300,000,000lbs. and 400,000,000lbs., whilst the exports from England have decreased more than 30,000,000lbs. The natural consequence is that cotton mills are being erected on a colossal scale in India to the displacement of English mills and English labour; whilst one of the few industries in this country which seems to be in a really prosperous and healthy condition is that of machine making for filling Indian mills. I will not occupy the time of the House with enlarging upon the effects of these currency changes on British agriculture. No doubt the present disastrous state of that greatest of all our industries is owing to a combination and a variety of causes—virgin soils, railways, fast ocean steamers, and low freights, have brought heavily taxed land in this country into direct competition with the vast prairies of the Western World—but over and above and in addition to all these causes British agriculture has suffered most severely from this currency mischief. It is admitted by every one, except my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. James Maclean) (at all events, the 12 Royal Commissioners are unanimous in saying so), that the purchasing power of the rupee in India is as great as ever; therefore, with the Indian exchange, about 1s. 4d., every British sovereign is worth really 15 rupees instead of 10; and the purchasing power of each single rupee being in India as great as ever, each one of them will purchase as much wheat in India as ever, consequently the buyer gets 15 rupees' worth of Indian wheat for a sovereign, instead of 10, or about half as much again as formerly. Comment on the above facts is needless; he who runs may read the principal cause which lies at the root of the depression in British agriculture, and may also with confidence predict what will be its fate in the not distant future unless something is done. Then, again, let us examine for a moment what is the effect upon India, and the taxpayers there, of the present state of affairs. As bearing on this point the opinion of the six Commissioners, who hesitate to adopt bi-metallism, is important. They say, in the Report, that—

Sir W. Harcourt

Mr. T. H. Sidebottom

"The exceptional position of India causes it to be affected in an especial manner. Whilst its taxes are collected in silver a substantial portion of its outgoings, including the very heavy payments which have to be made in this country, are necessarily disbursed in gold. And they have no hesitation in expressing the conclusion that the changes in the relative value of the precious metals are causing important evils and inconvenience to the Government of India."

In other words, the Government of India owe in gold and collect the taxes in silver. Consequently, for every 16d. sent to England in payment of her debt, India, with the exchange at 16d., has to collect nearly 2s. Well, indeed, may we hear such disastrous accounts of the grinding taxation in India, and of the difficulty experienced by Indian statesmen in making receipts meet expenditures. A monstrous hardship and injustice is also inflicted upon retired officers, gentlemen of the Civil Service, and others, who having spent the best years of their lives in the service of their country in India, and returned home at last to end their days in their native land, find themselves mulcted of about one-third of their incomes from no fault, but simply from this currency disturbance. I would remind the House also that there is no security whatever that we have reached the bottom of the abyss, or that a further fall in silver may not any day be experienced, and a further discrepancy be established between the standard in India and the standard in England. Well, what is the remedy? I have already quoted part of the opinion of the six Commissioners who hesitate to adopt bi-metallism. These same gentlemen go on to say that—

Mr. T. H. Sidebottom

"No measure has been suggested that claims to be anything like so complete and thorough a remedy as the adoption of bi-metallism; and that in any conditions fairly to be contemplated in the future, so far as they can forecast them from the experience of the past, a stable ratio might be maintained if bi-metallism were accepted and strictly adhered to."

I think the House will consider this pretty strong language as expressing the opinion of the six Commissioners who are supposed to be against bi-metallism, and it is extremely valuable as an answer to those who are making capital out of their supposed opposition. These six most able gentlemen, after hearing the evidence, after long consideration and study, and under deep responsibility, state their deliberate opinion that no remedy is so direct or effectual as bi-metallism, and think it would keep the value of silver uniform as compared with gold. Why, then, do they not take the plunge, and unite with their six remaining colleagues in recommending its prompt and early adoption! I can discover no reason except anxiety to avoid doing mischief, and groundless and chimerical apprehensions. Pausing, as it were, on the brink of a dark and unknown stream, they seem to ask themselves whither its broken and tempestuous waters lead, and shrink with halting tread from trusting themselves to its swift and foaming waves. I think, however, they have, in fact, admitted the whole case, and proved that the real, direct, true, and only remedy is that suggested by the other six Commissioners, namely, the assembling of an International Conference, with the view of establishing bi-metallism, that is, some fixed ratio between silver and gold. I do not wish to dogmatise, or to say what that ratio should be; it is essentially a matter for discussions, and for the consideration of any International Conference which may be appointed. There are many and strong arguments in favour of fixing it at the present value, of about 20 or 22 to 1, and others for the old ratio of $15\frac{1}{2}$ to 1. But what I earnestly wish to press upon the attention of the House is that something should be done; that we should make some effort to remedy the present evils. Bi-metallism is nothing new; it existed in France for the whole of this century. Up to 1873 its effects were felt in all countries; and it is most significant that there should have been such unexampled depression in every industry simultaneously with the system coming to an end. We must expect strong, and powerful, and persistent opposition, particularly from the great financial houses, who own the gold, and want to retain it at its present value. But, after all, Magna est veritas, et prævalebunt. And I cannot believe that the people of this country will allow our industries to continue so heavily handicapped; but, in the long run, the interests of the many will prevail. England will join such a Conference as that we suggested, to thoroughly discuss and ventilate this great subject; and the collective wisdom of nations will devise a remedy, and fix a ratio of exchange between silver and gold which shall ensure stability, prevent violent fluctuations, and do something to restore prosperity to the long-suffering industries of the world.

(9.17.) MR HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): Mr. Speaker, I may perhaps be permitted to draw attention to the Amendment before the House—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the evils which have resulted from the divergence in the relative value of silver and gold following the monetary changes which took place in Europe in 1873, can best be dealt with by a Conference of the chief commercial nations of the world, called to consider whether a bi-metallic system can be re-established by international agreement in the interests of all the nations concerned."

That does not go so far as the Report of the Royal Commission, signed by my right hon. Friend the Member for the London University, that a bi-metallic system can be established. I believe that this is what the Commissioners agreed to, that in any conditions fairly to be contemplated, so far as we can forecast them from experience of the past, a suitable ratio might be maintained.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I am sure my hon. Friend does not wish to misrepresent me. I have already pointed out, in the course of the debate, that Mr. Birch and I dissented from that opinion.

MR. HOYLE: In that case the Blue Book has been misprinted. I find Sir John Lubbock's name appended to the Report, and also that of Mr. J. W. Birch, ex-Governor of the Bank of England. It is quite true that these two gentlemen did add a foot note:—

"No doubt the adhesion of England, Germany, and the United States would be of very important additional strength, and we do not deny that such combination might for a considerable time be able to maintain the ratio adopted. Having regard, however, to the great uncertainty as to the probable future production of the mines, and to the use of the precious metals in the arts of a number of countries which would still remain outside the combination, we doubt whether any given ratio can be found maintainable."

It seems to me that foot note shows an uncertain condition of mind which is hardly worthy of my right hon. Friend.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: May I just explain? It is usual, if you agree with the bulk of a Report, to sign it stating the points on which you differ. There was no hesitation on my part, or on that of my friend Mr. Birch.

*MR. HOYLE: I acquit my right hon. Friend of all blame, and accept his explanation. Before we can understand the evils to which the Motion refers, we must consider the condition of things that prevailed before the "divergence" took place. It is, of course, well-known to the House that, previous to 1873, this country enjoyed great prosperity. Industry and commerce flourished, and the National Revenue went up by "leaps and bounds." The summit of that prosperity was reached in 1874, concurrently with great alterations on the Continent of Europe in the currency. The decline of prosperity affected all trades; and agriculture has suffered severely during the last 16 years. I hope hon. Members acquainted with agriculture will tell us whether farms have been unlet and unlettable, whether fields have remained untilled, and whether land has tumbled down to grass and weeds; whether farmers, gathering up their little possessions and taking what remained of their property, have gone, with their trained skill, to other lands; and whether labourers, biding for a time, have finally gone to the large towns and seaports to swell the ranks of casual and unskilled labour? But perhaps I may speak of the staple industry of the county from which I come — Lancashire. Before 1873, merchants, in exporting Manchester goods, either sent them out in the grey state, or had them bleached, dyed, or printed, according to circumstances. In most cases a bill was drawn against the shipment which put the shipper into funds, but it was only when the goods were sold abroad, and the proceeds remitted home to close the transaction, that the merchant and those who joined him in the venture were able to count up their gains. When silver fell and the rate of exchange dropped the merchants could not carry on that mode of doing business because of the losses entailed. Either manufacturers must consign the goods themselves, or their correspondents in foreign countries must send orders at a fixed and certain price. Native indents, as they are called, that is, orders to buy goods laid down in India or China, in stated months, became the rule. A merchant receiving such an order first ascertained at what rate a banker would undertake to fix exchange six or nine months ahead. He then reckoned freight, brokerage, commissions, and other charges, and, after deducting all these from the silver price offered, the balance left was all that could be bid to the manufacturer as the price for the goods. The method of doing business was completely revolutionised. The rate of exchange became the dominating factor. An East India merchant, whose principal business is that of exporting cotton from India to various European countries, in giving evidence to the Commission, fully detailed the features of the old and new systems of conducting that business, and gave illustrations of the rise and fall in prices owing to oscillations in the rate of exchange. The following questions were put to him from the Chair:—

"What I want to know is whether the rapid alteration in the value of cotton in India due to the exchange is or is not pernicious to the trade?—It rose rapidly before August in consequence of one alteration in the exchange; it fell rapidly after August in consequence of another alteration in the exchange.

Mr. Hoyle

"Is not that a great inconvenience to the grower in India?"—Well, of course to the grower fluctuations are to that extent unpleasant. For the exporter it practically makes no difference. We have only to wait a little till prices adjust themselves.

"You simply work the machine by which the cotton is transferred from the grower in India to the buyer in England?"—Certainly. . . .

"You have just explained that the machine is practically so perfect that you receive no violent shock from even the most violent oscillations in exchange. What I want to know is whether these violent oscillations do not do harm to the grower, to the man who is not part of the mere machinery of transfer, but the man who produced the goods?"—Well, of course if the price of silver rises rapidly the grower does not like it. If we have a fall in silver and are able to offer him 10 or 15 per cent. more for his produce he likes it very much."

"It is in your power, directly you see that operations are not going to yield a profit, to stop operations?"—Certainly. . . ."

Now, what struck me as very remarkable in that evidence was that the witness was apparently quite unconscious of the startling character of his evidence. The swing of the exchange pendulum, owing to rises and falls in silver, made a difference in the selling price of commodities of 15 per cent. first on one side, and then 15 per cent. on the other. The skinning of eels is unpleasant to the eels, but to the man who holds the knife it makes no difference—he need not cut his own finger; it is his own fault if he does. The House will see that this witness proves beyond a doubt that commodities rise or fall in value as the rate of exchange goes up or down. If there were any doubt, however, it would be dispelled by the testimony of another witness—a shipper of manufactured goods from this country to India. He said, in answer to a question put to him—

"Any one acquainted with the Manchester Market can testify that business there is always checked when a fall in silver takes place, and that Manchester prices have generally ultimately to give way.

"But the one person that cannot save himself is the manufacturer?"—He is the worst on the whole.

"The merchant can save himself, but the manufacturer cannot?"—Yes."

As exchange fell there was always a diminished amount left for the English manufacturer? The "machine" was perfect. "The merchant," it was expressly said in evidence, "need take no risk unless he liked." The loss was bound to fall on the producers. The "machine" stops until, to use the euphemism employed by one of the witnesses, "prices had adjusted themselves," which means that until commodities had fallen in price equal to the fall in silver. But while this evil was in development, others were in progress. The depression in the agricultural districts at home lessened the demand for cotton goods, and falling prices automatically raised the barriers to trade in Protectionist countries, in this way—a fixed duty of 2s. 6d. on an article that formerly cost 10s. was 25 per cent., but when the article fell to 7s. 6d., the duty became 33 per cent.; and if it fell to 5s., the duty was then 50 per cent. Diminished demand from the United Kingdom and an aggravation of Protection shut Lancashire out of the markets, previously supplied; and so arose the cry for "new markets." The home trade could not absorb its usual quantity of goods; Protectionist countries were closed by the automatic rise in the proportion of duty; but India and China were open at a price, they could take unlimited quantities of cotton fabrics, so that the production was more and more poured into Eastern markets. That increased supply compelled English producers to accept silver prices. In addition to those adverse circumstances it began to be perceived that cotton spinning and manufacturing could be carried on in the East without loss by exchange. The greater the fall in the exchangeable value of the rupee, the greater the inducement to cut out English made goods, and thus an expansion of spinning and weaving occurred in India, such as has never been paralleled in any industry requiring technical skill. The profits made in Indian cotton mills are so large that they work on Sundays as well as week days. Some of them run 84 hours a week, and the average is a little over 80 hours a week, as against 56½ hours in this country. Rich English capitalists and rich Indian capitalists are adding to their wealth by these means. Let me say that I believe it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find a man in Lancashire who would lift a finger against the prosperity of India or retard the welfare of her people. If India has geographical or any other advantages she is entitled to make the most of them, and it is clearly our duty to assist her in making the most of them. The welfare of India and the bettering of the condition of her people are British interests. In reference to the cotton industry in India, the Royal Commissioners say—

"Estimates have been laid before us which tend to show that the Indian manufacturer, if unassisted by exchange considerations, would be unable to compete with the English manufacturer successfully in any market. The technical character of the questions involved in these calculations makes it very difficult to pronounce an opinion on the subject, but we understand that a Committee of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce has been carefully considering the question, and that their conclusions, which, on such a point, will have a special value, will shortly be made public."

The following is a copy of the Resolution of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce requesting the Board to undertake the inquiry referred to by the Royal Commissioners—

"That in view of the recent very rapid increase of cotton spinning in India and the exports of yarn therefrom, more especially to China and Japan, while at the same time there has been a very serious check to the growth of Lancashire yarn exports to those countries, the directors be requested to examine and report to a special meeting of the Chamber as to the causes and circumstances which have thus enabled Bombay spinners to supersede those of Lancashire."

That inquiry extended over 10 months, and the most competent men in the different branches of the trade were invited to give evidence. In such an investigation, conducted by laymen, great scope was, as is usual, given to witnesses. There was a good deal of theory, of opinion, and of argument which were entitled to great respect, even when they failed to carry conviction; but when the witnesses detailed their daily experiences, and gave facts within their own knowledge, their testimony was absolutely unimpeachable. A witness who has, perhaps, sold more cotton yarn than any man living, said—

"The great factor which has comparatively taken away an important section of our trade is the fall in exchange. It is utterly impossible, with the silver price of exchange, for the Lancashire man, when his money is reduced 25 per cent., in exchanging from silver to gold, to rival the Bombay man, his competitor, whose money is not reduced in value."

And the witness went on to say—

"The demand never stopped in the spring of 1887, although we were unable to take orders during the months of March and April, and until the third week in May, when we accepted a reduction in price equivalent to the fall in exchange."

The "machine" does its work so effectually that prices must go down in Manchester. The mills may stop, of course, and that is the alternative. So large are the quantities of goods sold to silver-using countries that prices all round are lowered. There cannot be two prices for the same article—one for gold-using countries and another for silver-using countries. If any one demand, either home or foreign, yields better Returns than another, there is an immediate increase of supply, with a corresponding decrease of supply to those markets giving less favourable results, and thus a level of prices all round is quickly reached. The Board of the Manchester Chamber concluded its inquiry, but, not being agreed, two Reports were prepared. A copy of the evidence taken and copies of the two Reports were sent to each member of the Chamber, and a special meeting was called to consider the Reports. After full discussion, the Chamber adopted the Report, which said that—

"The principal cause which has enabled Bombay spinners to supersede those of Lancashire in exporting yarn to China and Japan is the great fall in Eastern exchange since 1873."

Therefore, the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, being largely expert, after an exhaustive inquiry extending over 10 months, decided that conflicting currency laws in the same Empire were giving a bonus for the transfer of a great industry of that Empire from one part of its dominion to another. Another evil arising out of the divergence between gold and silver is the lowering of the quality of English goods. It is rare to find now any make of cotton goods that has retained the character it had 20 years ago. Mr. Stephen Williamson, M.P., told the Royal Commission that merchants did not wish to ship inferior goods, but he said the people in silver-using countries had small silver coins in common use, and when the exchangeable value of these coins fell there must, of necessity, be a lower article supplied. On this point an East India merchant, who was a witness at the inquiry in Manchester, was most explicit. He said—

Mr. Hoyle

"We find it difficult, and, indeed, often impossible, to raise prices. The general experience is that when exchange falls the Indian buyer reduces his sterling price to us here, and we have naturally to offer a lower price to our producer. If exchange falls, say, from 1s. 5d. to 1s. 4d., which is a fall of 6 per cent., the native buyer reduces his price to us accordingly, and it is needless to say that we cannot execute such an order. Possibly several telegrams pass between us, entailing expense, and the transaction may possibly be ultimately arranged by a pick or two picks being taken out of the cloth, or a narrower width being taken, or a yard or more being taken off the length; and at the same time the maker may have to cut into his profit, and the agent into his commission, all in order that an article may be supplied to come in at the current rupee price. Some shippers, less scrupulous than others, may stamp the goods the original length, though possibly a yard has been taken off them, and in this way false stamping has been encouraged."

"You don't think it is the fall in Exchange that brings this about?—I have said that it is the fall in Exchange that creates the difficulty, and this is how the difficulty is frequently overcome."

Another way of cheapening cost is loading the yarn with size containing china, clay, and chemicals. Formerly it was considered that about 20 per cent. of size was sufficient to give strength to the yarn in weaving. One day, on my way to business, I was joined by a manufacturer, who complained bitterly of the unremunerative state of trade. I said to him—

"You size heavily. I believe?—Oh, no, he said. We only put 100 per cent. on, and some of our neighbours put 200 per cent. on."

So that 100 lbs. of cotton yarn is loaded with 200 lbs of filling, which must fall off in the washtub, leaving the web as thin as paper and as easily torn. Heavy sizing compels the saturation of weaving factories with steam to soften the yarn and make it weave. The operatives complained that their health was being destroyed, and last year they had a Bill drafted in the hope that Parliament would remedy the evil. Eventually, a Conference was held in the Grand Committee Room to consider the draft Bill—a Conference consisting of seven Members of Parliament and equal numbers of representatives of the operatives and of the employers. In the discussion that took place the difficulties of the position on both sides were pointed out. One of the speakers on the part of the employers said the trade now was such that "a manufacturer could not live if he made honest cloth." The changed condition in which the trade is carried on will be seen if I read what a Manchester merchant said before the Manchester Chamber. He was asked—

"If a Manchester merchant sells yarn in China for 500 dollars, and a Bombay merchant also sells yarn for 500 dollars, quantity and quality being equal in both cases, what loss does the Manchester merchant sustain in getting his money home?"

And the reply was "None."

"Do you mean that the Manchester merchant will get the same money home as does the Bombay merchant?"—Assuming, without entering into calculations, that those 500 dollars return to the Lancashire merchant £75, whereas they formerly returned him £100, and that those £75 will purchase him as many commodities as £100 did formerly, he would lose nothing."

The question was put in another form and the witness answered in these words:—

"Take the case of my own trade. I am a merchant carrying on business in Bombay and Manchester, and I am to-day doing the very business which you instance, because I am shipping yarns and cloth from Bombay to China and Japan, and also from Manchester to the same markets. In the latter case I get 25 per cent. less gold for the same quantity of yarn than I formerly did, say £75 instead of £100; but that lessened quantity of gold will buy me as many commodities as the £100 would in former days. At the same time, in Bombay I get back my money in rupees, say 1,000, the same number that I got in former days; but these rupees will only buy me the same commodities that they did in former days. Therefore the purchasing power of the two remittances is equal, for I get as much of all that I consume and require, as a merchant, for my appreciated gold—that is, for the smaller number of sovereigns at home—as I do in Bombay for the unaltered number of rupees. I consequently sustain no loss as a merchant on my remittance from China."

That evidence is lucidity itself—it is a volume in few words—the merchant, the middleman suffers no loss—it is passed on to the English producer. The Bombay manufacturer carries on his trade in circumstances analogous to those which prevailed in this country before 1873, but the English manufacturer is worse off by the loss of 25 per cent in exchange. Why does not the English manufacturer pass the loss on? Well, part of it was passed on. Coals and mill stores were cheaper. Cotton, too, was lower and wages were reduced. The last thing an employer likes to do is to reduce wages. Ill-feeling always follows the attempt. Some years ago Bolton, Blackburn, and other places in East Lancashire suffered from an embittered struggle on a reduction of wages. An excited mob broke into the house of Colonel Raynsford Jackson, who was the President of the Manufacturers' Association, and burned his house to the ground. In that struggle the operatives on strike, or locked out, lost in wages nearly £790,000 before the strike ended, and then they went in at the reduction. At no period during the last 15 years have reductions in cost of manufacture been equal to the fall in values of cotton goods, and now the lessened costs of manufacture have, in great part, passed away. Coals have risen, wages have risen, cotton is higher, because it can be and is consumed in other countries where exchange troubles do not exist. Another evil from the divergence between gold money and silver money is that the inception of business is transferred to foreign markets, and necessitates long contracts. A witness at the Royal Commission was asked—

"Question 2283.—Is it the case that this fluctuation in exchange leads to bargains being made on contract for future delivery rather than to immediate transactions?—Yes, it has changed the whole nature of business."

Question 2284.—And these contracts are fulfilled after a certain time, and during that time accidents may occur?—Yes, formerly the man who sent the goods abroad was really a merchant."

Question 2285.—He is now simply a middleman?—He is now a middleman and tries to keep himself in that position."

Mr. Provand, M.P., describing before the Royal Commission the cost, the uncertainties, and risks of the new mode of doing business, said: "It makes it a speculative gambling business in fact." The long contracts for yarns and piece goods necessitated by the new system lead to gambling in raw cotton. Speculators can afford to pay, and do pay, well for early information. No sooner are contracts placed in Manchester than speculators put their hands on raw cotton; the shipping merchant may also buy cotton simultaneously with his purchases of yarns and goods; for him, with accurate knowledge of contracts placed, it is a safe speculation. So the spinner or manufacturer may find there are three buyers of raw cotton against one transaction in the manufactured article.

In that way "cotton corners" are made. Mr. Henry Lee, formerly M.P. for Southampton, and now President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, in his review of the trade of 1889 at the annual meeting of the Chamber in February of this year, said—

"He believed the manufacturers of the present day were not obtaining what they had a right to expect from the capital they had invested. The wages paid were considerable, but the amount of profit arising from the investment of capital was not large. This was due to several causes. . . . There was gambling in shares, gambling in Stocks, gambling in cotton, gambling in almost everything that could be touched. He quite remembered the time, when he was young, when those things did not exist, and their forefathers would have been horrified at the spirit of speculation which prevailed at the present day."

These are only part of the evils to which this Motion calls the attention of the House. There is no country in the world where the cotton trade is carried on under such unfavourable economic conditions as exist in this country. In all other countries the investment of capital is encouraged. In this country such investment of capital is discouraged by the conflict of monetary laws in the same Empire. There is no other country where the returns for capital and labour employed in the cotton trade are so uncertain as they are in England. We are told we want Protection. What is the meaning of the word "Protection" when used in relation to trade and commerce? It means a tax laid on an article at the port of entry which shall make it difficult for foreigners to compete with home producers. Arbitrary and artificial interference with the sale of commodities affect prices far beyond what the actual amount of interference would seem to warrant. The article of foreign origin being taxed at the port of entry home producers get higher prices, not only by the amount of the tax; but also from the lessened supply. The whole community gives up part of its earnings to increase the income of a section. That is Protection. What is happening to the cotton trade at this moment? Take the case of sales in China of Indian goods for 500 dollars, and of English goods for a like sum, as published in the Manchester evidence. China is a neutral market—open to all on equal terms, and the China merchant has paid equal amounts. The Bombay man gets his money home in full weight and count, but the Manchester man loses 25 per cent. by exchange. Where has the loss gone to? Who has got it? Part of it has been paid to the banker for the risk he has taken in fixing exchange forward. Mr. Provand, M.P., told the Royal Commissioners the bankers' charges on China business were equal to a rate of 12 per cent. per annum for the use of the money, and he had known it to be equal to interest at the rate of 15 and 20 per cent. per annum; but even then the risks and losses were so great that bankers derived only small profits from that class of business. Part of the loss goes in those commissions to bankers, and the remainder of the loss goes in the fall of produce. Falling exchange works both ways—in lowering the price of exports and in lowering the price of imports. Produce to pay for our exports is sold here, and consumed by the whole community. The manufacturer has had 25 per cent. knocked off the value of his goods, and the community has got it. Operatives and their employers have done the work, and the community has got 25 per cent. of their wages. If that had been done of set purpose, we should have given it a hard name. But it is an accident. It came out of the Franco-German War. Not one of the actors on either side of that great war had the remotest idea of what was coming. The last thing they intended was to cripple the industries of the world, but grievously crippled they have been. In saying that one portion of the community—and that the toiling portion of the community—ought not to be robbed of the fruits of their toil, are we Protectionists? Producers are the victims of monetary vivisection. But it is said we are a creditor country. What made us so? The ancient Britons were not creditors of anybody; then, how have we become a creditor country? The inventive faculty possessed by the people of this country, the adaptation of machinery to the varied industries, has so multiplied the power of the individual to produce as to give us the position we hold as the first commercial nation in the world. Improvements in machinery have enabled the same, or a fewer, number of workers to produce more goods of a better quality and at a smaller cost. At the same time, the hours of labour have been lessened, and higher wages earned for fewer hours. That seems strange, and yet it is true. The eight hours' day will come that way, to the advantage of both masters and men. A striking illustration of this great gain took place in the woollen trade. When wool combing was done by hand it was laborious to the workers and injurious to the fibre of the wool; but now, by the aid of the combing machine, invented by Mr. Isaac Holden, M.P., 20 persons can produce more and better combed wool than 2,000 persons could do before. The world has gained more by that invention than if Mr. Holden had discovered a gold mine. Every day's working of a gold mine brings the mine nearer to exhaustion, but every day's working of new inventions of machinery educates the workers and stimulates the mind, which is the mainspring of all production, and so every mechanical invention becomes the parent of others. The inventive faculty in our people is practically without limit. We owe it to Watt, Arkwright, Hargreaves, Kay, Stephenson, Faraday, Wheatstone, Brunel, Bessemer, Holden, and their coadjutors and successors that we are a creditor nation. These men took the forces of Nature and turned them into beneficent activity for the use of man. The power of this country to produce was never greater than now. That power is growing, and, with technical education in all our towns and villages, will grow. We are a nation of producers. Our power to produce is practically unlimited, but the power of each individual to consume is limited by Nature herself. The improvements in shipbuilding and in the management of ships continually lessen the cost of transport, so that distance from the supply of raw material is of less and less consequence. What we want, above all things, is the free interchange of services with other nations. If we permit impediments to the exchange of services to grow up we shall kill the bird that lays the golden eggs. The world is waiting for what we can supply in such abundance. You may cover China with railways and build iron bridges over her rivers. You may supply a network of iron roads over India. The natural wealth of those countries, released by those appliances, will pay you back in full measure, and almost without stint. It would be hard to say whether they or we would reap most benefit from the exchange of products. Just and equitable means of exchange would enable us to render service to each other. The House was greatly interested yesterday in listening to the Budget speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the Budget for a year of returning prosperity. I hold in my hand a letter from a leader of a Trades Union. The writer is a man of high character; he has received distinguished marks of confidence from successive Governments. And this is what he writes to me in respect to work-people in the cotton trade in the generally prosperous year of 1889. After careful inquiry by himself and his colleagues, he says—

Mr. Hoyle

"They find that owing to stoppages of machinery and irregularity of employment in the cotton trade last year the operatives lost in wages alone £265,000."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has the administration of a national estate which has no equal in any other country; but give the Chancellor of the Exchequer fair-play. Give agriculture, give iron and steel, and all the industries into which they enter, fair-play; and then the producers of this country could pay off the National Debt without feeling it. What does the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Flint propose? Simply this—to follow up the work of the Royal Commission by taking part in a Conference of the nations of the world. That is all. The last words of the Motion govern the whole. The Conference would consider whether bi-metallism can be re-established in the interest of all the nations concerned. There can surely be no danger of peril to English interests in such a Conference. The Conference would come at an opportune time. The world is awakening to the importance of a good understanding between nations. The recent Conference held at Berlin was described by Cardinal Manning, who can look back on 80 years of an eventful life, as one of the greatest events of our time. Whatever may ultimately come out of the deliberations of that Conference, it must surely be regarded as an acknowledgment that no nation is so self-contained, so self-sufficient as to have no need of other nations. The summoning of the Berlin Conference is an acknowledgment of the truth that we are all members one of another. It is but 40 years since the Prince Consort of England suggested the holding of a Great Exhibition in Hyde Park to which all nations were invited to send their best industrial products; and now the German Emperor, the grandson of the Prince Consort, invites the great Powers of Europe to join him in trying to improve the condition of those whose lot is that of manual labour. It may well be that the Emperor sees that the policy of "blood and iron" has had its day, and that there are surer ways to national weal than by breechloading guns and magazine rifles. For many years a dark cloud has hung over Continental Europe threatening to burst in war of unprecedented magnitude. The Emperor of Germany, by means of the Berlin Conference, may have set forces in motion which shall disperse that dark cloud and bring us nearer to the time when military burdens shall cease to weigh upon and oppress peaceful industry. The hon. Member for Flint invites the House to assent to the holding of a still greater Conference—a Conference of the chief commercial nations of the world—to consider whether it is possible to devise means whereby all nations may exchange the products of labour without waste and loss. The saving of waste leaves a large margin for profit. Naval engineers and telegraphists have brought nations ever closer and closer together. May not the best minds of every nation, meeting in Council, complete the work by insuring that people everywhere shall gather and enjoy the fruits of their own industry? It would be a Peace Congress of the greatest magnitude, and if successful its beneficial results to all countries would make for "Peace on earth and goodwill among men."

*(9.52.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): Before I proceed to deal with the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Flint, I should like to show how shorn and bald it is compared with that Tabled last year by the Minister for Agriculture. The original form of his Resolution gave much condensed instruction to the House, and was bold as to its assertions. It began by saying that the recent divergence in the price of the precious metals

Mr. Hoyle

"Is prejudicial in the highest degree to the finances and the Government of India, and is detrimental to our trade with the silver-using countries."

It then suggested that the recent and prolonged depression of trade and agriculture, and the irregularity of employment "for vast numbers of the population," was largely owing to the changes in the value of gold and silver. In the speeches which followed the Resolution we were told that the prices of commodities were lowered and that the wages of the people were reduced. That redundant Resolution and the commentaries upon it left the House in no doubt of the views of the bi-metallists. Though that was the character of the Resolution Tabled by the Minister of Agriculture in its passage from the Table to the Chair, some experienced Parliamentary hand seems to have pruned it of all its reasons, and left it in that mild and unassertive form in which it is again offered to-day. The present Resolution assumes that "evils" still exist, though it is not stated what they are. Trade has improved, and the prices of commodities have risen considerably, in spite of the alleged scarcity of gold and the disuse of a silver standard abroad. The chief depression which still exists is in agriculture. The reason is that farmers still keep to the domestic character of their production. All other industries have reorganised their methods in the last 20 years in order to adapt themselves to the changed conditions of production and distribution. Last year the Resolution declared that the divergence in prices of gold and silver was highly detrimental to India. There was some support for that statement in an almost despairing Despatch from the Governor General in September, 1886. The cry of despair was taken up by the Minister of Agriculture, who said—

"India is suffering most severely from the present state of things; and if there be any further fall in the price of silver, which is certain to occur unless effectual steps are taken to arrest it, India will be brought to the verge of ruin and bankruptcy."

That Cassandra prophecy of woe was given in December, 1888. The divergence in prices still exist, but these wails of despair were changed into a song of triumph by the Finance Minister of India, Mr. Steel, in a Report made to the Government in 1889, in which he said—

"We have reason to look forward with hope to the future of agriculture, the great stand-by of the Empire; it is flourishing as it never flourished before. The manufacturing interests are prospering and developing to the great benefit of the country. Trade is growing in magnitude; communications are being rapidly improved. Our debt, though large, is amply covered by the value of State property."

Imports from and exports to India have largely increased since 1873 and to a less extent in other silver countries, and are especially large in the Argentine Republic. It was prophesied that on account of the difficulties of exchange no more capital would be sent to India for improvements. As a fact, we increased our loans to that country by £15,000,000 between 1880 and 1888. To-night the Movers of the Resolution have abandoned their old selected battle-field of India and have chiefly referred to the influence of the changed currency on Lancashire, especially as recent Returns show a falling off in the exports of cotton goods to the East, although that is coincident with a rise, not a fall, in the price of silver. Sudden fluctuations in exchange are, no doubt, harassing to all commerce, but a persistent low rate of exchange can always be provided for by any merchant of experience. He buys goods at gold prices, and knows exactly the exchange value of the silver which he gets by the sale of his goods. But I am not surprised at the working man—I will not say being deluded, because I believe in the utmost sincerity of the bi-metallists and their views on these questions—but I am not surprised that the working man hearing the arguments of the Bi-metallist Association, and having them over and over again, comes to believe that this state of low wages and want of employment during the time of depression arises from these causes. They saw that mills were rising in India. What has led to cotton spinning in India? It has been conclusively proved that the value of the rupee has not fallen in India. It is the possession by that country of cotton—the raw material of the industry—and the cheap labour of the workers which fully accounts for India entering into competition with Lancashire goods. It is in the highest degree doubtful whether the divergence of gold and silver in Europe has anything to do with manufactures in the East. Those who oppose bi-metallism deny that trade depends upon metallic currency. Trade rests upon barter, and anything which profoundly alters production and distribution of commodities necessarily acts upon it. Soon after 1873, there was a great development of railways in the United States and India. At that time also the Suez Canal worked a transformation in commerce. It gave an enormous impulse to steam navigation, especially when duplex engines were introduced, and large existing fleets, both of sail and steam, were swept away as antiquated. Trade had to adapt itself to new routes and conditions of traffic. While commerce was being transformed, production in manufactures was vastly increased, and it became larger than the consumption. It took time for the world to adapt itself to the changed conditions, and that period was marked by depression of trade. I cannot say what are the cardinal doctrines of faith of bi-metallists at the present time, but I know that up to a recent period one of them was that the scarcity of gold has produced its appreciation, in consequence of which the prices of commodities fell. I admit that this view has received a considerable amount both of direct and indirect support from the unfortunate manner in which the Royal Commission reported. Undoubtedly, in recent years, various States have increased their gold coinage and lessened that of silver. Where has been the sign of scarcity of gold? Silver has been displaced, but gold has flowed in with perfect ease to supply it. The stoppage of the legal ratio by the Latin Union in 1873 did not demonetise silver; it simply altered the distribution of silver coins. Between 1876 and 1880 the silver coined reached the enormous total of £129,500,000, about 40 per cent. higher than when the legal ratio was kept up by the Latin Union. To speak of the "consequent demonetisation of silver" in the face of such increasing silver coinage is an absurdity. When the main argument for bi-metallism is the scarcity and consequent appreciation of gold, surely we may call upon its advocates to tell us what they mean by scarcity, and to give us proofs that it exists. Scarcity in commodities such as grain or cotton means that there is an insufficient quantity for consumption. But gold, though it wastes a little by use, does not disappear in consumption; it only circulates. When does gold become so scarce as to appreciate in value and lower the prices of commodities? On the other hand, under what conditions does it become so abundant as to depreciate in value and to raise the prices of commodities? There must be some happy medium between abundance and scarcity when it neither lowers nor raises prices. These are fundamental questions which ought to be answered by those who seek to alter our monetary system. There are definitions in abundance as to the amount of money which a man ought to possess. Locke and Petty put it as one-fiftieth or fifty-second part of the annual wages or half the annual rent of land. I do not desire to fix upon the bi-metallists either of these definitions, for times have changed; but I cannot argue on scarcity or abundance of gold without some proof or explanation of what the terms mean. I admit that business is done with a much smaller quantity of gold than was deemed necessary 20 years ago. Other nations are now imitating our banking system, and the transference of coin from hand to hand is greatly economised by instruments of credit. The liabilities of our banks to the public amount to £621,000,000, or nearly the figure of the National Debt; but the amount of coin or bullion to meet this liability is only about £35,000,000, or, if we deduct from each side of the account the £8,000,000 locked up in the Notes Department of the Bank of England, it is £27,000,000, or only $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the liabilities. What would have been scarcity 20 years ago would be perplexing abundance now. The last stronghold of the bi-metallists is that France for 70 years, aided by the Latin Union for eight of those years, maintained a fixed ratio of gold and silver at 1 to $15\frac{1}{2}$. There was no inherent virtue in that ratio. When it was established in the ninth year of the Revolution, that happened to be the market price of silver. To propose to rehabilitate it now when the ratio is as 1 to 20, is a very serious proposal. But it is not true that France coined gold and silver indifferently at 1 to $15\frac{1}{2}$ during 70 years, that is, from 1803 to 1873. The market prices showed constant variations from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent., and sometimes much more. Free coinage, which was the essence of a bi-metallic system, became impossible under these fluctuations, and for 50 out of the 70 years it did not exist except to a limited extent. When gold was cheap gold coinage was encouraged; when silver was cheap that was coined chiefly. Thus, from 1821 to 1850, or for 30 years, silver was 2 per cent. cheaper than gold, and France coined $87\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of silver and only $12\frac{1}{2}$ of gold. In the next 20 years ending 1870, gold fell under the legal value, and the Mints of France, and later of the Latin Union, only coined 10 per cent. of silver, while they coined 90 per cent. of gold. So that during 30 years France was practically mono-metallic on the basis of silver, with gold at a premium; and in the next 20 years she was practically still mono-metallic, but on the basis of gold. In fact, though France was bi-metallic in law, she was practically mono-metallic in practice for at least 50 out of the 70 years. During the 50 years when the coinage was practically mono-metallic, a far more powerful law than the Bi-metallic Law came into operation. This was the Gresham Law, by which the metal, overrated on the ratio, forced the dear metal out of the market. It was this law, and not German silver, which broke down the Latin Union when silver became abundant and fell in price. Silver having become cheaper, the Gresham Law forced it into coinage. A legal ratio is only possible on two conditions (1) that the Mints are the dominant buyers and use most of the annual product in coinage; and (2) when that product is moderate in quantity. The legal ratio broke down because the artifice by which France held it up could no longer bear the strain. But silver was coined in much greater quantity than at any previous period. The increase of silver coin was 54 per cent. greater in the five years ending 1875 than in the preceding five years. What Germany did was to call in her miscellaneous coin and issue uniform coins of gold and silver. The silver in the Bank reserves and that hoarded by the Government was thrown on the market, and, no doubt, influenced the prices on a falling market. From 1873 to 1879 Germany sold silver to the amount of £28,357,000, or an average of £4,000,000 annually.

Sir Lyon Playfair

It was soon absorbed by the coining nations, which required, and did coin annually more than double the amount of silver thrown by Germany on the market. The production of both gold and silver since 1873 has been greater than at any period of the world's history. Before the Californian discoveries, the annual mean product of gold never exceeded 20,000 kilogrammes; now it is eight times as much, or 160,000. Silver has not increased in the same proportion. The mean annual product of silver for the 70 years when the legal ratio prevailed was 838,000 kilogrammes, but the mean annual product since that date has been above 2,500,000, and is now about 3,000,000. Formerly the Mints coined nearly all the gold produced, and when the goldsmith wanted it for his art he melted down sovereigns. But now the supply of gold is far in excess of the demands for coinage, which steadily decrease. In the decade ending 1860 gold was cheap, so the Gresham Law forced 81 per cent. of the annual product into the coinage of the world. In the next decade ending 1870 gold was becoming dearer, and only 54 per cent. of the product was coined. In the decade ending 1880, 45 per cent. was used for coinage, and in the last five years of Soetbeer's Tables, ending 1885, only 23 per cent. was used for coin. At least 75 per cent. of the annual product of gold is no longer used for coin. How is it that gold has kept up its value and that silver has fallen? The reason is obvious. There is a demand for gold outside that of the Mints, for industrial purposes, for bullion, and hoarding, which takes 75 per cent. of the produce. About 60 per cent. seems to be used in the Arts. Silver, on the other hand, is chiefly valuable for coinage, industrial uses scarcely amounting to 27 per cent. of the product. Unfortunately, its use in Arts is not extending. Though the Mints are the chief purchasers of silver and the smallest purchasers of gold, they are quite unable to keep up the price of silver. The Mints of the United States, of France, and of India, have laboured to keep up the price by enormous coinage, but hitherto they have failed. The sum of our knowledge of the commissions of different nations is, that though gold has largely increased since 1850 in annual product, the demand for purposes other than coinage, industry, bullion, and hoarding—has been so great as to keep up its price. Silver, on the other hand, though its product has also increased and though the demand for coinage up to 1880 often exceeded the annual product, has been in such small demand for industrial purposes that its price has fallen. One of the chief reasons for this seems to be that in a busy country of large commerce silver is too bulky and heavy for use as a coin in important transactions. Silver, as a fractional coin and of token value, is indispensable. The French and United States coins, with their legal ratio, are not full weighted. What has happened in America even with light silver dollars worth only 75 cents? In 11 years the United States has coined no less than 300,000,000 ounces of silver, and has now in the Treasury 335,500,000 dollars and fractional coin worth £69,000,000. In spite of this enormous coinage silver has fallen 20 per cent. in that period. The silver coin is stored away in vaults and cellars and is of no use to any human being. The silver thus locked up will remain a useless accumulation, at least until the country reduces itself to a mono-metallic silver standard. You might as well have the cellars filled with Holloway's Pills, or Pear's Soap, as with the silver. The silver coin in actual circulation is little more than one dollar per head of the population, though 290,000,000 dollars are represented in paper certificates. Past experience has shown that no legislative union of gold and silver will persuade merchants to fill their pockets with silver in small transactions, or to receive it in cartloads or shiploads in large dealings. The legal ratio in America is one ounce of gold to 16 ounces of silver. If you want to use it as coin you must have 16 times more strength to handle it, 16 times more transport to carry it, and 16 times more space to hold it. So that you have a misapplication of 16-17ths of human effort in using silver instead of gold for the purposes of commerce. The hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) and the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir W. Haulesworth) contend that the legal union of silver and gold will add more strength to the currency. It was quite true that if you yoke a carthorse to a racehorse the strength of both would be increased. But the speed of the racer would be sacrificed. Gold is more easily handled and transported, and does its work with more celerity. To ask civilised countries with large commerce to go back to a bulky and heavy standard like silver, or to couple gold and silver together is, in fact, like asking nations to give up railways and go back to stage-coaches as a means of locomotion. The bi-metallists seem desirous to restrict trade as Lycurgus did when he forced the Lacedæmonians to use iron as money in order that its weight might deter them from over-much trading. Each country adopts the money best fitted for its own work. Silver is not so well suited as copper for the uncivilised parts of Africa, for semi-civilised nations it is better adapted than gold for the standard. Before 1816 England, like other civilised nations, found the double standard of silver and gold well adapted for its transactions. In 1873 many nations preferred, like England, to adopt the single gold standard. What was it that converted 309,000,000 bi-metallists to become mono-metallists? It was the simple fact that the supply of silver became greater than the demand for it as a circulating medium. When these nations used both gold and silver in the ratio of value of 1 to $15\frac{1}{2}$, the ratio of the annual product of the two metals was only as 1 to 7, but now it is as 1 to 19. In America it is 1 to 20 or 1 to 30. If the power of Statute Law could override the laws of supply and demand and give a legal value to two metals, it would be more simple to fix a ratio of equality and say that one ounce of silver should have the same value as one ounce of gold. The hon. Member for Flintshire admits the logic of the position. He says that Statute Law could create and uphold equal values between the two metals, but that he prefers the ratio of 1 to $15\frac{1}{2}$ because of old experience. I wonder that it did not occur to my hon. Friend that Statute Law is powerless to control laws of nature. Locke, in his famous essay on currency, put this very clearly—

"You will as fruitlessly endeavour to keep two different things at the same price one with another, as you could keep two things in equilibrium when their varying weights depend on different causes."

The hon. Member for Flint has quoted
Sir Lyon Playfair

several benevolent passages from remarks made by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in relation to a silver currency, but there is one passage he has not quoted. At the Conference of 1878 our present Chancellor of the Exchequer was the delegate of England, and in his final speech on that occasion said—

"As for the desire that has been expressed that a fixed ratio may be established between gold and silver and an International value be given to them, I declare that in my view it is impossible to realise this, impossible to maintain it in theory, and that it is contrary to the principles of science."

The bi-metallists wholly disagree with Locke and the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the physical impossibility of keeping up a fixed ratio, for they contend that what is impossible for a single nation is quite possible for a combination of nations. What does this admission amount to? It is giving up bi-metallism as a principle, and relying upon it as a Trust Syndicate. No doubt such an International Syndicate would raise the price of silver up to a certain period, and would greatly stimulate its production. What has happened in the recent copper ring would certainly happen in a new silver ring. The bi-metallists desire a Conference. What can a Conference do in regard to supply and demand? Suppose all nations agreed to dress their soldiers and reserves in red coats and blue trousers and to establish a bi-colour ratio between the red dye stuff of madder and the blue of indigo. No doubt the price of both would rise, and France, Turkey, and Holland would again open up vast areas to the production of madder, and India would open new vats for indigo. How long would the price last at a fixed rate, especially as there is an outside demand of 24 civilians for each soldier? I can understand why America should advocate a bi-metallic league; but I am inclined to agree with a quiet writer like Jevons even when he remarks—

"Does it not seem outrageous folly for England to create a factitious demand for silver in order to keep up the profits of the Nevada Mines?"

The chief commercial nations of the world are to be called together to consider whether a bi-metallic system can be established in their common interests. England, the great creditor nation of the world, is to invite the debtor nations to confer with her as to whether the debts contracted in gold since 1816 may be repaid in depreciated silver, which the experience of centuries shows is the metal most liable to fluctuations in price, and which is certainly a worse medium of exchange and probably a worse standard of value. Of course, with a legal tender of an overrated metal silver would displace gold in our currency. No doubt the other nations will willingly, nay joyously, invite this country to walk into their parlour and receive the innocent fly. Practically the proposal is to widen the Latin Union, by including in it England, Germany, the American States, and perhaps India. Certainly there is novelty in the idea. The Latin Union was quite powerless to uphold the conventional ratio; but an enlarged Latin Union, containing England, which is facile princeps the great creditor nation, would, I admit, be much more stable. How long would this stability last? Just as long as England remained in the Union as a meek sheep to be shorn of her wool by the debtor nations. Modern bi-metallists are like the ancient alchemists, only that they are upside down. Our former Monarchs used to keep alchemists in their households to transmute silver into gold; but now our bi-metallic alchemists are striving to convert English gold into foreign silver—the nobler into the baser metal. I am sure it is in the interest of England to adhere to her monetary system in perfect independence of other nations. Bi-metallism is a theory which the Royal Commission could not agree to recommend. The hon. Members who move the Resolution express their satisfaction with some of the admissions of that Commission. Why do they not attach importance to the final conclusion of Lord Herschell and his co-signatories, when they say—

“The change proposed is tremendous, and we cannot but feel that, to a great extent, it would be a leap in the dark.”

*(10.45.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I wish, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Member for Derby, who spoke earlier in the evening, had heard the interesting speech just delivered on the same side of the question as that on which he delivered himself, for I think he would have admitted that if there are philosophers who advocate the bi-metallic heresy the philosophers are not all on one side. Now, Mr. Speaker, my heresy on this question is of rather ancient date. I believe that many Gentlemen on this side of the House have been converted to what is called, not very happily, I think, bi-metallism, by the economic evils which they think, and in my opinion justly think, have flowed from the rupture of the bi-metallic par of 1873, and it was not until the economic consequences of that great currency change had been brought home to them, in the shape of commercial and agricultural depression, that they became converts to the view that a bi-metallic currency is the best currency which the world as a whole can adopt. That, at all events, is not my case. From a time when I had more opportunity than now of studying economic theories I became a convert to that opinion, which is not the opinion of a small minority of lunatics, as some persons vainly imagine, but is one held by the great majority of experts in France, in Germany, and in America; and I hold that opinion on broad grounds which have been strengthened, but not created by any experience which we have had since 1874. I admit that to attribute all the economic evils under which this country has been suffering for the last 15 years to the divergence between the currency value of gold and silver is not only erroneous in itself, but is in contradiction of the most ordinary economic knowledge, which shows us that for every great economic change a very large number of diverse, separate, and independent forces are responsible. But because that divergence in value is not wholly or, perhaps, even chiefly responsible for the great disasters that have occurred, that is no reason why we should not remedy, as far as we can, by an improvement of our currency system, the disasters for which that system has been responsible, and why we should not adopt a currency calculated in the future to give us a stability that, unfortunately, has not existed in the civilised world during the last 15 or 16 years. Now, there are three entirely distinct and separate kinds of evils which, I think, may be shown to have followed from the existing currency system. The first evil, and, I think, in some respects the least evil, though it is one that is especially felt in Lancashire, is that which results from the admittedly temporary circumstance that a bonus has been given to Indian exports by the process of the fall of silver. The right hon. Member for Derby told us that, though this was an admitted evil for Lancashire, it was an unmixed benefit to India. I will come to that point directly, but let me point out, with regard to Indian manufactures, that we cannot regard any temporary stimulation of its export trade as an unmixed benefit. One of the great evils of any bounty system—and this by the hypothesis is a bounty system—is that it is, or may be, temporary in its effects. It stimulates trade, but when it ceases there is nothing to support the accumulation of labour and capital in an industry predestined, from natural and permanent causes, to ruin, or comparative ruin, at no distant date; yet while the benefit conferred upon India, the country in which the bounty is given, may be temporary, the injury done to England, the country against which the bounty is directed, may produce evils of the most serious kind. Because, notice this—the evils arising from a diversion of trade from one channel to another by artificial means, are not to be measured by a simple consideration of the loss or gain to the community from having to purchase a dearer or a cheaper article. A great injury to the community arises from this fact—that when an industry moves, the instruments of production either do not move at all, or move with very unequal facility. You may easily transfer floating capital to a more profitable industry; but that part of capital which is embodied in machinery and buildings you cannot move at all, while labour moves only with the greatest difficulty, and at a great cost of inconvenience and suffering. The Lancashire labourers who suffer from this temporary bounty given to the Indian labourers cannot transfer their industry to a new market, while the Indian labourers will in their turn suffer when the artificial bounty produced by the divergence between gold and silver comes to an end. Now I go to the second effect produced by our present system, which is the uncertainty of exchange. Now, the uncertainty of exchange is a wholly different evil from those to which I have just referred. It would exist equally though silver were appreciated instead of depreciated, and would produce consequences probably not less disastrous. The right hon. Member for Derby, who cannot pursue his consideration even of a currency question without calling into play his great controversial talents, even though his friends and not his enemies are his victims, chose to use the most violent language against the Indian Administration who were his colleagues in 1886 when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he told us, in words which unfortunately I did not take down—and I cannot from my own resources successfully imitate them—that they bitterly complained of the extension of Indian manufactures and productions. Now, I assert with confidence that no Indian Government ever complained of that; what they complained of was that the whole of Indian finance was thrown into disorder by the uncertainty in the exchanges, and that the result of the disorder in Indian finance was suffering to the Indian taxpayer. I might refer here to the embarrassment caused in International transactions between gold and silver using countries by this uncertainty; but the matter has been so well put by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, that I will at once pass on to the third evil arising from the divergence of value between the two currencies, which is, in my opinion, the most important of all. What the world requires is a permanent and a stable currency. Money is a measure of value, and it performs not only the function of measuring the value of the transactions from day to day, but it acts as what has been called a standard of deferred payments; and unless your standard of deferred payments is in itself a stable standard you necessarily inflict a great hardship either upon the creditors or upon the debtors in a community. Some have argued as if those who are in favour of bi-metallism desire a currency inflation. I do not desire a currency inflation; though, no doubt, if we must suffer either from inflation or from contraction, then I say let us suffer from inflation. What I desire is, that we should do our best to find a currency which will be neither subject to serious inflation nor to serious contraction; and I cannot conceive how anyone who has studied this question can doubt that a currency formed of two metals would be less liable to the violent changes of value than the existing mono-metallic currencies. The right hon. Gentleman asked us to define in what consists the scarcity of gold? The scarcity of gold, or of any currency, exists wherever the standard of deferred payment seriously alters its value in an upward direction. It can be shown, as I believe, that where a bi-metallic currency exists such scarcity is less likely to occur. To those who think it unlikely to occur under our present system I should like to ask whether they think the tendencies of commerce are in the direction of depreciation or appreciation? I admit, so far as you invent new banking facilities and new methods of economising the precious metals in their work as coins, so far you mitigate the inconvenience which must ensue from the increase of population, the increase of production, the increase of commerce, and the increased amount of work which you throw upon your currency. But do you expect that, in the long run, these banking facilities will keep pace with the increased amount of labour which you are deliberately throwing upon the gold standard? We have heard a great deal to-night, and have seen a great deal in the Press, to the effect that the fall in prices is owing, not to the scarcity of gold, but to the increase of commodities. I am not sure that the distinction is not entirely fallacious. So long as the work a given amount of money has to do increases (it matters not from what cause), so long will you suffer from the evils of an appreciating currency. Do not mono-metallists regard with apprehension the effect of reversing the legislation of silver-using countries? If America to-morrow were to decide that it would have no more to do with silver, but would work its whole commercial system on a gold basis, where would prices be? Do you seriously think that a gross injustice would not be done to the debtor, that grave injury would not be inflicted upon commerce, and a serious difficulty be thrown upon the Government of India? In the absence of international agreement you are not only perfectly helpless to prevent changes of that kind, but you would not have the slightest ground of complaint against the Government which caused all the inconvenience. The conclusion that I draw from this very brief analysis of the evils and advantages, relatively of the bi-metallic and the mono-metallic systems is that if you can establish a bi-metallic system you should do so. For the House will, I think, grant this: that if you had a bi-metallic system you would get rid, in the first place, of the artificial bounty which everybody admits to be an evil in International transactions. In the second place, you would get rid of the uncertainty of exchange, which is admitted even by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby to be a great impediment to manufacture and trade; and though I do not say you would get rid altogether of the oscillations and variations in your standard of payment, you would greatly diminish them, while you would entirely remove the evils which have arisen in the past, and must arise in the future, I fear, from the independent action of countries with regard to the currency they choose to employ. We have only, therefore, to consider whether a bi-metallic ratio is possible or not. The first observation I have to make on that point is that the problem has been solved by experience. The thing has been done. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman himself will attempt to deny that it has been done, and that the relatively small commercial community of France, Belgium, and Italy were able by their united action to give us all the benefits of a stable exchange which we were too dull or too lazy to obtain for ourselves. The right hon. Member for Derby, who, I observe, has just come in, asked why, if it was so advantageous, did the Latin Union give it up? Well, the Latin Union gave it up for reasons perfectly consistent with the bi-metallic theory. Nobody denies that there is a point after which a bi-metallic country will be denuded of the more expensive metal. The smaller the bi-metallic area the more easily that point is reached. The action of Germany in 1873 did undoubtedly throw, in the opinion of French statesmen—I do not say whether they were right or wrong—a burden on the bi-metallic machinery of the Latin Union more than it could bear. That has never been denied by any bi-metallist. On the contrary, it is what some bi-metallists prophesied would occur under such circumstances. But is that any solid argument against introducing a state of things in which there will be no country like Germany outside the Union, and in which the bi-metallic area, instead of being confined to France, Belgium, and Italy, would embrace practically the whole commercial community of the world? Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby drew a hypothetical picture of what the world would be like if the bi-metallic dream, as he would call it, were to become a reality, and if some great political catastrophe like the Franco-German War were to occur, and an important country like Germany were to withdraw from the Union. The picture does not alarm me. What motive would Germany—taking that country for the purpose of illustration—have for withdrawing? The right hon. Gentleman says, "In order to get gold." He says that gold would naturally flow to the country where most could be got for it; that if gold was unduly depreciated in the Union, the country that left the Union might get it; and on that basis he founds the theory that Germany, desiring to get gold quickly, would be tempted to leave the Union. But that would only happen if the ratio between the two metals were disturbed. If you have a sufficiently large area, if, as the minority on the Commission proposed, you embrace practically the civilised world in your bi-metallic area, the action of one country in leaving the Union could not disturb the ratio. And since it is only through a disturbance of the ratio that it would attract gold, it could not have any motive for leaving the Bi-metallic Union. Let me also point out, in the second place, that a country which is just going to war does not take that opportunity of entering into a currency operation which certainly would not have a quieting effect upon its Money Market; and, in the third place, let me point out that the effect of the adoption of the system must necessarily be a slow effect. It would not be like raising the bank rate, which brings in gold at once into the Bank of England. Gold would only come in by a slow percolation of appreciated metal from the bi-metallic countries. The third objection, and possibly the most important, depends upon the theory that legislation cannot fix the ratio between any two metals for currency purposes. Now, I do not think that a question like this can be argued fitly in an Assembly of this kind; but let me point out two or three facts which bear on it. My right hon. Friend the leader of the House read some very interesting extracts from the Debates which occurred in this House in 1830, from which it appears that the universal opinion of competent authorities—among them Sir Robert Peel and Lord Althorp—then was that to endeavour to fix a ratio between the two metals was to run counter to the inevitable laws of nature. But since that date a complete revolution has taken place in the way in which, in this country at least, economists look at this question. I do not believe that you will find a theoretical teacher or professor of position under 50 years of age in America, Germany, France, Italy, or England who is prepared to stake his reputation on the theory that you cannot fix a bi-metallic ratio. As many who have devoted themselves to the theoretical consideration of this question know, the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is antiquated. I state that with some confidence, for I observe always that the right hon. Gentleman is a Tory in the wrong place. Consider the Report of the Commission. It will not be asserted that that Commission was composed of persons of very radical tendencies on currency questions. In fact, a large number of them were deeply imbued with and attached to the doctrines prevalent in England 30 years ago; yet every one of those gentlemen, differing as they did upon many points, was on this most important issue convinced by the force of logic and argument of the fact that there is no inherent difficulty in establishing a fixed ratio between the two metals.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Mr. A. J. Balfour

SIR J. LUBBOCK: Two Members of the Commission expressed a diametrically opposite view.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I accept any statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. I am quite aware that two Members, the right hon. Gentleman being one of them, signed a minority Report; but I do not understand that they deliberately traversed the statement that a ratio could be established between the two metals. If it be possible, as I believe almost every economist of repute holds it to be possible, to fix, by international arrangement this ratio between the two metals, is it not preposterous that a question of such supreme international importance should be left wholly to the separate action of different nations? Postal questions and labour questions we can settle internationally, but currency questions, it appears, we cannot so settle. Though we were told by the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last that commerce was an international affair, the currency which is so intimately connected with commerce appears not to be an international affair. It seems to me to be of all international affairs the most international, the one that most deserves to be treated by common arrangement among nations. I, of course, admit that there may be difficulties in establishing this system; but I think those difficulties have been exaggerated. When I reflect that great nations have gone from inconvertible currency to convertible currency, from depreciated to undepreciated currency, from silver, to gold, and from gold to silver without those colossal disturbances and those serious diversions of trade which the right hon. Gentleman anticipates, I cannot help thinking that possibly those who, like my right hon. Friends the leader of the House and the Member for Derby, anticipate commercial disaster, not from the system, but from the process of its establishment, exaggerate the danger they fear. I frankly admit that I have not sufficient acquaintance with financial details to give to the House an opinion on the subject which is worth very much; but I have noticed in looking over the commercial history of the world that in almost every question the practical men ultimately come round to the side of the theoretical men. I am prepared, like the right hon. Gentleman, to appeal to the early experience of the century. He is as well aware as I am that the Directors of the Bank of England of that day and the commercial classes whom they represented were vehemently opposed to the resumption of specie payments, and anticipated the most serious commercial consequences from the reversion to the gold standard in England. Those anticipations were combated by theoretical men like Ricardo and others, and they proved to be unfounded. I am far from saying or thinking that the opinions of the great practical financiers and bankers of this country are to be despised—far from it. I know that nothing can be done, and I would suggest that nothing should be attempted which is against their views and wishes. I think it is from a discussion such as this that those who are engaged in the practical financial operations of London and other centres may see what dangers they run or may run from allowing every nation independently to settle, not for itself, but for the world, the currency that is to be adopted—from allowing Germany to decide whether the Indian Government shall or shall not have a tax on Indian rice; from allowing America to decide whether or not debts shall be paid at a rate which is equivalent to putting 25 per cent. additional burden on the debtor—and they will come round to the view that in the face of the rapidly-growing commerce of the world, in the face of the increasingly international character of the commercial transactions, it is desirable that some international arrangement should be arrived at which would not only have the effect of entirely preventing these daily oscillations between silver-using countries and gold-using countries which now perplex merchants and manufacturers, but will also have the effect of giving a more stable index of the measure of the permanent indebtedness of the world than they can ever hope to have under the mono-metallic standard. I trust the House will understand that. I adhere now as always to the view that the bi-metallic standard is the best; at the same time, I feel bound to give additional emphasis to what I have already stated, that it would be folly and madness in any Government to go in advance of the educated commercial opinion of the country. I certainly should think it not far from lunacy to attempt to force on the United Kingdom and the City of London a form of currency they did not thoroughly adopt and believe in.

*(11.26.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEV, St. George's, Hanover Square): One of the last words which fell from my right hon. Friend was the word "lunacy." I have been told that there are three great forces which produce lunacy—love, religion, and currency. From his extremely luminous and sane speech it is clear that at least the last of these three forces has not in the slightest degree affected him. I think that mono-metallists have made a great error in not grappling more seriously and at an earlier period with the problems which bi-metallists have put forward. There are too many mono-metallists who simply treat the whole bi-metallist theory as if it was not worth consideration. That is a practice to which I always demur, for I hold that many of the arguments adduced are strong arguments and require to be seriously dealt with. But the great point is this. Supposing we were to adopt the bi-metallic system, and were to remedy, as I believe we should to a considerable extent, the grievances which are alleged, and I believe with great truth, to exist under the present system, should we not at the same time be opening up serious grievances, great risks in another direction, the ill effects of which we might possibly not be able to see at the present moment? I accept two out of the three points put forward by my right hon. Friend and other speakers on behalf of bi-metallism. I believe that the uncertainty which is produced in our transactions with India by the present state of things is unsatisfactory, and if we could meet it, it would be an enormous advantage. Still, it is perhaps possible to exaggerate the inconvenience which arises from this uncertainty, because after all there are a great number of countries with whom we trade where the same uncertainty exists, and it exists much more in the case of countries with a depreciated currency than in the case of those using silver, and if we were to exclude from the purview of profitable operations all those countries that have a currency less stable than our own, I am afraid the area over which profits are realised by this country would sustain serious diminution. Our merchants are accustomed to deal with fluctuating currencies; and in answer to my hon. Friend behind me I may say that the very telegraph to which he alluded, in his able speech in seconding the Motion, as having diminished the profits of merchants has been one of the chief instruments by which it has been possible to meet the uncertainties of currencies.

Mr. Goschen

If I am not mistaken, it is the general practice of merchants at the present time to attempt to meet the uncertainties of exchange by ascertaining by telegraph the exact rate of exchange, and then to cover themselves by securing that rate. I admit broadly that if we should have a similar currency with India, if it were possible to get rid of these uncertainties, we should take a great step in facilitating our relations with that great portion of the Empire. It is to be deplored that such great fluctuations should have taken place. A second object in which I agree with my right hon. Friend is in the desire, if it were possible, to have one currency throughout the world, that all our transactions might be conducted on a more stable footing as regards the metal in which debts are paid. I do not agree with the third point my right hon. Friend made, as regards the grievance he raised with respect to the system of bounties—temporary bounties he called them—which are now offered to the cotton goods manufacturers of India. How can my right hon. Friend be sure that these are temporary bounties? It would have been a temporary bounty in the event of our returning again to the old standard. For a certain number of years we have been considerably below that which used to be considered as the proper standard between the two metals. I doubt whether, unless the countries of Europe and America take some great international action, how far it can be said these bounties are temporary. I do not know how we can regulate them. The House would take a great responsibility on itself if it attempted to decide whether this is a temporary difficulty or a permanent difficulty—and whether, if we consider it a temporary difficulty, we should take steps to throw backward the industrial movement that has taken place in India. We must look at it from the point of view of what is right and what is wrong. We have a serious responsibility in the matter. Supposing we endeavoured to meet all the difficulties that exist at the present moment, we have to consider whether in doing justice to some, we may not find ourselves doing an immense injustice to others. Look at the position of India in this matter. There was a time when India suffered enormously from the fall in the price of silver. Some 10 years ago, and even later, the sufferings that India experienced were extreme, and I differ entirely from the right hon. Member for Derby, who attempted to minimise these difficulties, and said that the question was as to the salaries of a few Indian officials. India owed £15,000,000 to this country, and it had to remit that £15,000,000 here in gold, and the loss on exchange which India had to bear amounted to £3,000,000, an amount which paralysed for a long time the whole finances of India. But I am not sure whether I exaggerate in suggesting that India has now settled down, more or less, to the new conditions. New trades have been developed in consequence of this state of things, and the price of silver being low has had a great effect upon India generally. Supposing, if it were possible, we were to re-cast the present system and raise the rate of exchange, should we be right or wrong in taking that serious step? If I had time I should wish to say one word upon that point before I sit down. But with regard to the position of India generally, surely we have to consider this: whether now that these interests have grown up, and now that the very attitude of those who used to speak in the name of India has changed, and they take a different course to that which they recommended before, whether we ought to attempt to restore the old state of things artificially. Thus I doubt whether my right hon. Friend is right in urging this temporary bounty as one of the reasons why we should proceed to the adoption of bi-metallism. I agree that theoretically it is possible to return to bi-metallism; but, while it is theoretically possible, there are many practical difficulties in the way. I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who said that he could not understand how it could be even theoretically possible. It has been stated by the Royal Commission that the existence of bi-metallism in France did form for a long period of years a powerful means of retaining the ratio between the two metals. By legislation, the ratio was fixed; and the question has been asked, Why did the Latin Union take the course they did? For this obvious reason: While other Mints were open for silver, only a portion flowed into the Latin Union.

But the Latin Union saw that it might have to bear the whole brunt of the silver that came from Germany when Germany had adopted a gold currency, and also the product of the new silver mines worked in America, and it was natural that it closed its Mints. We were in the same position in India. While Mints remained open they constitute a powerful force in sustaining the relative value between the two metals. The fact that Germany poured its silver into the Latin Union caused the difficulty in those countries, because the area was so limited. I want the mono-metallist to understand that argument, for if we could get an area wide enough the bi-metallic principle is theoretically possible, provided that you can be certain that all parties will maintain the agreement. But then you come to one of the practical difficulties to which I have alluded, and you must look at the practical difficulties as well as the theoretical possibilities on the other side. I have contended, and I am prepared still to contend, that I should prefer the currency of the world to depend rather upon two metals than upon one metal. To those views I gave expression in 1878. I am not now speaking individually of the United Kingdom; but I should like to see silver pressed into service to do the work of the currency of the world as well as gold, so that the currency of the world should not depend on one metal, but on two. While I rejected the idea of a Bi-metallic Union in 1878, I said this—that the mono-metallists were in the wrong who wished to make a crusade for the adoption of a general gold currency. I should be only too glad if other countries would have a silver currency, for it would steady both the exchanges of this country and of India. Therefore, I do not wish to say one word to discourage other countries from adopting the bi-metallic system. I have always looked upon silver and gold not as antagonistic to each other, not as being articles, the price of one of which would necessarily fall when the other rose, but I have looked upon them rather as partners who together were doing the work of the currency of the world. Allusion has been made to the rate of discount in connection with the scarcity of gold; but such allusion confuses capital and currency. The alleged scarcity of gold has to me another meaning. I think that the amount of gold used as currency is extremely small to bear the enormous burden which is put upon it. I admit that, as interested in the commerce and monetary system of this country, I feel a kind of shame that, on the occasion of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 of gold being taken from this country to Brazil or any other country, it should immediately have the effect of causing a momentary alarm throughout the country. I doubt seriously whether the stock of gold which we have in this country in an available form is one whit too large; on the contrary, I think it is rather too small. Therefore, I think that as long as other countries use silver they are doing a general service to the commerce of the world. If a gold standard had once for all been adopted, and prices had adopted themselves to such a great change, the existing gold might be sufficient for all purposes; but a transition involving a first demand for gold creates great difficulties for those countries whose currency is gold, because the narrow margin which is now allowed in all currency transactions involves such inconvenience when any sudden demand is made upon what is a comparatively small stock. Therefore, I do not admit the argument which rejects allusion to the scarcity of gold, and I say that I should be glad to see silver performing as much work as is possible in the currency. But we have to see what is practicable. What are we asked to do by the Motion now before the House? We are asked to convoke another Conference to see whether some international agreement cannot be arrived at. Well, Conferences have been held and very exhaustive Reports made, and no result has been possible. We have appointed a Royal Commission, and what is the result? A divided Report; and certainly it is not upon any divided Report that we have a right to take the immensely responsible step of tampering with the general currency. The argument has been used that we might by a general arrangement adopt a bi-metallic system. I have no time now to state what I consider would be the danger of such a course; but though you might have a Conference that would come to an agreement, the interests would be so diverse that I have very grave doubts whether that agreement would be permanently kept. I ask what security we should have that that agreement would be permanently kept, and not only that, but would it not be necessary also that all countries should believe that it would be permanently kept? If you knew that there would be no desire ever to draw back, then silver and gold might circulate together on the ratio fixed, subject to one important condition, that the outside uses of gold and silver should be, comparatively speaking, analogous, and that there should be no great desire to use gold rather than silver for any other purposes. But there will always be anxiety to keep gold for emergencies, and it is this which makes me doubt whether a general international agreement would be permanently safe. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland did not attach great importance to that objection; but I confess that to me it is a very important one. In case of war every one strains for gold, and hon. Members may not be aware that gold is kept in reserve by foreign countries for the purposes of a war chest. When war was declared, or before war was declared, one country might take measures to attract gold to itself and that might alarm other countries, and there might be a scramble for gold under which the agreement would break down and general confusion arise. Again, you would have to pass through a long period before you arrived at your agreement, and what fearful speculation would not arise in the interval? I admit that that would only be a temporary difficulty; but I think that the Government would only be justified in going to a Conference if it knew that the country was behind it and that it was practically almost certain of success. I think it would be wrong to call a Conference in the belief that we might carry out something which we could not effect without the assent and co-operation of foreign countries, and which we might not even be able to persuade the public of this country to adopt. Therefore, I hold that it is entirely premature to carry such a plan into execution; and I think that hon. Members will do well, acting upon their own responsibility—for this is an open question—to vote that the words proposed to be left out shall stand part of the Question.

Mr. Goschen

*(1148.) SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: Sir, I do not wish to stand between the House and a Division, and in the few minutes which remain before the necessary close of the Debate under the new Rule it is impossible to reply fully to the two right hon. Gentlemen who have just sat down; but I have been referred to several times in the course of the debate, and there are some points on which I should be glad to say a few words. The case of India has been referred to by several speakers, and, of course, it must be admitted that the Revenue of India, being payable in silver, has fallen in consequence of the depression in silver; but if the Government have received less it is because the taxpayer has paid less. The commerce of India has not suffered. On the contrary, the exports and imports have risen from £93,000,000 in 1873 to £180,000,000 in 1888. Indeed, part of the case of the supporters of bi-metallism consists in a complaint that the trade of India has so greatly increased. I cannot help thinking that the difficulties of exchange have been greatly exaggerated; at any rate, it is a remarkable fact that, while the export trade of India since 1873 has risen more with gold-using than with silver-using countries, namely, 27 per cent. only with silver-using and 62 per cent. with gold-using countries. The right hon. Gentleman said that no one would deny that the fall in silver of 20 per cent. operated as a bounty to that extent in favour of the Indian manufacturer. But that is by no means admitted. Hon. Members near me will, I am sure, demur to any such statement. Suppose an Indian and an English manufacturer send to a neutral market goods of a character which were formerly worth 1,000 rupees, or £50. It is said that a fall of 20 per cent. in prices, including that of silver, gives the Indian manufacturer a bounty of 20 per cent. This is an entire fallacy. No doubt the Indian producer would still receive 1,000 rupees, which would buy as much as before, while the English producer would only receive £37 10s., instead of £50; but then by the hypothesis his £37 10s. would buy as much as £50 did formerly, and as much as 1,000 rupees do now. I do not believe that the fall in prices is due to the fall in silver, or that it implies any substantial appreciation of gold. It is due mainly to improvements in production and greater cheapness in transport. Take the case of American wheat. In 20 years there has been a fall of no less than 20s. a quarter. But then the railway charges from the interior are 11s. a quarter less, freight 4s., loading, unloading, &c., 3s. less, and boys 1s. This accounts for 19s. out of the 20s. No doubt agriculturists and manufacturers suffer from the fall, and I sympathise with them. But when the hon. Member for Flintshire says that the working bees suffer and the drones gain, I ask who gains by the cheapness of bread? Who consumes the wheat? Surely the working bees. The working classes now have good employment, and wages are rising. They are the gainers, and I think the House will long hesitate before they alter the standard of value with the express object of raising the prices of the comforts and necessities of life. My hon. Friends think they can fix a ratio between silver and gold. I entirely disbelieve in the power of any international arrangement to fix a ratio of value between any two articles of commerce. It has been said by several speakers that this was admitted by all the Commissioners. But that is not so. Mr. Birch and I entirely dissented, and our four colleagues admitted that this might be an agio either on the gold or silver coin. It must be remembered that gold and silver are not merely used for coinage. It is estimated that from £12,000,000 to £16,000,000 are used in the arts. Do my hon. Friends think they can fix the price of what is used in the arts? If not, neither can they do so for that part which is used for coinage. The cheaper metal will inevitably, as it always has, drive out the dearer. Under the bi-metallic arrangement of the Latin Union there was for years a considerable agio on the gold coins, and the arrangement broke down in 1873 because it was found impossible to maintain it any longer. It is a great convenience to have a sufficient amount of coinage of all three metals—gold, silver, and copper. The present system secures this, but under this proposal it would be impossible. No one can foretell what the production of the mines will be, but, as sure as fate, either the gold will expel the silver, or, what now seems most probable, the silver will drive out the gold. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and his Friends spoke of themselves as bi-metallists. The term was, however, misleading. True bi-metallism would be if the creditor could claim to receive, and the debtor to pay, the debt half in silver and half in gold. But what my hon. Friends propose is that one of the parties to the contract should be allowed to pay either in silver or in gold, at his option. It is estimated that we receive not less than £85,000,000 from our investments over sea; and what a remarkable fact it is that our investments over sea exceed by £20,000,000 the whole rent of the land of our own country, which only amounts to £65,000,000. Now, no doubt, part of the £85,000,000 is derived from shares and freight. But there still remains a very large sum, perhaps £40,000,000 to £50,000,000, payable by agreement, either in gold or silver. My hon. Friends, in their great generosity, propose that we should give to foreign countries the option of paying in which ever metal might become the cheaper of the two. If silver falls we are to be paid in silver; if gold falls, in gold. Moreover, the same uncertainty will apply to our internal trade. In fact, the arrangement will tend to drive all financial transactions to some country which is not so unwise as to adopt such a fluctuating currency. No reference has been made to our colonies. It is not likely that Australia, which produces no silver and much gold, will abandon its gold standard; and unless it does so the difficulties of exchange, whatever they are, will only be transferred from India to Australia. The mercantile community are quite opposed to these proposals. At the meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce last year a resolution in favour of bi-metallism only found 11 supporters among 174 delegates. The hon. Member for Flintshire says that the prosperity of England ceased in 1873. I do not deny that some trades have been depressed, and that rents have fallen heavily. I sympathise greatly with those who have suffered. But, taking the country as a whole, so far from falling back, there has been an immense advance since 1873. Our exports have risen from £670,000,000 to £740,000,000, and adding on 20 per cent, which hon. Members say is the average fall in prices, the amount would be brought up to £890,000,000, showing the enormous increase of £220,000,000. The annual income of the country has risen from £514,000,000 to £636,000,000, showing an increase of income of no less than £122,000,000. The Clearing House transactions have risen from £6,000,000,000 to £7,600,000,000, showing an increase of no less than £1,600,000,000. Lastly, Mr. Giffen has shown that in the past 10 years the realised value of the property of the country has risen from £8,500,000,000 to £10,000,000,000, showing the enormous increase of £1,500,000,000. And yet my hon. Friends complain. Surely, such an increase ought to satisfy the wildest dreams of avarice. I cannot, therefore, think that my hon. Friends have shown any reason for a change, or have proved the practicability of the plan they propose, and I hope the House will not agree to the Amendment.

Sir John Lubbock

(11.55.) The House divided:—Ayes 183; Noes 87.—(Div. List, No. 52.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee upon Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolutions [17th April] reported (see pages 736, 788, 789, 790).

Resolutions agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Jackson.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT (1890-91).

Copy ordered—

"Of Statement of Revenue and Expenditure as laid before the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when opening the Budget."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. (No. 183.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS LICENCES
(SCOTLAND.)

Return ordered—

"Of the number of Licences, for the sale of Intoxicating Liquors, the renewal of which has been refused, in the year 1889 and four preceding years, by the Licensing Magistrates in each Licensing District in Scotland, showing also the result of Appeal (if any.)

Number of Licences for inns and hotels refused.	—
Number of Licences for public houses refused.	3
Number of Licences for dealers in excisable liquors and grocers trading in excisable liquors refused.	3
Number of Licences for sale of table beer refused.	4
Result of Appeal (if any).	2

—(Mr. Provand.)

M O T I O N S .

KEW AND PETERSHAM VICARAGE.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to provide for the division of the Vicarage of Kew and Petersham into two distinct vicarages, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. William Henry Smith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 229.]

IRELAND—MR. M. HARRIS'S FUNERAL —CONDUCT OF THE POLICE.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House,

(12.19.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.):
Before the rising of the House last night I endeavoured to obtain from the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) some explanation with regard to the conduct of the police at the funeral of Mr. Matthew Harris, the late Member for East Galway, and who was well-known to many Members of this House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was then unable to give any reply, and he suggested that I should put a question to-day. Adopting his suggestion, I gave notice of a question for to-day, and this afternoon put it to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. He was, however, unable to give me further information about it. He suggested that I should put a further question at the close of question time. At the close of question time he had disappeared behind the Speaker's chair, and, though he came back for a moment, I was unable to get an answer. I think I have some reason to complain of this neglect of duty on the right hon. Gentleman's part. Mr. Harris died on Monday last at Ballinasloe, and the funeral took place yesterday. I should, first, say what was the conduct of the police. The head constable of the place went to the friends of the deceased and put two questions to them. He first asked who was to be the speaker at the funeral? I respectfully submit that he had no right to put that question. He then demanded that a place should be reserved at the side of the grave for a note-taker appointed by the Government. This demand was, in my opinion, very properly resented and refused. I do not see why the sad ceremony of an interment should be ordered and arranged for the purpose of securing special accommodation for an official of the Government. The funeral procession was attended, and, in a moral sense, molested, by the presence of a body of police. Some of the police were in civilian costume, and apparently unarmed; while others were in uniform, and were armed with batons. The police accompanied the procession. They pushed their way into the graveyard, and, when the procession reached the grave, violently forced their way forward until they had taken up a position immediately surrounding the grave, and placed their note-taker at the graveside. To the great indignation of the people of Ballinasloe—an indignation which has been reflected throughout the whole country—they remained in this

